TERRORISM NEWS:

Testimony Helps Detail CIA's Post-9/11 Reach (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

MILAN -- A few days after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the CIA station chief in Rome paid a visit to the head of Italy's military intelligence agency, Adm. Gianfranco Battelli, to float a proposal: Would the Italian secret services help the CIA kidnap terrorism suspects and fly them out of the country?

The CIA man did not identify which targets he had in mind but was "expressly referring to the possibility of picking up a suspected terrorist in Italy, bringing him to an airport and sending him from there to a foreign country," Battelli, now retired, recalled in a deposition.

This initial secret contact and others that followed, disclosed in newly released documents, show the speed and breadth with which the CIA applied in post-9/11 Europe a tactic it had long reserved for the Third World -- "extraordinary rendition," the extrajudicial abduction of Islamic radicals overseas for interrogation in friendly countries.

A year after the first contact, the CIA officer held another meeting with his Italian counterparts, this time sharing a list of more than 10 "dangerous people" the agency was tracking in Italy, Belgium, Austria and the Netherlands, according to a deposition from Gen. Gustavo Pignero, another high-ranking Italian military intelligence official. "It was clear that this was an aggressive search project, that their willingness to employ illicit means was clear," Pignero said, adding that the list was later destroyed and he could not recall the names.

U.S. spies drew up suspect lists with the help of European intelligence agencies and chased some of the men around the globe before putting a brake on the operations in early 2004, about a year after the invasion of Iraq, according to documents unearthed in criminal investigations, lawsuits and parliamentary inquiries.

All told, the U.S. agency took part in the seizure of at least 10 European citizens or legal immigrants, some of them from countries not cited in that list of "dangerous people" received by the Italian spies. Four renditions occurred on European soil: in Sweden, Macedonia and Italy. Six operations targeted people who were traveling abroad or who had been captured in Pakistan; European intelligence agencies provided direct assistance to the CIA in at least five of those cases, records show.

Each prisoner was then secretly handed over to intelligence services in the Middle East or Africa with histories of human rights abuses. Some remain imprisoned in those countries; others have been taken to the U.S. naval prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. One man was later released after being taken from the Balkans to Afghanistan, the victim of an apparent case of mistaken identity.

In the early stages, the CIA had prepared even more ambitious plans, according to the depositions from the Italian intelligence officials, who testified last summer during a criminal investigation into a CIA-sponsored kidnapping of a radical Islamic cleric in Milan.

For example, Pignero said in his deposition that the CIA's Rome station chief had offered in 2002 to abduct a fugitive leader of the Red Brigades -- a Marxist network blamed for dozens of assassinations in Italy -- who had found refuge in South America. "The Americans would capture him and turn him over to us, and we in return would have to 'extradite' him to Italy without any legal proceedings," Pignero said.

In exchange, the CIA wanted help in abducting Islamic radicals living in the Italian cities of Turin, Vercelli and Naples, Pignero said. Italian intelligence officials rejected the offer, he added, because it was "contrary to international laws."

Reports of clandestine CIA operations have fueled deep public anger in Europe, where many people regard renditions as a blatant violation of national sovereignty and international law. Since last year, prosecutors have opened four separate criminal investigations into CIA activities in Europe. A dozen countries have conducted legislative inquiries into whether local spy agencies were involved.

Last month, a European Parliament committee investigating CIA operations in Europe condemned the practice of rendition "as an illegal and systematic instrument used by the United States" and called it "counterproductive in the fight against terrorism."

"I think that after the 11th of September, the CIA thought that all the ways useful to capture their enemies, the alleged terrorists, were now possible," Giovanni Claudio Fava, an Italian legislator who led the parliamentary probe, said in an interview in Brussels. "They wanted to clean Europe of all these dangerous, alleged terrorists. They didn't have faith in the quality and capacity of our own security controls and our justice system."

In the past year, U.S. officials have sought to repair the diplomatic damage. They have met repeatedly with their European counterparts to defuse opposition to renditions, the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo and the disclosure in November 2005 that the CIA had set up secret prisons for terrorism suspects in Eastern Europe.

John B. Bellinger III, legal adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said U.S. diplomats have made some headway. But he added that ongoing political disputes have "undermined cooperation and intelligence activities."

"I'd say that many European government officials and academics acknowledge now that there is a legal murkiness that applies to international terrorism," he said in a telephone interview from Washington. "On the negative side of the ledger, we do continue to have these hysterical, inflated allegations denouncing the United States that unfortunately do fan the flames of suspicion and anti-Americanism."

The CIA declined to comment.'He Was Too Loud'

The most detailed disclosures about the CIA's European rendition project have emerged from Milan, where Italian prosecutors have spent two years investigating the disappearance of Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, a militant Egyptian-born cleric known as Abu Omar.

When Nasr vanished in February 2003, police and prosecutors in Milan thought at first that he had slipped out of the country on his own, perhaps to join resistance forces in Iraq in advance of the U.S.-led invasion. The CIA lent credence to their suspicions a few months later, when it delivered an intelligence bulletin to Rome stating that Nasr had been seen in the Balkans.

In fact, prosecutors later discovered, Nasr had been grabbed on the street in Milan as he was walking to a mosque and stuffed into a white van, which sped to Aviano Air Base, a joint U.S.-Italian military installation. From there, he was put on a plane to Ramstein Air Base in Germany, and onward to Cairo, where Nasr claims he was tortured for months with electric shocks and sexually abused.

Prosecutors in Milan have since issued arrest warrants on kidnapping charges for 25 CIA operatives and a U.S. Air Force officer, alleging that they conspired with Italian secret service agents to abduct Nasr. Although none of the Americans is likely to be extradited to Italy, prosecutors have served notice that they intend to try them in absentia and asked a judge last month to formally indict the defendants.

Senior Italian intelligence officials have also been charged in the case, including Gen. Nicolo Pollari, director of the Italian military intelligence agency known as Sismi. Pignero, his former deputy, was arrested in June, shortly after he gave his deposition to prosecutors. He died of cancer three months later, on Sept. 11.

European investigators are still examining other mysterious cases of missing or detained people. Among them is the disappearance a few weeks before Nasr's kidnapping of another Egyptian-born Islamic fundamentalist.

Gamal al-Menshawi, a physician and occasional mosque preacher who knew Nasr personally, had left his home in Graz, Austria, bound for the Islamic holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia. His wife was waiting for him there, but he never arrived, according to Egyptian exiles in Austria and Italy who know him.

Menshawi's trail vanished after he arrived in Amman, Jordan, for a flight connection. He later surfaced in Egypt. European Parliament investigators have concluded he was detained there for two years without facing charges.

He was released in 2005 and is living in Alexandria, Egypt, according to Austrian journalists. He has severed contact with friends and colleagues in Europe, who strongly suspect he was subjected to a rendition, although they lack proof or direct evidence of U.S. involvement.

Arman Ahmed al-Hissini, imam of the Viale Jenner mosque in Milan and an acquaintance of Menshawi and Nasr, said both have been silenced by the Egyptian security services.

"The Arab secret services, they give names to the CIA of people who they want, people who are on the outside, such as Europe," said Hissini, an Egyptian native known locally as Abu Imad. "They give the names to the CIA, because the CIA can go to work in these countries."

There is also little doubt about Menshawi's fate among those who knew him in Austria's Islamic community.

"I see the American government as being primarily responsible," said Mohamed Mahmoud, chairman of a group called Islamic Group of Austria. "This is not the first time someone has disappeared."

"The Americans look around in Europe for who is being loud, who is speaking out, and then those people are kidnapped," he added. "He was very vocal; he was too loud for them. He talked openly about Egypt's government, about the U.S. government, about the Islamic community in Austria."'They Needed Information'

About the same time, another Islamic militant from Austria disappeared during a stopover at the Amman airport.

Masaad Omer Behari, a Sudanese citizen who had lived in Austria for more than a decade, has said he was arrested by Jordanian secret service agents on Jan. 12, 2003, as he was traveling home to Vienna from a trip to Sudan.

Behari told European Parliament investigators in October that he was held for three months in a Jordanian prison, where he was interrogated about Islamic militants in Austria and elsewhere in Europe. "On the first day I was in prison, they told me they did not think I was a terrorist, but that they needed information about the Islamic scene in Vienna," he said.

Documents obtained by the investigators show that Behari had been under surveillance by Austria's domestic intelligence service since 1998, when he was interrogated about an alleged plot to blow up the U.S. Embassy in Vienna. Behari said he was innocent and never faced charges, but was pressured by Austrian secret service agents to leave the country after the Sept. 11 hijackings.

"I have experienced hard times because I did not cooperate with the security authorities in Europe and with the Americans," Behari said, according to a transcript of his testimony. The Austrians "threatened me that they would cause me problems. I thought it was only 'blah-blah,' but it was the truth."

Austrian authorities said they have not opened official inquiries into the disappearances of Menshawi or Behari, in part because neither is an Austrian citizen.

"Since the alleged abductions did not take place on Austrian soil, in an Austrian airplane or on an Austrian ship, we see no need for action," said Rudolf Gollia, spokesman for the Austrian Interior Ministry.

Military Taking A Tougher Line With Detainees (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

GUANTÁNAMO BAY, Cuba, Dec. 10 — As the first detainees began moving last week into Guantánamo's modern, new detention facility, Camp 6, the military guard commander stood beneath the high, concrete walls of the compound, looking out on a fenced-in athletic yard.

The yard, where the detainees were to have played soccer and other sports, had been part of a plan to ease the conditions under which more than 400 men are imprisoned here, nearly all of them without having been charged. But that plan has changed.

"At this point, I just don't see using that," the guard commander, Col. Wade F. Dennis, said.

After two years in which the military sought to manage terrorism suspects at Guantánamo with incentives for good behavior, steady improvements in their living conditions and even dialogue with prison leaders, the authorities here have clamped down decisively in recent months.

Security procedures have been tightened. Group activities have been scaled back. With the retrofitting of Camp 6 and the near-emptying of another showcase camp for compliant prisoners, military officials said about three-fourths of the detainees would eventually be held in maximum-security cells. That is a stark departure from earlier plans to hold a similar number in medium-security units.

Officials said the shift reflected the military's analysis — after a series of hunger strikes, a riot last May and three suicides by detainees in June — that earlier efforts to ease restrictions on the detainees had gone too far.

The commander of the Guantánamo task force, Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., said the tougher approach also reflected the changing nature of the prison population, and his conviction that all of those now held here are dangerous men. "They're all terrorists; they're all enemy combatants," Admiral Harris said in an interview.

He added, "I don't think there is such a thing as a medium-security terrorist."

Admiral Harris, who took command on March 31, referred in part to the recent departure from Guantánamo of the last of 38 men whom the military had classified since early 2005 as "no longer enemy combatants." Still, about 100 others who had been cleared by the military for transfer or release remained here while the State Department tried to arrange their repatriation.

[Shortly after Admiral Harris's remarks, another 15 detainees were sent home to Saudi Arabia, where they were promptly returned to their families.]

The detainee population here has also been reshaped by the arrival in September of 14 terror suspects, including the accused mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, who had been held by the Central Intelligence Agency in secret prisons overseas.

United States officials said these so-called high-value suspects were being held apart from the rest of the Guantánamo prisoners, at a secret detention facility supervised by C.I.A. officers. The 14 have been visited twice by representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross, but have not yet been interrogated by military intelligence officials, these officials said.

Next year, after the Defense Department finishes rewriting rules for the military tribunals that the Bush administration first established in November 2001, the intelligence agency's prisoners are to be charged with war crimes. The timetable for their prosecutions remains uncertain.

Military officials said they would continue to try to improve conditions at the prison to the extent that security considerations allowed. They said they have abandoned special cell blocks for discipline and segregation, so that prisoners who violate rules are now punished simply by the withdrawal of various privileges in their regular cells. The authorities have also standardized rules for exercise, allowing each detainee at least two hours a day, they said.

Nonetheless, the tightening of security at the detention center represents a significant shift in Guantánamo's operations.

Since spring 2004, the military's handling of the detainees had been heavily influenced by the political and diplomatic pressures that grew out of the Abu Ghraib scandal and other cases of prisoner abuse. At the same time, Guantánamo's focus was shifting from interrogations to the long-term detention of men who, for the most part, would never be charged with any crime.

With little guidance from Washington, senior officers here began in 2005 to edge back toward the traditional Geneva Convention rules for prisoner treatment that President Bush had disavowed after 9/11 for the fight against terrorism, military officials said. Military officers began listening more attentively to the prisoners' complaints, and eventually met a few times with a council of detainee leaders.

Those talks were quickly aborted in August 2005. The hunger strikes were effectively broken last January, when the military began strapping detainees into padded "restraint chairs" to force-feed them through stomach tubes.

But those protests gave way to several drug overdoses in May and the hangings in June of three prisoners — all of whom had previously been hunger strikers.

The current Guantánamo commanders eschewed any criticism of their predecessors. But they were blunt in laying out a different approach.

Asked about his discussions with prisoners, Colonel Dennis said he basically had none. As for the handful of detainees who have continued to wage hunger strikes, including three who were being force-fed last week, he said they would get no "special attention" from him.

"If they want to do that, hook it up," he said, apparently referring to the restraint chair system for force-feeding. "If that's what you want to do, that's your choice."

Admiral Harris said he had ordered a hardening of the security posture on the basis of new insights into the threat that the detainees pose. "We have learned how committed they are, just how serious they are, and how dangerous they are," he said.

Several military officials said Admiral Harris took over the Guantánamo task force with a greater concern about security, and soon ordered his aides to draw up plans to deal with hostage-takings and other emergencies.

He and Colonel Dennis both asserted that Camp 4 — where dozens of detainees rioted during an aggressive search of their quarters last May — represented a particular danger.

Admiral Harris said detainees there had used the freedom of the camp to train one another in terrorist tactics, and in 2004 plotted unsuccessfully to seize a food truck and use it to run over guards.

"Camp 4 is an ideal planning ground for nefarious activity," he said.

But according to several recent interviews with military personnel who served here at the time, the riot in May did not transpire precisely as military officials had described it. The disturbance culminated with what the military had said was an attack by detainees on members of a Quick Reaction Force that burst into one barracks to stop a detainee who appeared to be hanging himself.

But officers familiar with the event said the force stormed in after a guard saw a detainee merely holding up a sheet and that his intentions were ambiguous. A guard also mistakenly broadcast the radio code for multiple suicide attempts, heightening the alarm, the officers said.

Admiral Harris conceded that an error "could have been" made, but said "it was certainly no accident" that the prisoners had slicked the floor of their quarters with soapy water and excrement, and fought the guards with makeshift weapons. He said he believed the guards acted properly.

The May 18 search took place after at least two prisoners were found unconscious from overdoses of hoarded drugs. The detainees who attacked the guards were known as especially religious, and had been angered in the past by searches of their Korans.

After the three suicides in June, Camp 6 was substantially reconfigured. Staircases and catwalks were fenced in so that detainees could not jump from them to attack guards or try to kill themselves. Shower stalls were built higher so they could not be used for hangings. Exercise yards were divided up into a series of one-man pens.

The detainees will still look out the small windows of their computer-controlled cell doors to see the stainless steel picnic tables where they were once supposed to have shared their meals; they just will not be able to sit at those tables with other detainees.

Military officials confirmed that since the suicides in June, three detainees who were part of the council that negotiated with military commanders had been kept isolated from nearly all other prisoners in Camp Echo, a collection of bungalows where detainees often see their lawyers.

Those detainees include Shaker Aamer, a Saudi resident of Britain who is accused of having ties to Al Qaeda; Ghassan al-Sharbi, a Saudi electrical engineer who was charged earlier with plotting to make bombs for Qaeda forces in Afghanistan; and Saber Lahmar, an Algerian religious scholar seized in Bosnia.

Lawyers for Mr. Aamer and Mr. Lahmar said that they had been alone for most of that time, and that the isolation was causing them psychological damage.

"They have thrown away the key and forgotten him even though he is spiraling down physically and psychologically," Mr. Lahmar's lawyer, Stephen H. Olesky, said.

Noting that a petition for relief on behalf of Mr. Lahmar has been before a federal appeals court for nearly two years, he added, "They know we do not have a judge to take this case to, so they can pile on the detainee."

Colonel Dennis, the commander of the detention group, said Mr. Lahmar was being allowed to exercise and had access to any medical attention he required.

Tortured Canadian Still On U.S. "Watch List" (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

TORONTO, Dec. 15 -- Maher Arar, the Canadian Muslim who was whisked by U.S. agents from a New York airport to imprisonment and torture in Syria, remains on the U.S. "watch list" despite an exhaustive Canadian inquiry that found he is an innocent man, the U.S. ambassador to Canada said Friday.

Ambassador David Wilkins said in an interview with CBC Radio that Arar "is on the watch list and has been since he was deported" in 2002 to Syria, where he was held for 10 months, much of it in a coffin-like dungeon.

His transfer to Syria, part of a series of U.S. clandestine "extraordinary renditions" of terrorism suspects for interrogation in foreign countries, created a scandal in Canada.

The head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police resigned last week after a two-year judicial inquiry found his officers gave U.S. agents false information to cast suspicion on Arar.

The Canadian Parliament has apologized to Arar, now 36, and the Canadian government is preparing compensation for the engineer.

But the United States has never acknowledged any mistake in the matter, and Wilkins's disclosure Friday indicates Arar might again be detained by the United States if he were to enter the country.

His removal to Syria "was based on information from a variety of sources, as is his current watch list status," Wilkins said in a statement he issued later Friday. U.S. officials have made "our own independent assessment of the threat to the United States," he said.

"That the United States would have the gall to keep Maher on a watch list, implying that he poses a threat to this country, is outrageous," said one of Arar's attorneys, Maria LaHood, a lawyer with the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York. The nonprofit group filed a suit on Arar's behalf against the U.S. government, but it was dismissed.

"This administration is unwilling to admit its mistakes and still tries to conceal them," she said.

In Ottawa, New Democratic Party leader Jack Layton said the Canadian government should demand that the United States remove Arar's name from the list. "Otherwise, it sends a message the Canadian government will not stand behind its own citizens," he told reporters.

Rail-Cargo Plan Aims To Avert Terrorism (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

Federal officials unveiled a plan yesterday to tighten security for railroad shipments of hazardous materials, saying the rules would reduce the risk of terrorists using dangerous chemicals to kill thousands of people.

The proposals -- which drew criticism from Democrats, who said they did not go far enough -- would require freight and passenger systems to keep closer tabs on rail cars containing dangerous chemicals. A separate set of rules proposed by the Transportation Department would compel rail operators to find safer and more secure routes for such shipments, authorities said.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the rules, which will be open to public comment for 60 days, would "reduce the risk that chemicals can be turned into deadly weapons when they are in transit."

Authorities are concerned that terrorists might target rail cars in the hopes of releasing a plume of hazardous chemicals in a populated region. The proposals would cost the rail industry about $162 million over 10 years, officials said.

Chertoff said many of the proposed rules have already been adopted by the rail industry on a voluntary basis.

Democratic members of Congress said the rules did not adequately address overall rail security.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.), who has introduced rail security legislation in the past, said the plans would not do enough to secure rail stations, bridges and tunnels, which are also vulnerable to attack.

He said the government should also have the authority to force companies to reroute hazardous materials around populated areas when terror alert levels are raised.

"This plan is just window dressing," he said. "It doesn't have any substance."

The D.C. Council grew so concerned about a possible attack on rail cars containing hazardous chemicals that in 2005 it banned such shipments within 2.2 miles of the Capitol. That ban has been put on hold pending the result of a lawsuit by CSX Transportation Inc. and the U.S. government. Several other cities have also banned the shipments and are closely watching the District's court case.

Chertoff said banning chemical shipments from urban areas would be difficult because the rail system weaves in and out of those areas. Many of the chemicals -- such as chlorine used to purify water -- are destined for use in metropolitan areas, he said.

"If you are going to deliver to a city, you have got to get it into the city," Chertoff said.

Chertoff said the rules are aimed at protecting rail cars when they are most vulnerable: when they are not moving and are waiting to be transferred to other companies. Under the proposal, authorities would require a "secure handoff" from one company to another, preventing a car from "sitting there unattended," Chertoff said.

When cars are stationary for long periods of time, companies would be required to watch them or park them in secure areas, he added.

Transportation Security Administration officials would have the authority to conduct inspections of rail operations and levy fines if they found security breaches. The companies would also be required to provide authorities with the exact locations of hazardous shipments within minutes of a request, Chertoff said.

Feinstein Criticizes DHS On Foreigner Exit Program (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

Supporters of the troubled US-VISIT program warned yesterday that the decision to suspend a crucial part of the national security program launched after the 2001 attacks will leave the nation vulnerable to terrorism.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said the government will be left with no way of knowing whether all visitors leave the country after the administration decided to drop a plan to track departures at land borders because of technical and cost problems.

Feinstein called the decision a "very serious failure" on top of multiple delays since the system was proposed in 1996.

US-VISIT is designed to detect criminals, suspected terrorists and visitors whose visas have expired by recording travelers' fingerprints and digital photographs when they enter and exit the United States. Having spent $1.7 billion since 2003, Department of Homeland Security officials say they have successfully recorded 61 million people entering the country through 115 airports, 15 seaports and 154 of 170 land ports.

But they cannot build an exit tracking system without spending "tens of billions" of dollars more and an additional five to 10 years developing the technology.

"This program is central to protecting our national security," said Feinstein, incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee's homeland security panel. "Billions of dollars and countless hours have been invested, and if DHS is going to throw this all away, the American people deserve to know why."

Others expressed relief that the department was acknowledging what critics have insisted for years: that billions of dollars might be wasted on contracts that could not deliver results. Developing an exit system is difficult because of the volume of cross-border traffic, technological demands and practical limits.

Such an entry-exit system was recommended by the panel that investigated the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, but several studies have challenged its feasibility.

"Always make sure you state it clearly when the emperor has no clothes, to me is the moral of the story," said Kathleen Walker, incoming president of the American Immigration Lawyers Association, citing repeated studies and government testimony about US-VISIT's flaws.

DHS's retreat came after Congress's audit arm, the Government Accountability Office, reported Thursday that US-VISIT officials had concluded that the exit program could not now be launched at land crossings without major traffic delays or enormous cost to expand facilities, roads and communication links.

In an interview, US-VISIT Director Robert Mocny said the agency is completing a January spending report to Congress that will lay out plans to expand the exit system at airports and seaports but will leave out land ports.

Land ports record 309 million crossings a year, compared with 87 million at airports. But U.S. officials say airports pose a greater security risk because most land crossers are repeat travelers, or Mexican, Canadian and U.S. citizens who are for now exempt from US-VISIT.

In comments to reporters, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff acknowledged that the department was sidetracking the land exit system.

"If we required all the people leaving the country by land going into Canada to stop to give a biometric print," Chertoff said, "you would see lines that are 10 or 15 miles long, stretching from the border deeply into New York or into Detroit."

Chertoff cited progress in tracking and screening unwanted people before they enter the United States. US-VISIT has captured more than 1,100 criminals who were using false documents, officials have said. Other programs are underway to integrate homeland security and FBI fingerprint databases, to automatically generate risk assessments on travelers and to improve monitoring of some immigration violators.

"The highest priority is to keep terrorists out of the country. Letting them come in the country and then worrying whether they haven't left in 90 days seems, to me, an inferior concern to keeping them out in the first place," Chertoff said.

US-VISIT has also spent $71 million testing the use of radio-frequency identification technology -- involving tiny microchips with a unique code embedded in a tag on visitors' departure forms -- as an alternative to a fingerprint or facial-scan system. But a January 2006 test correctly identified only 16 percent of 166 vehicles with such tags. Among the drawbacks is that the tags cannot be physically tied to an individual.

Israelis Warned To Avoid Goa, A Longtime Favorite Tourist Destination For Young Travelers (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

ANJUNA, India, Dec. 15 — A favored destination of young Israelis seeking respite from the frazzle and stress of home, the tourist haven of Goa got a rude reminder of reality this week.

Based on information gleaned by its counterterrorism agency, the Israeli government issued a rare terrorism alert on Thursday warning of a planned attack by Al Qaeda on tourists during the New Year's holiday season. The advisory described the information as "a concrete threat" but gave no further detail.

The Israeli Embassy urged its citizens to visit another time or, if they must be in the state of Goa, to stay away from crowded places. "We advise them to be alert and to take this threat very seriously," the embassy spokesman, Lior Weintraub, said Friday by telephone from New Delhi, the capital.

In Anjuna, on Goa's northern coast, where Internet cafes cater to Israelis checking e-mail messages from home and where restaurants serve schnitzel for lunch, the news of Al Qaeda's suspected designs was greeted with a mixture of apprehension and aplomb.

"Now we feel at home," Yossi Damti, 23, fresh out of the Israeli Army, said with a shrug on Friday afternoon.

"We got used to it," said his friend, Orif Tordjman, 21, who had also just completed her military service. "We're not going to leave because of this alert."

Goa is among India's most coveted tourist destinations. For Israelis, it is also a common stop on the post-military-service tourist circuit. The embassy in New Delhi estimated that around 35,000 Israelis come to Goa each year, crowding into a handful of coastal villages like this one.

Alerts like this latest one, which was unusual for its level of specificity, are particularly vexing for the Indian government, which has long maintained that Al Qaeda does not operate on Indian soil. In August, in the days leading up to India's Independence Day, the United States Embassy said it had received information that foreign terrorists, including Al Qaeda, planned to carry out a series of bombings in and around New Delhi and Mumbai. Indian officials dismissed the alert as a routine advisory.

India has cultivated warmer relations with Israel and the United States, making it, according to some security analysts, more vulnerable to Qaeda attacks.

Local news outlets on Friday quoted the chief minister of Goa, Pratapsing Rane, as saying that his state remained safe for tourists. Tourism is among the state's principal sources of revenue.

At an Internet cafe on Anjuna's main strip, Shai Zimon, 23, who had been traveling across India for the past 6 weeks, said he was hunting for a ticket to fly to Thailand for New Year's Eve, but not because of the terrorism threat. "You can't base your trip on what the government says," he said.

If you did, piped in a Swiss woman, Gitta Klee, also checking e-mail messages, no one would ever go anywhere.

Ms. Klee, 53, who has lived in Goa for more than 27 years, theorized that the terrorism alert was the brainchild of anxious parents not wanting their children to party in Goa. "Me, I don't think this place is interesting enough for terrorists," she said.

Word seemed not to have spread yet to the non-Israeli tourists who crowd into some of the same cheap guesthouses here. A pair of German tourists waiting for a bus to the beach were oblivious to the alert. A British tourist, Mustapha Dari, 24, said he had heard only something vague from a friend who had watched the news the night before on Indian television. His friend, Raffi Israelion, 20, a Parisian, confessed that he was particularly worried because local residents often took him to be Israeli.

At a Jewish community house on Friday afternoon, the news had seeped in, and the visit of a foreign journalist was enough to spark fear and hostility. At first, two women sitting on the porch of the house, where preparations were under way for a service to mark the first night of Hanukkah, said they knew of three friends who had canceled their New Year's Eve plans for Goa.

They said friends and family in Israel had already called them and urged them to return home. They weren't sure what they would do. One of the women, who gave her name only as Adi, said she did not want Al Qaeda to "ruin our plans."

Nor, it turned out, did she want to say any more to a stranger. The conversation quickly turned tense. Why are you asking for our names, they demanded. Why do you want to know when the first candle would be lit on the menorah this evening? Why are you asking if we will stay here for the New Year's holiday?

"All this situation, I don't know," Adi said nervously, and quickly disappeared into the house.

WAR NEWS:

Women Lose Ground In The New Iraq (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

DOJ_NMG_0107355

BAGHDAD -- Browsing the shelves of a cosmetics store in the Karrada shopping district, Zahra Khalid felt giddy at the sight of Alberto shampoo and Miss Rose eye shadow, blusher and powder.

Before leaving her house, she had covered her body in a billowing black abaya and wrapped a black head scarf around her thick brown hair. She had asked her brother to drive. She had done all the things that a woman living in Baghdad is supposed to do these days to avoid drawing attention to herself.

It was the first time she had left home in two months.

"For a woman, it's just like being in jail," she said. "I can't go anywhere."

Life has become more difficult for most Iraqis since the February bombing of a Shiite Muslim mosque in Samarra sparked a rise in sectarian killings and overall lawlessness. For many women, though, it has become unbearable.

As Islamic fundamentalism seeps into society and sectarian warfare escalates, more and more women live in fear of being kidnapped or raped. They receive death threats because of their religious sects and careers. They are harassed for not abiding by the strict dress code of long skirts and head scarves or for driving cars.

For much of the 20th century, and under various leaders, Iraq was one of the most progressive Middle Eastern countries in its treatment of women, who were encouraged to go to school and enter the workforce. Saddam Hussein's Baath Party espoused a secular Arab nationalism that advocated women's full participation in society. But years of war changed that.

In the days after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, many women were hopeful that they would enjoy greater parity with men. President Bush said that increasing women's rights was essential to creating a new, democratic Iraq.

But interviews with 16 Iraqi women, ranging in age from 21 to 52, show that much of that postwar hope is gone. The younger women say they fear being snatched on their way to school and wonder whether their college degrees will mean anything in the new Iraq. The older women, proud of their education and careers, are watching their independence slip away.

"At the beginning, we were very happy with those achievements and gains, and we were looking for more," said Ina'am al-Sultani, 36, a leader of the Progressive Women's Movement, a nongovernmental organization. "Women are now restrained."

Khalid, 30, whose only visible features as she shopped on a recent day were her round face and long eyelashes, was an accountant at the Planning Ministry until she received a death threat four months ago. She quit, moved to a new home and changed her phone number.

"We're suffering right now," Khalid said, her two sons tugging at her abaya. "The war took all our rights. We're not free because of terrorism."Hope and Fear

Before the war, Sundus Abbas, 38, was a researcher at a governmental organization. After the war, she became a women's rights activist.

After Saddam Hussein was forced out of power, many women like Abbas appeared on television talk shows and wrote newspaper articles challenging traditional views on marriage and other family issues and demanding that women be granted a greater role in government.

"They were there asking for their rights loudly and clearly," said Maysoon al-Damluji, a member of parliament.

There were signs of success. Twenty-five percent of the seats in the new National Assembly were reserved for women. Under Hussein, only one ministry was headed by a woman, Damluji said. Now, of the 38 ministry heads, four are women.

Iraqi women had been earning university degrees since the 1920s. Many earned master's degrees and doctorates and became physicians, engineers and lawyers.

Then came the 1980s war with Iran and the embargo imposed after the 1991 Persian Gulf War. Hussein, who began embracing Islamic and tribal traditions as a way to consolidate power, forbade women younger than 45 to travel abroad without a male relative.

Encouraged by Bush, women began to reassert themselves after 2003. But the collapse of security, the absence of the rule of law and the presence of extremist groups have weakened the budding movement, activists said. In the past year, its leaders have received death threats. Politicians have accused them of working in collusion with enemy countries, and police officers have harassed them, activists said.

On June 4, Abbas received an anonymous e-mail at her Baghdad office warning her to leave Iraq within 10 days. Three days later, another e-mail said she would be killed for not complying with the first threat.

She stayed home and canceled her scheduled appearances. A third threat came June 10 in a telephone text message. She recalled thinking that she did not want to be killed in front of her parents, who had already lost a daughter in a U.S. airstrike.

"I left with a feeling of humiliation and bitterness," she wrote in an e-mail from an undisclosed location. "Just imagine, I left my home, my family, my work and my city, for nowhere."'Psychologically Tired'

Aseel Bahjet and her mother shot nervous glances at each other as the 23-year-old spoke to a stranger in a Karrada perfume shop on a recent afternoon. Her mother wore an abaya. Bahjet wore a long black skirt, a black sweater and a head scarf. The shopkeeper closed the door so that no one would see a foreigner talking to the young woman.

Bahjet, a petite figure with pale skin and big brown eyes, recently graduated from Baghdad University with an engineering degree. But she doesn't know what to do with it.

Her mother, Shadam, wants her to stay at home as much as possible, saying she has heard too many stories about young women being kidnapped. Bahjet has nothing to do at home, other than talk to her friends on the phone.

"There's no chance to build our future," she said.

She lowered her voice and spoke slowly as she searched for the right words in English: "I joke that we should go see psychiatrists. All Iraqis are depressed."

Many young women at Bahjet's alma mater worry that they, too, will have nothing to do after they graduate. On a recent afternoon, Enas Moyad sat in an empty classroom at Baghdad University contemplating her future. Ask her if she is depressed, and she's quick to answer: "I'm psychologically tired."

She is 21.

Like many Iraqi parents, Moyad's had encouraged her to go to school. Now they don't.

This month, a Sunni Arab insurgent group asked Sunni students and professors not to attend classes while it "cleanses" the campuses of Shiite death squads. The group later said in a statement that it was canceling the rest of the school year. The threat was circulated so widely that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki issued a statement urging students to ignore it.

Fearing attacks on the way to campus, Moyad and nine other students have pitched in to hire a Kia minibus to take them there. Some of her girlfriends carry knives in their bags. Others take pistols, she said.

For months, attendance has been falling at the College of Education for Women, where Moyad is in her fourth year. One sociology professor said he had given only two lectures since Sept. 3. Normally, he gives 22 lectures a week.

Moyad, who shows her rebellious side by letting a few dyed blond bangs show from under her green hijab, or head scarf, said she worries about what her degree will do for her in the new Iraq.

"We are afraid that no one will take them," she said.Stay or Leave?

Many educated, professional women have struggled with the question of whether to stay in Iraq.

Muna Nouri, 52, a high school teacher, doesn't want to leave, even if it means having to abide by rules she does not believe in.

As a college student in 1974, Nouri showed off her long black hair. She wore short skirts. She walked around campus with friends who happened to be boys.

As an adult, she and her two daughters -- one is 20, the other 17 -- took walks around their neighborhood in the Hadra district, wearing whatever they wanted.

"I consider myself and my daughters liberated women," she said. "We go out and walk in the street. That was last year even. But this year, it's more difficult. Every day, it's worse than the day before."

The day after sectarian violence erupted in Sadr City late last month, Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr instructed women to continue wearing their hijabs.

"There are some voices being heard against the hijab, from inside and outside Islam," Sadr said. "I say it will remain a protection for our women and call on our sisters to be patient, not to listen to these voices."

Nouri considers herself a religious woman. She prays and reads the Koran. The Islam she knows does not oppress women, she said.

"I think Islam is more liberated than that," she said.

This year, more than 300 teachers and Education Ministry employees have been killed, according to government reports. Nouri does not want to make herself a target at the all-girls' high school where she teaches. So she wears long skirts and a head scarf to work.

"I don't like it, because I think the women here are very beautiful," she said, speaking by phone because she did not want her neighbors to see a stranger visiting her home. "This scarf is not beautiful."

Like Nouri, Bushra Shimirya, 42, had considered herself an independent woman. That changed dramatically in just a few months, she said. She knew things were bad when she could no longer drive her car.

"Anyone who's in her 20s and drives a car for the first time, you feel very happy and very independent," she said. "Like you can do anything."

Since the Samarra bombings, she said, she has felt she can do almost nothing.

Relatives had seen fliers warning women not to drive. They pleaded with her to stop. She resisted.

Shimirya, who has a doctorate in psychological studies, had been driving since she was 20.

But the stares started to bother her. They came from men anytime they saw her behind the wheel of her 1984 Toyota Crown.

So she hired a car service to take her to her job at Baghdad University. She stopped going out unless it was necessary. No more dinners with her girlfriends. No more walking the streets of her affluent Mansour neighborhood.

"It's become so bad that a woman who drives a car will be slaughtered, and a woman who doesn't put a scarf on her hair will be slaughtered," she said.

When classes ended in July, Shimirya and her husband, an engineer, sold their cars, locked up their large, modern-style house and headed to Dubai.

"I miss my home," she said, speaking by phone from Dubai. "I miss my colleagues at work. I miss my neighbors. I miss my family. I miss the air in Iraq. There is nothing more beautiful than Iraq."

New Manual At Odds With Key Iraq Tactics (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. military's new counterinsurgency doctrine takes issue with some key strategies that American commanders in Iraq continue to use, most notably the practice of concentrating combat forces in massive bases rather than dispersing them among the population.

The 282-page counterinsurgency field manual, unveiled Friday, seeks to bring together the best practices in fighting sustained insurgencies that the United States has learned during the Iraq war. It also lists tactics that have tripped up American forces, such as trying to make local security forces act like the U.S. military and overemphasizing killing or capturing enemies rather than providing for the safety of the population.

Although the military has moved away from some of these tactics, others are widely used in Iraq.

Most special operations forces in Iraq spend the bulk of their time and resources trying to kill or capture Al Qaeda members and insurgents. But the manual says the best use of those troops is not hunting enemies but training Iraqi security forces or police.

Perhaps the most controversial section may be the manual's warning about large, sprawling bases, the very kind the Army has erected in Baghdad. The manual warns that such military bases could suggest "a long-term foreign occupation."

The authors of the manual say the new doctrine is not meant as a critique of the Iraq strategy. Retired Army Col. Conrad Crane, who helped oversee the manual's development, said they were not criticizing the practice of putting soldiers on large bases but rather were saying they simply did not want people to hole up and become "fobbits."

"You have to get out and mingle among the people," Crane said. "You can't cede control of the night and the street to the enemy."

Retired Gen. John Keane, former acting chief of staff of the Army, said the military needed to move off the big bases in Baghdad and establish small bases peppered throughout key neighborhoods, as had been done in the Iraqi cities of Tall Afar and Ramadi.

"You put a protect force in that lives in the neighborhood. They stay 24/7 to protect the people," Keane said at a briefing this week. "That piece is what we have never been able to execute in Baghdad."

Although the manual is meant to apply generally to all fights against insurgency, it was clearly written with Iraq in mind. And at some points the introduction and first chapter of the new manual read like a plea for more time for the military to succeed in Iraq.

The new doctrine, which was begun in January and released in draft form in June, cautions that campaigns against insurgents are "often long and difficult" and that progress is hard to measure. Conventional militaries often stumble in the beginning of an insurgency but can succeed if they learn, adapt and push ahead against it, according to the manual.

"The military forces that successfully defeat insurgencies are usually those able to overcome their institutional inclination to wage conventional war against insurgents," the doctrine says.

If there is a theme for the manual, Crane said, it is that the military can adapt and correct its missteps. "That is the historical record: You learn as you go," he said.

Overall, the doctrine says, a counterinsurgency operation is "a struggle for the population's support." To win that confidence, militaries must learn about the culture and people they are trying to protect as well as fight the insurgents who are attempting to destabilize the country, it says.

Lt. Col. Lance A. McDaniel, one of the Marines who helped write the new doctrine, said he expected the manual to influence new strategies in Iraq, although he was not sure exactly what lessons would be embraced.

"I do not know how they will translate this to the field," he said. "But I do think this will be No. 1 on the reading list."

The manual, a public document, can be read at http://usacac.army.mil/cac/repository/materials/coin-fm3-24.pdf.

Options Weighed For Surge In G.I.'s To Stabilize Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger, Michael R. Gordon

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15 — Military planners and White House budget analysts have been asked to provide President Bush with options for increasing American forces in Iraq by 20,000 or more. The request indicates that the option of a major "surge" in troop strength is gaining ground as part of a White House strategy review, senior administration officials said Friday.

Discussion of increasing the number of American troops, at least temporarily, has coursed through Washington for two months, as a possible way to reverse the deteriorating security situation in Baghdad. But the decision to ask the Joint Chiefs of Staff to specify where the additional forces could be found among overstretched Army, Marine and National Guard units, and to seek a cost estimate from the White House Office of Management and Budget, signifies a turn in the debate.

Officials said that the options being considered included the deployment of upwards of 50,000 additional troops, but that the political, training and recruiting obstacles to an increase larger than 20,000 to 30,000 troops would be prohibitive.

At present, only about 17,000 American soldiers are actively involved in the effort to secure Baghdad, so even the low end of the proposals being considered by military and budget officials could more than double the size of that force. If adopted, such an increase would be a major departure from the current strategy advocated by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., which has stressed stepping up the training of Iraqi forces and handing off to them as soon as possible.

The details of the plan under study by the White House are not known, but in most scenarios the troop increase would be accomplished in large part by accelerating some scheduled deployments while delaying the departure of units in Iraq.

President Bush has made no final decision, the White House said. Gordon Johndroe, the National Security Council spokesman, said that no memorandums outlining the options for increasing troop strength had gone to the president. But one senior official said the subject was discussed at length on Wednesday during Mr. Bush's briefing at the Pentagon, and the president has reportedly asked detailed questions that some officials have interpreted as suggesting that he is strongly leaning in that direction.

American military officials said Friday night that the Pentagon was planning to send the Second Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division to Kuwait in January. The brigade, based at Fort Bragg, N.C., would serve as a reserve that commanders in Iraq could draw on.

American military commanders have been operating without such a reserve since the Marine unit that had been on call was dispatched to Anbar Province in western Iraq. The Army brigade could become an element of a larger troop deployment to Iraq if the White House decided to increase troops there.

That option has been central to a broader debate in Washington. Advocates of a troop increase say the aim would be to reverse the slide toward an all-out civil war and give the new Iraqi government more time to consolidate control, while training of Iraqis is stepped up.

At the same time, American and Iraqi forces would try to tamp down strife in neighborhoods that contain Shiites and Sunnis, and slow insurgent attacks. To be effective, proponents say, these tactics would need to be married to a broader political and economic strategy to generate employment in Baghdad and stabilize Iraq.

Critics of a surge approach have argued that any American troop increase would lead to more American casualties and merely put off the day when the Iraqis need to assume responsibility for their own security.

There is also concern that the military benefits would be short-lived unless the higher troop levels were sustained for a long period, adding to the strain on American forces. Alternatively, critics say, if the surge in troop levels was too brief, adversaries could simply wait for the reinforcements to leave.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said during a visit to Baghdad this week that American military commanders were discussing the possibility of adding as many as 10 more combat brigades — a maximum of about 35,000 troops — to establish some of control while Iraq's divided political leaders seek solutions to the mounting violence.

On Friday, however, one administration official said that additional work was needed to fit a troop increase into the larger strategy, as well as on technical aspects about how the operation would be carried out. "There has not been a full articulation of what we would want the surge to accomplish," he said.

Strikingly, the surge proposal has not been actively promoted by the top commander in Iraq. General Casey, the senior American commander in Baghdad, has emphasized faster training of Iraqi security forces, an effort that would be supported in part by converting existing combat forces into trainers.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East, has said that the advantages of a surge in troop levels would be temporary, and that it might dissuade Iraqis from doing more to provide for their own security.

Some of the chiefs of the services that would supply forces for the surge have spoken about it in hedged terms. "We would not surge without a purpose," Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, told reporters on Thursday. "And that purpose should be measurable."

But Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who is assuming day-to-day command of American troops in Iraq from Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, is said to be sympathetic to the idea.

The surge proposal has also gained greater support among recently retired officers who served in Iraq, particularly if carried out as part of a broader political and economic strategy.

Two retired Army veterans who served in the unit that took control of the northern Iraqi city of Tal Afar in 2005 — Col. Joel Armstrong and Maj. Daniel Dwyer — helped draft a new study issued Thursday by the American Enterprise Institute that called for sending an additional four or five combat brigades, or some 14,000 to 17,500 troops, to Baghdad.

The study determined that the military could sustain a surge of that level, but that it would require sending several Army brigades back to Iraq a couple of months early and extending the customary yearlong Army tour to 15 months.

In its report last week, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group rejected the idea of a “substantial” force increase on the order of 100,000 to 200,000 troops, saying that those levels were not “available for a sustained deployment” and would feed fears in Iraq that the United States was planning a long-term occupation.

“We could, however, support a short-term redeployment or surge of American combat forces to stabilize Baghdad,” the report added, “or to speed up the training and equipping mission, if the U.S. commander in Iraq determines that such steps would be effective.”

White House Studies Options For Increasing Troops In Iraq: Report (AFP)

AFP, December 16, 2006

Military planners and White House budget analysts have been asked to provide President George W. Bush with options for increasing American forces in Iraq by 20,000 troops or more, The New York Times has reported.

Citing unnamed senior administration officials, the newspaper said the request indicates that the option of a major "surge" in troop strength is gaining ground as part of a White House strategy review.

Discussion of increasing the number of American troops has gone on in Washington for two months as a possible way to reverse the deteriorating security situation in Baghdad, the report said.

But the decision to ask the Joint Chiefs of Staff to specify where the additional forces could be found signifies a turn in the debate, according to The Times.

Officials said that the options being considered included the deployment of upwards of 50,000 additional troops, but that the political, training and recruiting obstacles to an increase larger than 20,000 to 30,000 troops would be prohibitive, the paper said.

At present, only about 17,000 American soldiers are actively involved in the effort to secure Baghdad, so even the low end of the proposals being considered by military and budget officials could more than double the size of that force, according to the report.

If adopted, such an increase would be a major departure from the current strategy advocated by General George Casey, which has stressed stepping up the training of Iraqi forces and handing off to them as soon as possible, The Times said.

The details of the plan under study by the White House are not known, but in most scenarios the troop increase would be accomplished in large part by accelerating some scheduled deployments while delaying the departure of units in Iraq, the paper said.

US "Troop Boost In Iraq Likely" (BBC)

BBC.com, December 15, 2006

US President George W Bush is likely to boost troop levels in Iraq next year, an administration official has said.

Up to 25,000 more troops could be deployed to try to help end the violence, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The comments come a day after prominent Republican John McCain called for up to 30,000 more troops to be sent to Iraq.

Mr Bush had been due to announce a new strategy on Iraq next week, but has delayed his speech until January.

He is holding a flurry of meetings with top US and Iraqi officials and experts on how to change his policy.

In Iraq, the country's biggest humanitarian organisation has accused US troops of attacking its offices and vehicles.

The Iraqi Red Crescent's vice-president said attacks by US-led forces were the biggest problem it faced.

The US military said it was checking the allegations.

'Serious situation'

The US administration source said the mission of the additional troops would be threefold, the BBC's Adam Brookes reports from Washington:

To help secure Baghdad amid daily car bombings and kidnappings

To make a renewed push to quell the insurgency in the Western province of Anbar

To tackle the militias behind much of the sectarian violence in the country, but especially the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0107361

The remarks appear to be setting the tone for Mr Bush's announcement of his new Iraq strategy, our correspondent says.

He says the idea of boosting troop levels for one final push at halting the spiralling violence has been much discussed in Washington recently.

The comments came a day after Senator McCain called for more troops to stabilise Iraq.

"The situation is very, very serious," he said in Baghdad.

"It requires an injection of additional troops to control the situation and to allow the political process to proceed," he said.

There are currently 140,000 US troops in Iraq.

Military scepticism

Since a high-level review group published its findings last week, President Bush has been consulting with his military commanders and Iraqi political leaders to shape a new strategy.

President Bush has bid farewell to his outgoing defence secretary

Military commanders, however, have been expressing scepticism that extra troops on their own will have much effect, our correspondent says.

They say that stability in Iraq can now only be had by political means.

The Iraq Study Group, composed of top Democrat and Republican legislators and experts, said combat troops could be withdrawn from Iraq by early 2008.

They said the current US strategy of "staying the course" was no longer viable.

On Wednesday, Mr Bush said he would not be rushed into making "a difficult decision".

"I've heard some ideas that would lead to defeat. And I reject those ideas, ideas such as leaving before the job is done; ideas such as not helping this government take the necessary and hard steps to be able to do its job."

Pentagon To Move Troops Into Kuwait (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 16, 2006

The U.S. military is planning to move a brigade of troops into Kuwait in what could be the first step of a short-term surge of American forces into Iraq to stabilize the violence.

The 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division is expected in Kuwait shortly after the new year, a senior Defense Department official told The Associated Press on Friday. The official requested anonymity because the plans had not yet been announced.

The 2nd Brigade, made up of roughly 3,500 troops, is based at Fort Bragg, N.C., and would be deployed in Iraq early next year if needed, the official said. The move would be part of an effort to boost the number of U.S. troops in Iraq for a short time, the official said. The plan was first reported by CBS News.

In a half-hour video conference with President Bush on Friday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki outlined plans for the national reconciliation conference taking place in Baghdad on Saturday. Al-Maliki cited the desire of many people in Iraq for a larger core of Iraqi political leaders to come together for the common objective of stabilizing the country and promoting the rule of law, National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said in describing the conversation.

Al-Maliki also talked with Bush about providing greater security, in particular in Baghdad, by going after all sources of violence, including insurgents and militias, Johndroe said. Bush reiterated his support for al-Maliki and said he was encouraged by the meetings he had recently with Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi, and with the leader of the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim.

In assessing the state of the war in Iraq, Bush has been meeting this week with top generals and other advisers. The military options being considered include an increased effort to train and equip Iraqi forces.

Meanwhile, the commander of U.S. forces in the strife-ridden Iraqi province of Diyala said Friday that tribal leaders and some political groups in the province are turning to terrorists and insurgents for protection rather than trust Iraqi soldiers and police.

"This sort of unity only worsens the sectarian divide and encourages further violence," said Col. David Sutherland, commander of the 3rd Brigade, 1st Cavalry Division. He spoke to reporters at the Pentagon by a satellite video connection from his headquarters near the city of Baqouba, northeast of Baghdad.

"Public perceptions of corruption, inequity and fear are the driving force behind support to terrorist organizations," Sutherland added. "These are not new problems in Iraq but problems that developed out of a desire for personal and financial gain."

Sutherland said he is trying to turn that around by putting Iraqi police through more rigorous training, placing more U.S. advisers in the Iraqi army and police units and through Iraqi efforts to recruit a police and army force that better reflects the sectarian makeup of Diyala, which is about 55 percent Sunni, 30 percent Shiite and 15 percent Kurd.

Currently, the Iraqi security forces in Diyala are predominantly Shiite, he said.

Sutherland said he is working out arrangements to expand the use of U.S. adviser teams with Iraqi security forces, reflecting the view of senior U.S. commanders that such an expansion can speed the development of competent Iraqi forces.

The Army is considering ways it can speed up the creation of two additional combat brigades — a move intended to expand the pool of active-duty combat brigades in order to relieve some of the strain on the Army from large-scale deployments to Iraq.

Under the plan being developed, the new brigades could be formed next year and be ready to be sent to Iraq in 2008, defense officials told The Associated Press. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because the plans were not final.

The Army's chief of staff, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, told a commission Thursday that he wants to increase the half-million-member force beyond the 30,000 troops authorized in recent years. And he warned that the Army "will break" without thousands more active duty troops and greater use of the reserves.

3 More GIs Killed In Iraq This Week (AP)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 16, 2006

Three more U.S. troops died in fighting this week, the military said Friday, raising to 54 the number of Americans killed in Iraq in December — nearly half of them in Anbar.

The month is shaping up to be one of the deadliest for Americans since the war started, especially for those trying to tame the Sunni-led insurgency in the volatile province west of Baghdad.

At least 25 of the U.S. troops killed this month — most Marines — died in the vast stretch of desert that extends from the capital to the borders with Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia. Three U.S. aircraft also went down in a span of two weeks, starting with the crash of a fighter jet on Nov. 27.

The large number of casualties reflects the strength of Sunni insurgents, including al-Qaida in Iraq, in the region, even as violence in Baghdad shifts to a fight between Sunni and Shiite extremists.

It also comes despite a decision by some U.S. commanders in the area to pull troops out of combat missions and partner them with Iraqi army units as advisers and mentors.

With President Bush weighing strategy changes in the war, the U.S. Army's chief of staff, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, said Thursday that Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq, is considering shifting many troops from combat missions to training Iraqi units, among other options.

Two Marines died Thursday in fighting in Anbar province, the military said. In Ninevah province to the northwest, a soldier assigned to the 4th Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, was killed Tuesday, the military said.

At least 2,942 members of the U.S. military have died since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, meanwhile, issued his first public comment on a bipartisan U.S. report that said American policies in Iraq were failing and urged drastic changes.

"The report should have read the events more accurately and turned them into a good base for a solution. Instead, it contained contradictions in vision and recommendations," al-Maliki said in an interview on the pan-Arab satellite station Al-Arabiya.

He said the 96-page report contained "good elements" regarding the political process and Iraq's unity, but it also included "insults and negative directions" in regard to the Iraq conflict. He did not elaborate.

The prime minister's comments were the latest in a flurry of criticism by Iraqi leaders, who have said the recommendations in the Iraq Study Group report did not acknowledge realities in post-Saddam Hussein Iraq and infringed on the country's sovereignty.

The nonbinding report recommended direct engagement with Iran and Syria, approval of a law that could reinstate thousands of former officials of Saddam's Baath Party to their jobs and a pullback of most American combat brigades by early 2008.

Al-Maliki also said he planned a Cabinet reshuffle but cautioned that he would carefully scrutinize candidates for ministerial posts and warned that he won't accept candidates nominated by his coalition partners if he found them to be unqualified.

"I am not obliged to accept anyone and I will choose ministers myself if I have to," he said.

The warning came as the Shiite prime minister's "national unity" government is facing growing dissent by coalition partners, including Shiite allies like Muqtada al-Sadr, rival politicians seeking to sideline the anti-American cleric and Sunni Arab politicians.

Iraqi Interior Minister Jawad al-Boulani, meanwhile, arrived in Syria on Friday for talks on setting up joint security patrols along the two countries' border, a crossing point for militants seeking to join the insurgency in Iraq.

The two countries recently resumed diplomatic relations after a 24-year rupture.

Both the U.S. and Iraq have accused Syria of failing to take sufficient steps to stop militants from crossing the border to join insurgents fighting U.S.-led forces and Iraqi troops. Syria has repeatedly denied the charge, saying it cannot completely seal its border with Iraq.

In Iraq's western Anbar province, which borders Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, two suicide car bombs exploded Friday at U.S. checkpoints in the provincial capital of Ramadi and American soldiers opened fire to foil one of the attacks, an Iraqi police lieutenant said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was concerned for his safety. He said four Iraqi civilians were killed.

The U.S. military said it had no reports of suicide car bombings in Ramadi.

At least 34 people were killed or found dead Friday, including 22 bullet-riddled bodies discovered in several parts of the capital, apparent victims of sectarian death squads that have killed hundreds in recent months.

Gunmen also killed a Shiite tribal sheik linked to British forces in a drive-by shooting Friday in the southern city of Basra.

The slain cleric, Muhsin al-Kanan, was a member of the provisional council in Iraq's second-largest city, 340 miles southeast of Baghdad, and had good relations with British forces in the area, police said.

Britain has about 7,200 troops in southern Iraq, mostly in and around Basra, and Shiite factions and militias have been fighting for control of the area as they begin to withdraw from some of the provinces in the region. Attacks by insurgents from Iraq's Sunni Arab minority also have occurred in the area.

A senior official from the Iraqi Red Crescent, meanwhile, claimed that harassment from U.S. forces is a greater threat to his group's work than insurgent attacks.

"The main problem we are facing is the American forces more than the other forces," Dr. Jamal al-Karbouli, vice president of the Iraqi Red Crescent, said in Geneva.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, said the U.S.-led coalition forces "strive to ensure they are respectful when they conduct interaction with the local population."

The Curtain Is Drawn On The Rumsfeld Era (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

DOJ_NMG_0107364

After a parade of military regalia and a 19-gun salute that echoed across the Potomac, Donald H. Rumsfeld stepped down yesterday as secretary of defense, delivering a warning to those who contemplate "graceful exits from the agonies and . . . ugliness of combat."

Surrounded on the Pentagon mall by the architects of the Iraq war -- from President Bush and Vice President Cheney to former deputy defense secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz and former undersecretary of defense Douglas J. Feith -- Rumsfeld ended his six years in office with a forceful, even defiant, tone. "Our country has taken on a bracing and difficult task. But let there be no doubt: It is neither hopeless nor without purpose," he said.

Still, his voice grew deep and cracked as he concluded that, upon leaving, "I will remember the fallen." And asked by a reporter what his greatest regret was, Rumsfeld replied it was that the Iraq and Afghanistan wars have not ended more swiftly. "It's taken longer than people had anticipated, it's more difficult," he said in an interview yesterday on Fox News.

But even as Rumsfeld issued the last of his infamous and prolific memos known as "snowflakes," inside the Pentagon officials were preparing for what some called a new era of opportunity -- even glasnost -- created by his departure.

"There's Old Europe, and then there's New Europe," one senior Pentagon official quipped -- paraphrasing one of Rumsfeld's more notorious remarks to describe the hope for change under the incoming defense secretary, former CIA director Robert M. Gates, who is to be sworn in on Monday.

Above all, Rumsfeld's resignation -- which came a day after Republicans lost control of Congress on Nov. 7 in elections widely viewed as a referendum on the Iraq war -- opens the door for a more candid assessment of the Pentagon's mistakes in Iraq and for alternative military strategies, said the officials, who were not authorized to speak on the record.

Rumsfeld had "pretty rocky relations with the Congress," said one senior military official, so with Gates's arrival "there is an opportunity for relations with Congress to change."

Army officials hope that Gates will be more receptive to their initiatives to increase the Army's manpower, budget and access to the Army National Guard and Army Reserve. "Rumsfeld came into office with the idea that the Army needed to be smaller. Do you think that idea has changed?" asked another senior military official.

Army officials are still bitter over Rumsfeld's public repudiation of Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, then the Army chief of staff, who predicted in early 2003 that it would require several hundred thousand U.S. troops to effectively stabilize Iraq. Rumsfeld later declined to attend Shinseki's retirement ceremony in June 2003, when Shinseki issued a warning clearly directed at the Pentagon leader: "Beware the 12-division strategy for a 10-division Army," he said.

Yesterday, at least one official cited the perceived snub to Shinseki as the reason for not attending Rumsfeld's farewell.

Still, other officers cautioned that because Gates will be surrounded by the same advisers and administration officials that Rumsfeld was, the change may well be less dramatic than anticipated.

Indeed, at yesterday's ceremony, Bush, Cheney and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, were effusive in their praise of Rumsfeld and his service.

Pace lauded Rumsfeld's courage, compassion and particularly his willingness to accept the blame for misdeeds by subordinates. "Secretary Rumsfeld accepted the responsibility and not once, in public or in private, did I ever hear this man try to shift responsibility to anyone else but himself," Pace said.

Cheney hailed Rumsfeld as his best boss, best friend, an "ideal" public servant and "the finest secretary of defense this nation has ever had."

For his part, Bush portrayed Rumsfeld as a comrade in arms. "Don Rumsfeld has been at my side from the moment I took office. We've been through war together," Bush said.

"We walked amid the rubble of the broken Pentagon the day after September the 11th, 2001. He was with me when we planned the liberation of Afghanistan. We were in the Oval Office together the day I gave the order to remove Saddam Hussein from power," he said.

"In these and countless other moments, I have seen Don Rumsfeld's character and his integrity. He has always ensured I had the best possible advice. . . . He spoke straight. It was easy to understand him."

Rumsfeld, taking the podium as the sun broke through a heavy December sky, chose to focus his remarks not on his six-year tenure but on the future. "Weakness is provocative," he warned, drawing similarities between the threat of extremist groups today and the Cold War threats the nation faced when he ended his previous stint in the top Pentagon job in 1977.

"America's enemies should not confuse the American people's distaste of war -- which is real and which is understandable -- with a reluctance to defend our way of life," said Rumsfeld, who drew prolonged applause at the end of his speech.

Known both for his impatient, demanding managerial style and for his quick wit, Rumsfeld yesterday dispatched the last of thousands of "snowflakes" or memos -- his favored method for issuing questions and instructions.

"The blizzard is over!" he said in the memo addressed to Pentagon personnel. "Thank you for all you do for our wonderful country. Well done!"

He granted "a general amnesty for any outstanding snowflakes."

In Farewell, Rumsfeld Warns Weakness Is "Provocative" (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15 — Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld bade farewell to the Pentagon on Friday with a combative valedictory speech in which he warned against hoping for "graceful exits" from Iraq and said it would be wrong to regard the lack of new attacks on American soil as a sign that the nation is safe from terrorism.

"Today, it should be clear that not only is weakness provocative," Mr. Rumsfeld said, standing at a lectern with President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney at his side, "but the perception of weakness on our part can be provocative as well."

It was a clear parting shot at those considering a withdrawal from war that would define his legacy and perhaps that of the president.

"A conclusion by our enemies that the United States lacks the will or the resolve to carry out missions that demand sacrifice and demand patience is every bit as dangerous as an imbalance of conventional military power," Mr. Rumsfeld said in a buoyant but sometimes emotional speech.

Mr. Rumsfeld resigned in November after an election in which Democrats won control of Congress by promising to force change in Iraq. His successor, Robert M. Gates, takes over on Monday.

Mr. Rumsfeld spoke after receiving full honors on the Pentagon grounds on his last day of work there. The ceremonies began with a 19-gun salute before he walked the grounds to inspect the representatives from all the service branches gathered in formation and in full dress.

Present in the crowd were some of the former administration hawks with whom he planned the invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq: Paul D. Wolfowitz, his former deputy, and Douglas J. Feith, his under secretary for defense policy. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, his frequent rival in Mr. Bush's cabinet, did not attend.

The ceremony brought to a close perhaps the most controversial tenure for a secretary of defense since that of Robert McNamara, whose record tenure in the job bested Mr. Rumsfeld's by a mere 10 days. Like Mr. McNamara, Mr. Rumsfeld leaves a war he helped conceive in the hands of others.

And like Mr. McNamara, his record is likely to be dissected and debated for years after his resignation.

Yet for all of its pomp, there was little talk at the ceremony about Mr. Rumsfeld's famously combative style or the controversies he tended to provoke.

In opening remarks, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, did refer indirectly to the Abu Ghraib torture scandal, which Mr. Rumsfeld has called the low mark of his tenure. But General Pace did so in complimenting Mr. Rumsfeld for ultimately taking the blame for prisoner abuses for which the general placed blame on others down the chain of command.

Mr. Cheney's declaration that "Don Rumsfeld is the finest secretary of defense the nation has ever had," was more in keeping with the tone of the event.

With Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation — forced by Mr. Bush as he seeks a new approach in Iraq — Mr. Cheney is losing one of his closest allies in the administration.

DOJ_NMG_0107366

Mr. Rumsfeld hired Mr. Cheney to work in the Ford administration. Both men served as White House chief of staff, in the House of Representatives and as secretary of defense. (Mr. Rumsfeld has been secretary of defense twice, the first time for President Ford.)

And their shared post-Sept. 11 conviction that the United States must use strength as a deterrent and pre-emptively strike at those who plan to attack the nation has remained unbowed in the face of setbacks in Iraq.

"In this hour of transition every member of our military, and every person at the Pentagon, can be certain that America will stay on the offensive," Mr. Cheney said. "We will stay in the fight until this threat is defeated and our children and grandchildren can live in a safer world."

Mr. Rumsfeld leaves the Pentagon having overseen two wars, an attack on the Pentagon itself and what he called a "transformation" in the use of force. That involved a switch to smaller fighting units that he said would be nimbler and more effective than larger ones favored in the past — an approach that saw early success in Afghanistan but has faced a more severe test in Iraq.

Mr. Bush was known to have appreciated Mr. Rumsfeld's efforts, even as calls for the defense secretary's resignation grew louder, and he indicated as much on Friday. "There has been more profound change at the Department of Defense over the past six years than at any time since the department's creation in the late 1940s," Mr. Bush said. "These changes were not easy, but because of Don Rumsfeld's determination and leadership, America has the best equipped, the best trained, and most experienced armed forces in the history of the world."

Mr. Rumsfeld had the last words of the day, using them to warn against backing down in Iraq. "This is a time of great consequence," he said. "It may well be comforting to some to consider graceful exits from the agonies and, indeed, the ugliness of combat. But the enemy thinks differently."

Chief Judge On Saddam Panel Steps Down (AP)

The chief investigator on the 10-judge panel that sentenced Saddam Hussein to death said Saturday that he has relinquished that role, allowing another judge to take over the post for the Iraqi High Tribunal.

Raid Juhi said he will remain as a judge and spokesman on the tribunal, which handles the proceedings against the ousted dictator and other former regime members.

Juhi has been a high-profile figure in the trials against Saddam, who was sentenced to death for the killing of 148 Shiites in Dujail, north of Baghdad, after a 1982 assassination attempt there against the ousted leader. Two other senior members of Saddam's regime were also sentenced to death in the Nov. 5 ruling by the tribunal.

Juhi said he was replaced during annual elections held by tribunal members because he did not run for re-election to his post as main investigator.

"Somebody else was chosen," he said. Juhi declined to identify his replacement because of security concerns.

On Friday, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said he hoped it would only be a matter of days before an appeals court rules on Saddam's death sentence. Defense lawyers filed an appeal Dec. 3. Iraqi law states that if a death sentence is upheld, it must be carried out within 30 days.

Saddam is being tried separately on charges of genocide linked to a military campaign in the 1980s against Iraq's minority Kurds in which tens of thousands of people are thought to have been killed.

Civilian Deaths Hit Afghan Support For Nato (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee

Financial Times, December 16, 2006

Rising anger at the growing number of civilians being caught in the crossfire between Nato troops and Taliban insurgents is creating concern that support for Nato in southern Afghanistan is being severely undermined.

It came as British-led Nato armoured columns swept into the southern province of Kandahar on Friday, launching one of the biggest operations for months.

DOJ_NMG_0107367

The issue of civilian casualties topped the agenda at a meeting of Nato and US generals, ambassadors and Afghan ministers that was convened in Kandahar this week by Hamid Karzai, Afghanistan's president, to look at ways of stemming the bloodshed.

Tuesday's meeting came three days after Mr Karzai wept openly on national television about his helplessness to protect the Afghan people from US, Nato or Taliban violence.

"We can't prevent the terrorists from coming from Pakistan, and we can't prevent the coalition from bombing the terrorists, and our children are dying because of that," Mr Karzai said in a speech marking International Human Rights Day.

Almost 4,000 people have died since the beginning of the year in a resurgent Taliban insurgency, most of them in the four southern provinces of the country.

The US-based Human Rights Watch organisation estimates that more than 1,000 of the dead were civilians.

"Nato's strategy has eroded support for its mission as well as for Karzai – nothing could be more telling than Karzai weeping and complaining about Nato killing Afghan civilians," said Sam Zia Zarifi, Asia research director at Human Rights Watch.

The US air force has dropped more bombs on Afghanistan in the past six months than in the first three years of its campaign against the Taliban, according to figures released by the Pentagon.

Some 987 bombs were dropped between June and November and 146,000 cannon rounds were fired by US aircraft in support of Nato allies in the south.

Stoking public anger further has been a recent surge of suicide bombings in southern Afghanistan, which has led Nato troops to react more quickly to defend themselves.

"We are extremely worried – it hurts us, it hurts Afghan civilians. We are worried by it, Nato is also worried by it, and we are working together to reduce such casualties," Mr Karzai told reporters.

Nato spokesman Mark Laity said the organisation was looking at ways to curb civilian casualties as a matter of urgency. "We know that it is damaging to our image, and more important we do not want to harm innocent people," he said.

Tribal elders said two recent incidents in Kandahar where civilians were shot by Nato troops have left local people jittery and angry.

Afghanistan: 2 More Suicide Attacks (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

A suicide attacker's car exploded close to a joint NATO-Afghan convoy in eastern Paktia Province, killing an Afghan soldier and a civilian and wounding a NATO soldier. In neighboring Paktika Province an hour later, a man dressed in a burqa blew himself up and wounded two Afghan soldiers and a civilian. Muhammad Akram Khapalwak, the governor, said the man was a Pakistani.

DOJ:

26 Bosnian Serbs Arrested In U.S. (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

A Justice Department dragnet based on war crimes probes in Europe led to 26 arrests in the past week of Bosnian Serbs who had obtained refugee status in the United States by allegedly concealing their service in the Bosnian Serb military during the bitter Yugoslav conflict of the mid-1990s.

The arrests occurred in at least eight cities, including Denver and Orlando. They reflect an intensified effort by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) to root out unacknowledged members of the Bosnian Serb military using data supplied by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, located in The Hague.

A former U.S. Army intelligence analyst who worked at The Hague from 1997 to 2001, Richard J. Butler, helped instigate the U.S. effort when he prodded the agency to compare immigration records with lists of Bosnian soldiers in units linked to the 1995 massacre of 8,000 Muslims in the town of Srebrenica. The killings are considered the worst European war crime of the past 50 years.

Butler was a key witness at the trials of Bosnian Serb officers involved in the massacre before the Hague tribunal, where he spent three years reconstructing events at Srebrenica from seized military documents, combat reports, photos, videotapes, witness testimony and transcripts of intercepted radio communications. He now works at the immigration office in Atlanta.

In 2004, U.S. officials said, immigration agents in Massachusetts were investigating Marko Boskic, a Bosnian Croat who served in a Serb military unit at Srebrenica, when Butler offered them a list of soldiers attached to other units deployed in or near the Bosnian town.

That list has since become fodder for a nationwide investigation overseen by the immigration office's Human Rights Violators and Public Safety Unit in Washington. Boskic has been convicted of immigration fraud.

Those targeted are a small fraction of the more than 200,000 refugees who came to the United States from the former Yugoslavia during the 1990s, mostly because of the Bosnian conflict. Previous immigration roundups related to Srebrenica, in September 2005 and in June, netted 20 Bosnian Serbs in Phoenix and four Bosnian Serbs in Salt Lake City. Like those arrested in the past week, they were charged with visa fraud, perjury or making false statements.

Some of those recently arrested have been criminally charged and face prison terms, while others have been put into administrative proceedings that could lead to deportation. Most have families or jobs here. After deportation to Bosnia, which is now independent and governed by an ethnic coalition, they could face further investigation, detention and prosecution by the country's indigenous war crimes chamber.

Only a few of those arrested here are accused by the Justice Department of directly taking part in the Srebrenica killings, but all allegedly were in units that did.

A government affidavit filed before the recent arrest of Nedjo Ikonic in Greenfield, Wis., for example, alleges that he commanded a police company that oversaw the evacuation of Bosnian Muslims from Srebrenica as part of the planned massacre. It cites a report written by Butler, witness statements and a police roster recovered by Hague investigators from a headquarters building in Bosnia.

No one answered the telephone at Ikonic's residence yesterday.

Julie L. Myers, assistant secretary of homeland security for ICE, said in a statement that her office "will not allow the United States to be a safe haven for those who failed to disclose their service in military forces that were known to commit atrocities."

An ICE official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said additional investigations are underway of Bosnian Serb, Croat and Muslim immigrants linked to atrocities but declined to provide details.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Small Firms Get Sarbanes-Oxley Extension (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission yesterday gave the smallest public companies five more months to comply with financial-control rules under the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

It was the fourth such delay granted by the SEC to companies with market value of less than $75 million. The decision came two days after the five-member SEC tentatively adopted a plan to give corporate managers at all public companies more flexibility in assessing the strength of internal financial controls. That change would especially benefit smaller companies.

Sarbanes-Oxley requires companies to assess the strength of their internal safeguards to ensure that their financial statements are accurate. Companies have complained that the rules are burdensome and costly, especially for smaller businesses.

Under the latest extension, the smallest companies will have to report on their controls in annual reports for fiscal years ending on or after Dec. 15, 2007. The previous deadline was for fiscal years ending on or after July 15.

The SEC also gave all companies that have recently become public a transition period before they must comply with the financial-control rules.

Regulators Ease Post-Scandal Rules (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, December 16, 2006

The Week's Business: Justice Dept., SEC Actions Backpedal a Bit on Post-Scandal Rules

WASHINGTON (AP) -- They were two early Christmas gifts for corporate America -- with potentially far-reaching effects for investors and the financial landscape.

At the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission, separate actions this week both had the effect of easing landmark rules laid down in response to the 2002 crisis of corporate malfeasance.

Culminating an intense monthslong lobbying campaign by an array of companies, the five SEC commissioners voted at a public meeting Wednesday to propose a plan giving corporate managers more flexibility in assessing the strength of internal financial controls. It would especially benefit smaller companies.

The sweeping antifraud law known as Sarbanes-Oxley was enacted in 2002 amid the wave of scandals that engulfed Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and other big corporations. The law contains a key section requiring public companies to assess the strength of their internal safeguards to ensure that their financial statements are accurate. Companies have complained to the SEC that those rules are overly burdensome and costly, especially for smaller businesses.

The Justice Department, meanwhile, restricted its prosecutors' ability to crack down on companies that withhold confidential information during criminal fraud investigations, in new guidelines issued Tuesday that clipped back the aggressive legal tactics authorized after the scandals. They bar the government from seeking harsher penalties for companies that won't cooperate with prosecutors -- either by denying the prosecutors corporate attorney-client communications or by helping their employees under investigation by covering their legal fees.

"The real issue is how do you get the balance right?" said Joel Seligman, the president of the University of Rochester and an expert on securities law. The new policy may be closer to striking a balance between the need to prosecute corporate crime and the "unequivocal" right of defendants to litigate, he suggested.

The policy "is going to set the tone," Seligman said.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, who wrote the new guidelines, said they won't hinder prosecutors from vigorously pursuing companies accused of fraud and other white-collar crimes. But critics, including a group representing whistle-blowers, called the changes a setback for shareholders and employees who risk losing billions if scandal-tainted corporations aren't fully prosecuted. They accused the Justice Department of caving in to pressure from business interests.

The actions by both the Justice Department, which carries out the Bush administration's policies, and the independent regulator SEC may eliminate the need for Congress to act in similar veins. Some business-friendly Democrats who are assuming power positions in January have expressed support for Sarbanes-Oxley relief for companies -- and their preference for the SEC to wield its regulatory scalpel as opposed to Congress' heavier hand of legislation.

The SEC move was a "reasonable approach" in light of the disproportionate burden of the financial-control rules on small companies, said James Cox, a professor at Duke University who also is a securities-law specialist.

Still, he said, with more leeway under the SEC plan -- allowing, for example, less stringent testing of internal controls for some companies, "Those (financial) numbers are going to be less trustworthy than they would be otherwise. ... Investor protection's going to suffer."

SEC officials insisted that would not happen. Agency Chairman Christopher Cox called the new plan "making Sarbanes-Oxley work for investors at the right price."

McNulty said the new prosecutorial policy should help companies curb fraud internally by encouraging open talk between corporate attorneys and their clients. "It, in no way, slows down the ability to prosecute these cases successfully," he told The Associated Press.

The actions of both agencies follow a report issued last month by an influential private-sector group, the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, that has been part of the business push for a softening of the laws and rules that flowed from the 2002 scandals. That campaign has gained traction with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson questioning recently whether regulations are hurting the competitiveness of U.S. financial markets by driving some companies away from them.

Among the committee's recommendations: easing of the financial-control rules under Sarbanes-Oxley and tightening the legal standard the government must meet to charge companies with crimes. The group also urged reducing the liability of auditors in shareholder lawsuits over accounting fraud and a shift to a financial regulatory system based on principles rather than rules.

Another group, formed by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, will release its own report early next year. The Chamber has been waging a legal assault against what it views as excessive regulation since 2002, suing the SEC over rules and scoring several victories in high courts.

"Business is putting a big push on in the final years of the Bush administration," said Duke University's Cox.

A Verdict On Sarbanes-Oxley: Unconstitutional (WSJ)

By Kenneth W. Starr

The Wall Street Journal, December 16, 2006

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act powerfully illustrates the law of unintended consequences. Due to hasty drafting by Congress in the wake of the Enron and WorldCom scandals, Sarbox has cost the U.S. economy over $1 trillion, according to one study published by the AEI-Brookings Center. To add insult to grievous injury, it is unconstitutional.

That last point will be argued next Thursday before Judge James Robertson of the district court for the District of Columbia. The plaintiffs in Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board -- a free-market advocacy organization based in Washington, D.C., and a Nevada accounting firm, Beckstead and Watts, that audits smaller public companies -- challenge the method by which the members of the all-powerful Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB) are appointed; the Board's ability to perform executive branch functions such as regulation of public company activities in the securities markets; and the delegation of legislative powers to an independent organization.

First, plaintiffs claim that Sarbox violates the constitutional requirement that power to enforce federal law be vested in the president or in executive branch officials answerable to the president.

Because the Board exercises important governmental powers, its members are "officers of the United States," who must be appointed in the manner set forth in the "appointments clause" of the Constitution (Article Two, Section Two) -- that is, by the president and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Congress instead drafted the statute to insulate the Board's wide-ranging exercise of executive and administrative powers from presidential oversight or control. By granting to the SEC, rather than the president, power to appoint Board members -- Sarbox violates the appointments clause.

Second, Congress gave the Board disturbingly broad powers with only minimal oversight. The PCAOB has wide-ranging executive and administrative powers. These include setting standards regulating accounting firms and exercising disciplinary power over them. The Board is also immune from any effective control by the president or any head of an executive-branch department -- the chairman of the SEC cannot remove PCAOB members at will.

Third, Sarbox confers impermissible legislative authority on the Board. The PCAOB can finance its own operations; it can levy fees on all public companies and even set its own salaries. But Congress cannot delegate its own legislative power: this is a basic violation of our bedrock system of separation of powers.

Responding to these arguments, the government says that because the Board is under the "broad and pervasive oversight" of the SEC, this cures any constitutional defects. Not so.

The claim of oversight flies in the face of flinty reality. The SEC's control is theoretical, not actual; it does not set PCAOB member salaries and cannot remove members at will. When acting within the broad range of its current discretionary powers, the PCAOB makes executive-branch policy judgments (how strictly to enforce a particular auditing standard, how onerous inspections ought to be, etc.) that are essentially unreviewable by the president and his subordinates. Courts are in no position to second-guess these policy judgments, either. They merely review to see whether a Board decision, or more precisely, an SEC decision to affirm a Board decision, is within the Board's statutory discretion. This very deferential standard of review is completely insufficient to ensure, as the Constitution's separation of powers requires, that the PCAOB is subject to the proper political checks and balances.

On the appointments clause, the government argues that Board members are "inferior officers" of the government operating under SEC oversight. (Everyone agrees that if Board members are principal officers their appointments violate the appointments clause.) There are peculiarities in the government's case. The salary structure of the PCAOB is unprecedented within the executive branch -- Board members are "inferior officers" of the executive branch who just happen to make more than the head of the executive branch?

It would also be very strange for "inferior officers" to have the authority to impose taxes. Higher ranking officials such as the assistant secretaries of the Treasury or the Interior have no such power; can one imagine a Treasury official inventing a new tax or imposing a new fee without explicit authority to do so? That is simply not our system. It is therefore much more logical to understand the Board's creation as an unconstitutional delegation of legislative powers.

In short, the government's theory seems to be: "Why worry? There are no real problems here. If there are, the SEC can take care of them." But our constitutional system is not structured that way. Unelected commissions should not have the power to regulate, tax, and even punish companies and individuals. It is now up to the federal courts to regulate these boundaries. The government has argued for a dismissal on jurisdictional grounds, but Judge Robertson agreed with the plaintiffs that the constitutional issues should be resolved first.

Despite legitimate public outrage over corporate scandals, good intentions provide no immunity from an unconstitutional scheme. In the war on terror, Congress recently responded to the Supreme Court's decision in the Guantanamo case (Hamdan v. Rumsfeld) and resolved the question of military tribunals for suspected terrorists by acting within the proper constitutional framework. All this lawsuit asks is that Congress do the same thing for the PCAOB.

Even the statute's co-author, Rep. Mike Oxley, has conceded that Sarbanes-Oxley was hastily written and enacted. In its rush to "do something" about corporate scandals, Congress overstepped the bounds of its authority. It is time to call Congress back, both to help our economy and reaffirm that our constitutional system imposes clear limits on the government's urgent desire to "do something." Congress must be reminded that the "solution" is at times worse than the problem.

Closer Look At Corporate Pay (AP)

By Marcy Gordon

AP, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Investors are getting access to clearer and more detailed information from public companies on their top executives' pay packages and perks under federal rules that took effect on Friday.

Companies' 2006 annual reports issued early next year will reflect the changes, which were ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission in July in a major overhaul of disclosure rules for executive compensation.

The new requirements include disclosure of the dating of stock option grants to executives. Companies must provide detailed information on how they determine when executives receive option grants and, if they do so, how and why they backdate options. Suspect timing of option grants has turned into corporate America's scandal of the year, with more than 100 companies under investigation by the SEC or the Justice Department, more than $5 billion in profit erased by restatements and 18 CEOs swept out of office.

An academic study completed this fall found that corporate executives gained an average of $600,000 a year each from backdating of stock options between 2000 and 2004. By contrast, shareholders were hurt by an average loss in market value of 8 percent, or $500 million, for each affected company from the negative publicity of being under government investigation, the researchers at the University of Michigan found.

When stock options are backdated, they are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price — fattening profit for options recipients when they sell their shares at higher market prices.

Backdating options can be legal as long as the practice is disclosed properly to investors and approved by the company's board. In some cases, however, the practice can run afoul of federal accounting and tax laws.

For the first time, under the new disclosure rules, companies are required to furnish tables in annual filings showing the total yearly compensation for their chief executive officers, chief financial officers and the next three highest-paid executives. Most of the disclosures, in annual reports and other regulatory filings, must be written in plain English.

The rules were designed to enhance corporate accountability and address an issue that has angered company shareholders and the public: lavish compensation for executives, unrelated to their performance, even as companies stumble and lay off employees.

In the SEC's 72-year history, no other issue has stirred as much interest, with more than 20,000 letters filed during the public comment period that followed the proposal being floated last January, according to agency officials.

The SEC removed from its original proposal, though, a requirement for companies to disclose the pay details of as many as three non-executive employees whose individual compensation exceeds that of any of their top five executives.

Judge's Rebuke Prompts New Rules For Prosecutors (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

It was a ruling that sent shudders through the Justice Department.

Judge Lewis A. Kaplan of the Federal District Court in Manhattan in June issued a scathing criticism of the prosecution's tactics in a criminal case against former tax professionals of the accounting firm KPMG. The government, the judge said, "let its zeal get in the way of its judgment."

For one, the judge cited the prosecutors' pledge earlier in the case that they would examine "under a microscope" whether KPMG was paying the legal fees of the defendants. KPMG ultimately refused to pay the defendants' legal expenses, he wrote "because the government held the proverbial gun to its head."

While the judge's comments were stinging, it was the comments by the federal prosecutors that prompted some serious soul-searching within the Justice Department in Washington. "It's just not necessary" to use that kind of language, a top Justice official told a defense lawyer at the time.

Months later, those private discussions have now produced new guidelines, known as the McNulty memorandum. Under them, a company's decision to pay legal fees will not be held against it, except in extreme circumstances, when prosecutors are weighing whether to indict the company. The new guidelines also raise new hurdles for prosecutors seeking access to confidential legal communications.

A decisive moment that led to the new guidelines came a few days after Thanksgiving, in a conference room in the Justice Department's main building. In a meeting lasting several hours before a fireplace, the deputy attorney general, Paul J. McNulty, discussed the proposed changes with one of his predecessors, George J. Terwilliger III, who was deputy attorney general under the first President Bush.

Mr. Terwilliger, a friend of Mr. McNulty's, had recently had first-hand experience with the guideline criticized in the KPMG case that gave companies under investigation a black mark if they advance legal fees to their employees caught up in the investigation.

The draft passage that Mr. McNulty showed Mr. Terwilliger proposed a slight shift: that prosecutors would have to use several tests to determine whether companies that paid the legal fees were hindering investigators.

In an interview this week, Mr. Terwilliger said he had told Mr. McNulty: "Rather than try to establish a list of all-inclusive criteria about the circumstances where it would be appropriate or not to pay counsel fees, why not have a bottom-line standard saying it's appropriate to do so except in extremely limited circumstances?"

Mr. Terwilliger cited the recent case of Schnitzer Steel Industries, an Oregon scrap steel company that averted a possible indictment over bribes paid to Asian steel concerns and instead reached a deferred-prosecution agreement with the Justice Department in October.

Mr. Terwilliger, who represented Schnitzer Steel, noted that prosecutors did not object to the company's payment of legal fees to employees caught up in the inquiry. He cited an internal Justice document that called the payments "a positive" for the criminal inquiry because employees would speak to Justice investigators only if they had proper legal counsel, paid by the company.

Mr. Terwilliger was one of several former senior Justice officials from past Republican administrations whom Mr. McNulty consulted. Two former attorneys general, Edwin Meese III and Richard L. Thornburgh, both urged a thorough revision of the old guidelines. But Mr. McNulty, himself a former prosecutor in Pennsylvania, said in an interview this week that he considered the advice of Mr. Terwilliger "especially significant."

Mary Beth Buchanan, a Pennsylvania federal prosecutor, said Mr. McNulty "had been listening to the concerns of the corporate counsel bar and defense bar for some time."

Those lawyers had also been telling Mr. McNulty that the old guidelines had made companies less likely to root out fraud internally because executives were afraid to talk to in-house lawyers, for fear of having their communications obtained coercively by prosecutors.

The process of redrafting the guidelines picked up speed after a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on the proposal. After that hearing, Mr. McNulty "realized that there was a perception problem out there" that the old guidelines were abusive, a senior Justice Department official said.

The first draft revision of what would become the McNulty memorandum appeared shortly after that, according to the senior Justice official.

But that was just the beginning; there would be no fewer than 10 drafts before the final memo.

The second sticking point, after the legal fees issues, concerned how to address the problem of prosecutors asking for confidential legal communications, or information protected by attorney-client privilege. One solution suggested creating multiple categories of legal information for which prosecutors could ask companies to waive privilege.

But the decisive view came from the attorney general's advisory committee, an internal Justice department body composed of senior prosecutors around the country. It proposed an unusual solution: set up a two-tiered system separating more-sensitive legal information from less-sensitive legal information, and make it harder for prosecutors to go after the former.

Karin J. Immergut, the Oregon federal prosecutor who heads the committee's white collar crime sub-committee that was reviewing the drafts, said, "The approach set forth is one that the vast majority of prosecutors were already using around the country, but there is additional guidance and additional accountability, to address the concerns."

More wrangling was still to come. Officials in the Justice Department's criminal division and senior federal prosecutors, who "don't want anyone in Washington messing with their toolbox," according to the senior Justice official, argued over whether waiver requests would have to be authorized by the local United States attorney supervising the investigation, by a midlevel official in the main Justice Department, or by Mr. McNulty himself.

Last week, in the days before the final draft was issued, Mr. McNulty continued to consult with Mr. Terwilliger, in one instance spending over an hour with him on the telephone "talking back and forth trying to make up his mind" about who should be required to approve the waiver requests, among other issues, according to the senior Justice official.

The final version, which was announced on Tuesday, gave Mr. McNulty the power to authorize waiver requests.

Democrats' Consumer Crusade (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Incoming Democratic leaders say they intend to bolster privacy rights and a spate of consumer protections in the next Congress. But early signs suggest activists in this arena may want to temper their enthusiasm.

Besides aiming to raise the minimum wage and make health care and college more affordable, Democrats poised to assume key committee chairmanships say they want to strengthen privacy protections, combat identity theft and curb abusive practices in mortgage lending and other financial services.

This represents a big shift for consumer groups, which frequently found themselves on the losing side of legislative battles during a dozen years of mostly Republican control of Capitol Hill. "People are excited about the opportunities," said Ed Mierzwinski, consumer-program director at U.S. PIRG, a federation of advocacy groups.

But he says actually passing legislation, even in a Congress controlled by Democrats, could be difficult. "It takes scandals piled upon scandals to get a consumer bill," he says.

During the past two years, virtually every lawmaker has seized on the issue of privacy protection amid revelations that Social Security numbers and other sensitive data belonging to tens of millions of people were exposed at businesses, schools and government agencies. Bills designed to safeguard data and guard against identity fraud proliferated, but got bogged down in territorial spats among the banking, commerce and judiciary committees.

Democratic leaders said recently that things will be different next year. Massachusetts Rep. Barney Frank, incoming chairman of the House Financial Services committee, is moving to form an identity-theft task force that would iron out differences among committees before competing bills emerge. "We should start working together beforehand," Mr. Frank said in a recent speech. "When each committee does its own thing and then you get to the end, egos have engaged and it's harder to reconcile."

Federal action wouldn't guarantee a big win for consumer groups, though, particularly if a new nationwide law undercuts stronger protections at the state level. For example, most states require businesses to notify consumers when personal information is compromised -- so as to warn people that they may be at risk of identity theft. Similarly, roughly half the states give consumers the right to "freeze" their credit report so potential fraudsters can't open new lines of credit in their name.

Mr. Frank said Congress should give all consumers the right to lock their credit files, and he doesn't want to pre-empt state laws in this area. "That is a shift from the Republican leadership," and would be a victory for consumers, said Travis Plunkett, legislative director at the Consumer Federation of America.

Mr. Frank said that he also would give businesses and institutions some leeway to decide whether breaches are serious enough to warrant consumer notice, and that he would pre-empt state laws on this subject. He said businesses should have to inform consumers only of breaches that pose a risk of sensitive data falling into the wrong hands, and that in fairness companies should be subject to a uniform rule.

Such action would be a big loss for privacy advocates, who abhor the idea of undercutting state laws or allowing a business that failed to prevent a data breach to decide whether to tell people about it.

The urgency of these issues was brought home this week when the University of California at Los Angeles said hackers had infiltrated a database containing the Social Security numbers and other personal data of 800,000 people. Separately, Department of Homeland Security officials arrested several hundred meat-processing plant workers in a raid aimed at breaking a connection between identity theft and illegal immigration.

Aside from the privacy push, Democrats say they would move to enhance consumer protections in the financial-services industry. One goal is to curb "predatory" mortgages, which are often unnecessary second-mortgage loans packed with hidden fees and issued with little regard to the borrower's ability to repay. Mr. Frank shares this priority with others, including Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, the incoming chairman of the Senate Banking committee.

Consumer groups are also urging Congress to improve protections for subprime, or particularly risky, mortgage borrowers. These calls are likely to gather steam as the housing-market slump deepens. A recent report from UBS AG analysts found that, in October, borrowers were at least 60 days delinquent on 3.9% of subprime home loans that had been packaged into mortgage securities this year, nearly twice the rate of a year earlier. With more and more mortgages packaged and sold as securities -- which spreads the risk -- consumer groups could find this priority seconded by Wall Street.

One of the more heated debates is expected to follow a pending Supreme Court decision. The court heard arguments this fall on whether federal banking regulators have gone too far in exempting state-chartered subsidiaries of national banks from state consumer-protection laws. If it rules in favor of regulators, Mr. Frank said, he will "be putting pressure" on them to "recreate consumer protections at the federal level that they've wiped out at the state level."

Still, Mr. Frank has gone out of his way recently to emphasize his bipartisan intentions. He has said he wants to "incentivize" the market to come up with consumer protections, and predicts there will be little difference between Democratic and Republican rule when it comes to regulation of the financial-services industry. Mr. Plunkett of the Consumer Federation of America agreed: "There's not going to be a hard turn to the left."

That means consumer groups may have to get creative, just as they did when they scored a little-noticed goal in September. Avoiding the usual committee track, the Center for Responsible Lending, an advocacy group that targets misleading bank tactics, helped secure passage of a measure designed to curb practices directed at military personnel. The law, which places a 36% cap on interest rates and fees charged on loans to military personnel, was shuffled through the Senate Armed Services committee rather than the usual Banking or Commerce committees.

Advocates say they would like to see usury caps and fee limitations, as well as bans on mandatory arbitration, applied more broadly. Some think they may have an ally in Mr. Dodd, who has pledged to thoroughly examine the impact of credit-card practices and other forms of debt on consumers. But most activists believe that could be tougher sledding. Incremental change, such as new rules on how fees and terms must be disclosed in credit agreements, they say, is a more realistic goal.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Lethal Injection Is On Hold In 2 States (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey, Sonya Geis

MIAMI, Dec. 15 -- Executions by lethal injection were suspended in Florida and ordered revamped in California on Friday, as the chemical method once billed as a more humane way of killing the condemned came under mounting scrutiny over the pain it may cause.

Gov. Jeb Bush (R) ordered the suspension in Florida after a botched execution in which it took 34 minutes and a second injection to kill convicted murderer Angel Nieves Diaz. A state medical examiner said that needles used to carry the poison had passed through the prisoner's veins and delivered the three-chemical mix into the tissues of his arm.

In California, a federal judge ruled that the state must overhaul its lethal-injection procedures, calling its current protocol unconstitutional because it may inflict unacceptable levels of pain.

Judge Jeremy D. Fogel of the U.S. District Court for Northern California ordered the state to revise its procedures and consider eliminating the use of two drugs: pancuronium bromide, which causes paralysis, and potassium chloride, which causes cardiac arrest.

The judge did not order executions halted, though they have been effectively on hold since February while he conducted a review.

The "pervasive lack of professionalism" in the executions, Fogel wrote, "at the least is very disturbing."

More than 30 states, including Virginia and Maryland, use the same three-drug sequence for lethal injections. Groups opposed to the death penalty have had increasing success arguing that the pain the cocktail inflicts is unconstitutional "cruel and unusual punishment."

"This demonstrates that there is no happy and kind and nice way to execute someone," said David Elliot, a spokesman for the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty. "Execution is a messy business."

But in Florida and California, advocates for the death penalty were quick to argue that only the technical specifics of the method are in dispute and that when the procedures are changed, the injections can begin again.

"Essentially what Judge Fogel's order today does is lay out a map for the Department of Corrections to follow in order to have a constitutionally sound lethal-injection protocol," said Nathan Barankin of the California attorney general's office.

Bush appointed a commission to review lethal-injection procedures in Florida "to ensure the method is consistent with the Eighth Amendment and its prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment," the governor said in a statement Friday.

But Bush said he saw no reason to stop using lethal injection. "All the people that are against the death penalty whenever there's a chance will call for suspending the death penalty," he said. "Each and every time that another appeal takes place, a family member of the person who was brutally murdered suffers again. So I think there needs to be sympathy for them as well."

The decisions in California and Florida on Friday come amid rising debate in other states.

In Maryland, a federal judge is considering the constitutionality of lethal injection. A ruling is expected next year. Officials in Missouri and South Dakota have delayed executions while lethal injection is reviewed. Oklahoma altered its procedure so that the prisoner receives more anesthesia before being executed. And in North Carolina, a federal judge ordered that a brain monitor be used to make sure an inmate is unconscious before the final drug is administered.

In June, the U.S. Supreme Court allowed another Florida death-row inmate to challenge that state's lethal-injection procedures through a federal civil rights lawsuit, a ruling considered a procedural victory for opponents of the death penalty.

Richard C. Dieter of the Death Penalty Information Center, a nonprofit group critical of capital punishment, pointed out that although the California ruling does not end the death penalty there, it "may be influential."

"What it may mean is the Supreme Court will have to step in and decide," Dieter said.

Diaz's death took more than twice as long as most executions in Florida, where death generally occurs within 15 minutes. More than 20 minutes after the first injection, Diaz appeared to be mouthing words, clenching his jaw and grimacing. A second dose was administered.

Diaz was executed for murdering the manager of a Miami topless bar in 1979.

The halt to executions in Florida could end as soon as March 1, when the commission assigned to study lethal-injection procedures is expected to file a final report.

In the California case, attorneys for condemned murderer Michael A. Morales had argued that because inmates are paralyzed by the drugs, witnesses cannot be sure the convicts are unconscious when they are executed -- meaning they may be in terrible pain. The court agreed in February and ordered corrections officials to either stop using the two drugs or provide doctors to ensure Morales was unconscious.

Two anesthesiologists agreed to observe, and Morales's execution was underway when, in a last-minute decision, the doctors backed out after an appeals court ruled they would have to step in if anything went wrong.

Since then, Fogel has held extensive hearings on how executions are conducted.

He ultimately found that executioners were not properly trained and made mistakes in administering the drugs and that California's execution chamber is poorly suited to its purpose.

The state's "implementation of lethal injection is broken, but it can be fixed," Fogel wrote.

Ruling Halts State Method Of Execution (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, December 16, 2006

A federal judge in San Jose ruled Friday that California's application of its lethal injection death penalty procedure violates the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

The state's system "is broken, but it can be fixed," U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel said in a 17-page ruling that makes it unlikely that any death sentences will be carried out in California in the near future. The high-profile case had effectively halted executions since February, but Fogel's ruling left the door open for the resumption of executions by lethal injection if the state comes up with a revised procedure the judge finds constitutionally acceptable.

Fogel's ruling came the same day that Florida Gov. Jeb Bush declared a halt to executions there in the aftermath of a botched lethal injection this week.

The two actions were the latest development in what is now the central legal issue in the long-running battle over capital punishment in the United States: whether lethal injections are being administered in a humane, constitutional manner. Challenges to lethal injections have resulted in stays of execution in states around the country, and Friday's developments will probably spur more challenges, legal experts said.

California's current lethal injection procedure, like that in three dozen other states, calls for a three-drug cocktail. The first drug, sodium thiopental, is a fast-acting barbiturate that is supposed to render the condemned inmate unconscious before the second two drugs — pancuronium bromide, which paralyzes the body, and potassium chloride, which causes cardiac arrest — are administered.

Fogel acted in response to a suit filed by lawyers for condemned inmate Michael Morales, who has been on death row for more than 20 years for the brutal slaying of Lodi teenager Terri Winchell. The thrust of Morales' suit is that the state does not properly administer enough sodium thiopental to ensure that the inmate does not feel excessive pain when the potassium chloride is administered.

Fogel, who visited the death chamber in San Quentin and held a four-day hearing in San Jose in September, said the case generated evidence that "is more than adequate to establish a constitutional violation."

His decision was replete with stinging criticisms of state officials for failing to take the necessary steps to correct problems in the procedure — steps the judge urged them to take in February.

"Given that the state is taking a human life, the pervasive lack of professionalism in the implementation" of the lethal injection protocol is "at the very least deeply disturbing," Fogel wrote.

Morales' execution was scheduled for February, but the state postponed it after being unable to meet conditions imposed by the judge, who became concerned that the procedure was not working correctly.

"As this court noted" in its February order, "anomalies in six execution logs raise substantial questions as to whether certain inmates may have been conscious when pancuronium bromide or potassium chloride was injected," Fogel wrote. "These substantial questions remain unanswered."

Fogel emphasized that Dr. Robert C. Singler, the state's medical expert, said that another condemned inmate, Robert Lee Massie, "well may have been awake when he was injected with potassium chloride" during his March 27, 2001, execution. Singler testified that he could not render a definitive opinion because of the poor quality of the execution logs. He also testified that it would be "unconscionable" to inject a conscious person with the amount of potassium chloride prescribed by the protocol.

The threshold issue in the case, Fogel said, is whether the procedure, as implemented, "provides constitutionally adequate assurance that condemned inmates will be unconscious when they are injected" with the second and third drugs.

He said "the evidence shows that the protocol" and the state's implementation of it "suffer from a number of critical deficiencies."

Among those he cited are:

• Inconsistent and unreliable screening of execution team members. The judge noted that a prison guard led the execution team despite the fact that he was diagnosed with and disabled by post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of his prison experiences, and found working on the execution to be the most stressful responsibility a prison employee could have.

• A lack of meaningful training, supervision and oversight of the execution team. The judge noted that team members "almost uniformly have no knowledge of the nature or properties of the drugs that are used or the risks or potential problems associated with the procedure."

• Inconsistent and unreliable recordkeeping. The judge said there were "no contemporaneous records showing that all of the sodium thiopental in the syringes used for injections actually was injected, and in fact, testimony revealed that in at least several executions it was not."

Fogel also said there was "an extremely troubling absence of reliable documentation as to the disposition of sodium thiopental taken from the prison pharmacy by execution team members." He said that other testimony revealed that the drug, an addictive, controlled substance, was not used in training exercises. Consequently, he said, "these circumstances may warrant an investigation by an appropriate law enforcement agency."

• Improper mixing, preparation and mixing of sodium thiopental by the execution team.

• Inadequate lighting, overcrowded conditions and poorly designed facilities in which the execution team must work.

In his ruling Friday, Fogel urged Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "to take this opportunity to address seriously now, rather than later, the significant problems" with the state's lethal injection protocol and its implementation.

"Part of the problem," the judge said, "may be that the prison officials responsible for implementation of the protocol see their legal obligations too narrowly."

He said that former San Quentin Warden Steven Ornoski testified that "he believes a 'successful execution' is simply one where 'the inmate ends up dead at the end of the process.' "

Fogel strongly suggested that the state might want to consider switching to a one-drug procedure, using a heavier dose of a barbiturate such as sodium pentobarbital.

On the particularly thorny issue of whether there must be participation by a doctor, the judge awarded the state a victory.

"Because an execution is not a medical procedure, and its purpose is not to keep the inmate alive but rather to end the inmate's life, the court agrees" with the state that "the Constitution does not necessarily require the attendance and participation of a medical professional," Fogel wrote.

Fogel gave California officials 30 days to tell him whether they intend to review and revise the state's procedure, and, if so, how much additional time they believe they will need to complete the task.

Andrea Lynn Hoch, the governor's legal affairs secretary, said the administration will review state procedures "to make certain the protocol and its implementation are constitutional."

"Judge Fogel's decision is bold and incisive," said Fordham University law professor Deborah Denno, an expert on methods of punishment. "It is the most comprehensive decision in the country to determine that a state's lethal injection protocol, in its current form, is intolerable and unconstitutional under the 8th Amendment."

Morales' attorneys said they were pleased with the decision. "Judge Fogel has ordered the state to do what we have asserted they should do since the beginning of this litigation — undertake a considered, searching review of their procedures," said Ginger Anders, an attorney in Washington, D.C.

The ruling was hailed by groups opposed to capital punishment, including the Campaign to End the Death Penalty, Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, and Death Penalty Focus of California, whose spokeswoman, Stefanie Faucher said: "It is time for California to stop tinkering with the machinery of death and recognize that the death penalty is a failed public policy which drains valuable resources away from programs that actually increase public safety and serve the needs of victims."

Attorney Kent Scheidegger, of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, a pro-capital punishment group in Sacramento, said it was "unfortunate that there will be further delay in this already grossly overdue execution."

He also said California ought to analyze whether lethal injection "was the right way to go in the first place" and perhaps consider bringing back the gas chamber, using carbon monoxide rather than cyanide.

Fogel acknowledged that any legal proceeding about the death penalty is a "powerful magnet," likely to generate impassioned debate about a highly divisive issue. But he cautioned that "this case is not about whether the death penalty makes sense morally or as a matter of policy." Nor, he said, is it about whether lethal injection is constitutional. Rather, it is about the specific way that California implements its procedure, and in that regard, he said, the state clearly fell short.

Executions Halted In 2 States After Botched Injection (AP)

OCALA, Florida (AP) -- Gov. Jeb Bush suspended executions in Florida after a medical examiner said Friday that prison officials botched the insertion of the needles when a convicted killer was put to death earlier this week.

Separately, a federal judge in California imposed a moratorium on executions in the nation's most populous state, declaring that the state's method of lethal injection runs the risk of violating the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel ruled in San Jose that California's "implementation of lethal injection is broken." But he said: "It can be fixed."

Fogel said the case raised the question of whether a three-drug cocktail administered by the San Quentin State Prison is so painful that it "offends" the Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

Fogel said he was compelled "to answer that question in the affirmative."

California has been under a capital punishment moratorium since February, when Fogel called off the execution of rapist and murderer Michael Morales amid concerns that condemned inmates might suffer excruciating deaths.

Fogel found substantial evidence that the last six men executed at San Quentin might have been conscious and still breathing when lethal drugs were administered.

He ordered anesthesiologists to be on hand, or demanded that a licensed medical professional inject a large, fatal dose of a sedative instead of the additional paralyzing agent and heart-stopping drugs that are normally used. But no medical professional was willing to participate.

In Florida, medical examiner Dr. William Hamilton said Wednesday's execution of Angel Nieves Diaz took 34 minutes -- twice as long as usual -- and required a rare second dose of lethal chemicals because the needles were inserted clear through his veins and into the flesh in his arms. The chemicals are supposed to go into the veins. (Watch officials explain why it took 2 injections and 34 minutes)

Hamilton, who performed the autopsy, refused to say whether he thought Diaz died a painful death.

"I am going to defer answers about pain and suffering until the autopsy is complete," he said. He said the results were preliminary and other tests may take several weeks.

Missing a vein when administering the injections would cause "both psychological and physical discomfort -- probably pretty severe," said Dr. J. Kent Garman, an emeritus professor of anesthesia at the Stanford School of Medicine in California.

"All the drugs would be much slower to affect the body because they're not going into a blood vessel. They're going under the skin. They take a long time to be absorbed by the body," said Garman, said he was ethically opposed to lethal injection.

An inmate would remain conscious for a longer period of time and would likely be aware of increased difficulty breathing and pain caused by angina, the interruption of blood flow to the heart, he said.

Jonathan Groner, associate professor of surgery at Ohio State University, said the injection would cause excruciating pain "like your arms are on fire."

Bush created a commission to examine the state's lethal injection process in light of Diaz's case, and he halted the signing of any more death warrants until the panel completes its final report by March 1.

The governor said he wants to ensure the process does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, as some death penalty foes argued bitterly after Diaz's execution. Florida has 374 people on death row; it has carried out four executions this year.Medical findings contradict prison officials

Diaz, 55, was put to death for murdering the manager of a Miami topless bar during a holdup in 1979.

The medical examiner's findings contradicted the explanation given by prison officials, who said Diaz needed the second dose because liver disease caused him to metabolize the lethal drugs more slowly. Hamilton said that although there were records that Diaz had hepatitis, his liver appeared normal.

Executions in Florida normally take no more than about 15 minutes, with the inmate rendered unconscious and motionless within three to five minutes. But Diaz appeared to be moving 24 minutes after the first injection, grimacing, blinking, licking his lips, blowing and appearing to mouth words.

As a result of the chemicals going into Diaz's arms around the elbow, he had a 12-inch chemical burn on his right arm and an 11-inch chemical burn on his left arm, Hamilton said.

Florida Corrections Secretary James McDonough said the execution team did not see any swelling of the arms, which would have been an indication that the chemicals were going into tissues and not veins.

Diaz's attorney, Suzanne Myers Keffler, reacted angrily to the findings.

"This is complete negligence on the part of the state," she said. "When he was still moving after the first shot of chemicals, they should have known there was a problem and they shouldn't have continued. This shows a complete disregard for Mr. Diaz. This is disgusting." (Watch Keffer describe Diaz "suffering in pain" -- 2:42)

Earlier, in a court hearing in Ocala, she had won an assurance from the attorney general's office that she could have access to all findings and evidence from the autopsy. She withdrew a request for an independent autopsy.

David Elliot, spokesman for the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, said experts his group had contacted suspected that liver disease was not the explanation for the problem.

"Florida has certainly deservedly earned a reputation for being a state that conducts botched executions, whether its electrocution or lethal injection," Elliot said. "We just think the Florida death penalty system is broken from start to finish."

Florida got rid of the electric chair after two inmates' heads caught fire during executions in the 1990s and another suffered a severe nosebleed in 2000. Lethal injection was portrayed as a more humane and more reliable process.

Florida Governor Suspends The Death Penalty (NYT)

By Adam Liptak, Terry Aguayo

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

Gov. Jeb Bush yesterday suspended all executions in Florida, citing a troubled execution on Wednesday and appointing a commission to consider the humanity and constitutionality of lethal injections.

Hours later, a federal judge ruled that the lethal injection system in California violated the constitutional prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment.

"Today has been the most significant day in the history of the death penalty in America in many years," said Jamie Fellner, director of United States programs for Human Rights Watch. "These developments show that the current lethal-injection protocols pose an unacceptable risk of cruelty.

"The way states have been killing people for the last 30 years has yielded botched execution after botched execution."

California has the largest death row in the nation, at about 650. The state has executed 13 people since the United States Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976.

Florida, by contrast, has executed 64 people in the modern era of the death penalty, trailing four states.

The California decision, which followed a four-day evidentiary hearing and a session at the San Quentin prison, was eagerly awaited and probably represents the fullest and most careful consideration yet of whether the way inmates are executed violates the Eight Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

Judge Jeremy Fogel of Federal District Court in San Jose delivered a mixed verdict, writing, "Defendants' implementation of lethal injection is broken, but it can be fixed."

The new commission in Florida, which will include doctors, lawyers, scientists and law enforcement officials, will consider many of the same issues, including whether the state protocol satisfies "humanity, constitutional imperative and common sense," Mr. Bush said in his order.

Deborah W. Denno, an authority on execution at the Fordham University Law School, said Judge Fogel's decision was "both bold and safe."

"Judge Fogel's decision is the most definitive response so far in concluding that a state's lethal injection protocol, in its current form, is unconstitutional under the Eighth Amendment," Professor Denno said.

Even as Judge Fogel issued a withering critique of the way California executes condemned inmates, he invited the state to submit a revised protocol to remedy the shortcomings. Similarly, Mr. Bush suggested that executions in Florida might resume after his panel gives its final report in March.

Judge Fogel found that prison execution teams had been poorly screened and had included people disciplined for smuggling drugs and with post-traumatic stress disorder. Moreover, the team members are poorly trained and supervised, he said.

Record keeping is spotty, the judge found, and the chemicals used are sometimes improperly prepared. The death chamber, he added, is badly lighted and overcrowded.

"Defendants' actions and failures to act have resulted in an undue and unnecessary risk of an Eighth Amendment violation," Judge Fogel wrote. "This is intolerable under the Constitution."

Judge Fogel also noted concerns about the chemicals that California, Florida and 35 other states use. The protocols vary slightly, but almost all call for a series of three chemicals. The first is a barbiturate to render the inmate unconscious. The second is a paralyzing agent that makes the inmate unable to speak, move or breathe. The third is potassium chloride, which stops the heart.

Both sides in California agreed that it would be unconstitutional to inject a conscious person with either or both of the second two chemicals. The paralyzing agent would leave the inmate conscious while he suffocated, and potassium chloride is extremely painful.

The two sides also agreed that if the first drug was effective, using the others did not violate the constitution.

Judge Fogel suggested a way out. Were inmates executed in the same way that animals were euthanized, solely by an anesthetic, that would, he wrote, “eliminate any constitutional concerns, subject only to the implementation of adequate, verifiable procedures to ensure that the inmate actually receives a fatal dose of the anesthetic.”

Kent Scheidegger, the legal director of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, which supports the death penalty, said the decision was in that sense a welcome one.

“It’s unfortunate that we have another delay,” Mr. Scheidegger said. “But it does appear that there is at least one path to a constitutional procedure.”

Florida started its moratorium two days after Angel N. Diaz’s execution appeared to go awry. Dr. William Hamilton, medical examiner in Alachua County, Fla., said yesterday that the needle with the lethal chemicals that should have gone directly into Mr. Diaz’s veins punctured the veins before entering soft tissue. It took a second dose and 34 minutes for him to die.

Bungled Execution Forces Delays (WT)

The Washington Times, December 16, 2006

Gov. Jeb Bush suspended all executions in Florida after a medical examiner said yesterday that prison officials botched the insertion of the needles when a convicted killer was put to death earlier this week.

Separately, a federal judge in California extended a moratorium on executions in the state, declaring that its method of lethal injection runs the risk of violating the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

In Florida, medical examiner Dr. William Hamilton said Wednesday's execution of Angel Nieves Diaz took 34 minutes — twice as long as usual — and required a rare second dose of lethal chemicals because the needles were inserted clear through his veins and into the flesh in his arms. The chemicals are supposed to go into the veins.

Dr. Hamilton, who performed the autopsy, refused to say whether he thought Diaz died a painful death.

"I am going to defer answers about pain and suffering until the autopsy is complete," he said, adding that the results were preliminary and other tests might take several weeks.

Diaz, 55, was put to death for murdering the manager of a Miami topless bar during a holdup in 1979.

Mr. Bush created a commission to examine the state's lethal-injection process in light of Diaz's case, and he halted the signing of any more death warrants until the panel completes its final report by March 1.

The governor said he wants to ensure the process does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, as some death penalty foes argued after Diaz's execution. Florida has 374 persons on death row; it has carried out four executions this year.

Gov.-elect Charlie Crist planned to continue the moratorium when he takes office in January, spokeswoman Vivian Myrtetus said.

Meanwhile, U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel ruled in San Jose that California's "implementation of lethal injection is broken, but it can be fixed."

Judge Fogel said the lawsuit brought by convicted murderer and rapist Michael Morales raised the question of whether a three-drug cocktail administered by the San Quentin State Prison is so painful that it "offends" the Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

The judge said he was compelled "to answer that question in the affirmative."

California has been under a capital punishment moratorium since February, when Judge Fogel called off Morales' execution amid concerns that condemned inmates might suffer excruciating deaths.

Morales, 47, of Stockton, raped and fatally beat a 17-year-old Lodi girl 25 years ago.

Judge Fogel found substantial evidence that the last six men executed at San Quentin might have been conscious when lethal drugs were administered.

He ordered anesthesiologists to be on hand, or demanded that a licensed medical professional inject a large, fatal dose of a sedative instead of the additional paralyzing agent and heart-stopping drugs that are normally used. But no medical professional was willing to participate.

Attorneys for Morales said in a lawsuit that he might appear unconscious after being injected with a sedative, but internally he would suffer excruciating pain, "burning veins and heart failure," once the paralyzing and the death drugs were administered.

In Florida, the medical examiner's findings yesterday contradicted the explanation given by prison officials, who said Diaz needed the second dose because liver disease caused him to metabolize the lethal drugs more slowly. Dr. Hamilton said that although there were records that Diaz had hepatitis, his liver appeared normal.

Executions in Florida normally take no more than about 15 minutes, with the inmate rendered unconscious and motionless within three to five minutes. But Diaz appeared to be moving 24 minutes after the first injection, grimacing, blinking, licking his lips, blowing and appearing to mouth words.

As a result of the chemicals going into Diaz's arms around the elbow, he had an 12-inch chemical burn on his right arm and an 11-inch chemical burn on his left arm, Dr. Hamilton said.

Florida Corrections Secretary James McDonough said the execution team did not see any swelling of the arms, which would have been an indication that the chemicals were going into tissues and not veins.

Diaz's attorney, Suzanne Myers Keffler, reacted angrily to the findings.

"This is complete negligence on the part of the state," she said. "When he was still moving after the first shot of chemicals, they should have known there was a problem and they shouldn't have continued. This shows a complete disregard for Mr. Diaz. This is disgusting."

David Elliot, spokesman for the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, said specialists his group contacted had suspected that liver disease was not the explanation for the problem.

"Florida has certainly deservedly earned a reputation for being a state that conducts botched executions, whether it's electrocution or lethal injection," Mr. Elliot said. "We just think the Florida death penalty system is broken from start to finish."

The U.S. Supreme Court has upheld executions — by hanging, firing squad, electric chair and gas chamber — despite the pain they might cause, but has left unsettled the issue of whether the pain is unconstitutionally excessive.

Judge Decries State's Lethal Injections, Seeks Change (SFC)

By Bob Egelko

San Francisco Chronicle, December 16, 2006

Lethal injections in California are conducted so haphazardly, by poorly trained staff in chaotic conditions, that they could cause slow and agonizing death, a federal judge said Friday in threatening to declare the state's method of capital punishment unconstitutional.

But U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel, who put all executions in California on hold earlier this year, said the problems could be corrected. He gave state officials 30 days to decide whether they will revise lethal-injection procedures and to say how long they would need. Officials said they would take steps to comply.

Fogel's ruling prolongs the stay of execution he issued in February for Michael Morales of Stockton, who was convicted of raping and fatally beating 17-year-old Terri Winchell near Lodi in 1981. That stay and a moratorium on other executions will remain in effect well into 2007 while officials try to make changes to satisfy the judge.

The lethal-injection procedures used at San Quentin State Prison since 1996 pose "an undue and unnecessary risk of an Eighth Amendment violation," Fogel said, referring to the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

Fogel said he would declare the state's lethal-injection system unconstitutional if it is not changed. But he stressed that he was condemning neither capital punishment nor lethal injection itself, which is the exclusive or preferred method of execution in all of the 38 death-penalty states except Nebraska, which uses the electric chair.

"The use of lethal injection in executions represents an evolution from earlier methods such as hanging, electrocution and lethal gas that now are viewed by most jurisdictions as unduly harsh," Fogel said. He observed that, when properly administered, lethal injection "results in a death that is far kinder than that suffered by the victims of capital crimes."

The state's "implementation of lethal injection is broken, but it can be fixed," Fogel said.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's office indicated that the state would try to do so.

"As the ruling provides, the administration will review the lethal injection protocol to make certain the protocol and its implementation are constitutional," Schwarzenegger's legal affairs secretary, Andrea Hoch, said in a statement.

Fogel's ruling could have national ramifications at a time when other states are facing challenges to their lethal injection procedures.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush suspended death warrants in his state Friday at least until March 1 while a state commission reviews what went wrong with a lethal injection this week. Prison staffers failed to insert needles properly into the veins of condemned murderer Angel Nieves Diaz, who was later given a second dose of lethal chemicals and took 34 minutes to die.

A federal judge in Missouri ordered a halt to executions there in October unless the state improves monitoring and supervision of its procedures; state officials have appealed the ruling. A Kentucky judge ruled last month that the state had not adopted its execution procedures properly.

Fogel's ruling followed four days of testimony by execution witnesses and medical experts in his San Jose court in September, the first such hearing in the nation. The judge also visited San Quentin in March and inspected the execution chamber and apparatus.

California and virtually every other state with lethal injections use a sequence of three drugs: the sedative sodium pentothal, to cause unconsciousness; the paralytic pancuronium bromide, to halt breathing; and potassium chloride, to stop the heart.

Fogel said records in seven of California's lethal injection executions indicated that the prisoners might have been conscious, despite the initial dose of sodium pentothal, when the other two drugs were injected.

Medical experts told the judge that pancuronium bromide, in a conscious person, would cause a smothering sensation while leaving the prisoner unable to cry out or move, and potassium chloride would cause excruciating, burning pain.

Fogel said that "the systematic flaws in the implementation of the procedure make it impossible to determine with any degree of certainty" whether executed inmates were unconscious just before death, or whether the state's anesthesia procedures would guarantee that inmates in future executions would not suffer.

Fogel initially ordered the state to have a doctor present to monitor Morales' level of consciousness during his scheduled execution in February, and he issued his stay after officials were unable to find any physicians willing to participate.

But the judge said Friday that a doctor did not have to be present because other methods are available to monitor consciousness. That was an important conclusion because professional associations have decreed that any participation by doctors in executions is unethical.

After Fogel's February order, California prison officials changed their procedures to include a continuous flow of sodium pentothal in one of the prisoner's arms to keep him unconscious while the second and third drugs are injected in the other arm.

In Friday's ruling, Fogel said the three-drug sequence, when properly administered, would provide for "a constitutionally adequate level of anesthesia" and that executing an inmate with a lethal dose of sodium pentothal also would be constitutional.

But he said the state's current procedures suffer from "a number of critical deficiencies."

Members of the execution team are not properly screened, he said. Fogel noted that one former execution team leader once had been disciplined for smuggling illegal drugs into the prison, and another leader previously had been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder.

Execution team members "almost uniformly have no knowledge" about the drugs they are injecting or the problems that might arise, the judge said. He said team members' "admitted failure to follow the simple directions provided by the manufacturer" of sodium pentothal made it difficult to determine whether prisoners were properly anesthetized.

Dim lighting, overcrowded conditions and poorly designed facilities also interfere with monitoring of the execution, Fogel said. He said execution team members can't hear any sounds from the sealed execution chamber and can't see the inmate well enough to determine whether he is conscious.

All those flaws "appear to be correctable," the judge said.

Fogel was appointed to the federal bench by President Bill Clinton in 1998 after 17 years as a Santa Clara County judge. He is generally regarded as liberal in philosophy but moderate in his judicial approach.

DOJ_NMG_0107384

Friday's ruling was "very cautious, very restrained, very much in keeping with Fogel's style," said Santa Clara University Law Professor Gerald Uelmen. He said the state is likely to find a solution much more quickly with the leeway provided in Friday's ruling than if Fogel had simply declared the procedures unconstitutional and invited an appeal.

Bill Hing, a UC Davis law professor, said Fogel's ruling was bound to be noticed nationwide.

"If it's going to be done, he's insisting on a method that is more efficient," Hing said. "I believe the states are going to recognize that they've got to figure out a better way to do this."

Stefanie Foucher, program director of the anti-capital punishment group Death Penalty Focus in San Francisco, said Fogel's ruling was an important but incomplete statement.

"The judge admitted that implementation of lethal injection is broken," she said. "We would take that even farther and say the entire death penalty system in California is broken. We don't believe it is making the public any safer."

Barbara Christian, the mother of Winchell, Morales' victim, hopes the state complies with Fogel's order so Morales can be executed as soon as possible, said Gloria Allred, a lawyer for Christian.

"It's been a terrible ordeal for 26 years," Allred said. "That's longer than Terri lived on the face of this earth."

Florida Suspends Executions After Trouble Injecting Inmate (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

MIAMI — Florida Gov. Jeb Bush on Friday suspended executions until at least March while investigators examine why it took more than half an hour for a lethal injection to kill a convicted murderer.

Angel Nieves Diaz, 55, appeared to grimace in pain and struggle for breath during the Wednesday night execution until a second dose of the fatal drugs was administered, according to witnesses.

The execution at Florida State Prison in Starke took 34 minutes, three times longer than usual. That probably was because the injection was made into soft tissue on the prisoner's arm, missing a vein that would have carried the killing agents more swiftly to his vital organs.

Death penalty critics said the execution, which they described as "botched," was clear evidence that the lethal-injection process constituted cruel and unusual punishment.

Diaz, a Puerto Rican convicted of killing the manager of a topless bar in 1979, had challenged the constitutionality of lethal injection in his last legal appeal, which was not taken up by the U.S. Supreme Court.

In his eight years as governor, Bush has signed 39 death warrants; 21 executions have been conducted on his watch. He has denied all death-row appeals for clemency or a commuted sentence to life imprisonment.

Gov. Anibal Acevedo Vila of Puerto Rico, which abolished capital punishment in 1929, had appealed to Bush to convert Diaz's sentence.

Bush said he would not sign death warrants or allow executions until a probe of the Diaz case is complete. He asked for a report from investigators by March 1.

Bush leaves office in two weeks, but his successor, Charlie Crist, campaigned on promises of continuity with the popular, two-term governor's policies and values.

Suspension of one of the country's most active execution chambers was announced after preliminary autopsy results showed the first chemical injection had missed the vein.

In a conference call with journalists, Medical Examiner William Hamilton declined to say whether Diaz suffered intense pain as a result of the misapplied first dose. He confirmed, however, that the convict's body had a 12-inch chemical burn on the right arm and an 11-inch burn on the left arm.

The first drug of the series is an anesthetic and the second induces paralysis. The third causes cardiac arrest. Media representatives who witnessed the execution gave detailed accounts of the prisoner writhing, grimacing and struggling for breath for 20 minutes.

Mark Elliott of Floridians for Alternatives to the Death Penalty said said the Diaz case showed the need for a moratorium on executions and a thorough review of the state's criminal justice system, which he said was "broken from top to bottom."

Florida has 375 inmates on death row. Three juveniles were removed last year after the Supreme Court ruled that execution of minors was unconstitutional.

Florida has executed 64 convicts since the death penalty was reinstated in 1979, initially by electric chair.

The state switched from electrocution to lethal injection in 2000 after two incidents in the '90s in which flames burst from prisoners' heads in a chair dubbed by executioners as "Old Sparky."

Florida Governor Halts Executions (BBC)

BBC.com, December 16, 2006

Florida Governor Jeb Bush has halted executions in the US state after an inmate took twice as long to die by lethal injection.

Mr Bush said he needed to be sure that the method of death did not constitute "cruel and unusual punishment".

The move came after a man convicted of murder, Angel Diaz, took 34 minutes to die and was given a second lethal dose.

In California, a judge has ruled death by lethal injection violates a state ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

The judge ruled California's "implementation of lethal injection is broken", but said "it can be fixed".

Lethal injection is the preferred method of execution in 37 US states.

Mr Bush has appointed a panel to look into the practice and evaluate whether it breaches the state's ban as an unnecessarily cruel mode of death, as argued by opponents of the death penalty.

He has said no more death warrants will be signed until the commission completes its final report in March.

The move came after the drawn-out death by lethal injection of Puerto Rican-born Diaz on Wednesday.

Diaz was sentenced to death for the 1979 murder of a Miami strip club manager.

Witnesses said his death took more than twice the usual time - 34 minutes rather than the usual 15.

He needed a second dose of the lethal chemicals as the needles were injected straight through his veins and into the flesh of his arms.

Following the autopsy, the medical examiner concluded the injections had been wrongly administered.

He was found to have large chemical burns on both arms and his lawyer reported that the 55-year-old continued to move and mouth words more than 20 minutes after the initial dose.

Inmates are supposed to be rendered unconscious by the chemicals within three to five minutes.

Anti-death penalty activists say lethal injections - introduced in Florida and other states as a replacement for the electric chair and other methods of execution - are just as cruel and should not be considered a more humane substitute.

But the BBC's Emilio San Pedro, in Miami, says that it is too soon to interpret the decisions as a sign that support for the death penalty is waning in the US.

Executions, he says, continue to be seen as the best deterrent of violent crime.

California: Commission To Review Sentencing Guidelines (NYT/AP)

The corrections secretary said the state would create a commission to review sentencing guidelines, a potential crucial step in Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's efforts to relieve prison crowding. Changes could give judges and parole officers greater discretion and lead to some offenders being released sooner than under current law, the secretary, James E. Tilton, told The Associated Press. The proposal comes five days after a federal judge gave Mr. Schwarzenegger a June deadline to ease crowding in the state prison system, the nation's largest, where more than 173,000 inmates live in space designed for fewer than 100,000. Failure to do so could lead the federal courts to order remedies that include early release of inmates.

Gonzales Seeks Place For "A Child's Dreams" (WT)

By Jerry Seper

DOJ_NMG_0107386

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday said communities poisoned by drugs, gangs, gun crime and violence are no place for "a child's dreams to flourish," and that the Justice Department is determined to help prevent America's youth from joining gangs.

Speaking at the annual Project Safe Neighborhood conference in Boston, Mr. Gonzales said efforts continue to bring together law-enforcement and community leaders to discuss effective programs, identify gaps in services, and develop working partnership to prevent gangs from claiming new members.

"My personal experience has been that the United States is a place where a child can dream big dreams ... and fulfill them," he said. "I believe deeply that this can be true for all Americans, all of this great nation's children, but not when their neighborhoods and their lives are limited by fear and violence.

"That's why we work so hard ... to make the streets of our communities safer, every day," he said.

Mr. Gonzales noted that law enforcement is "not a spectator sport," but added that the same can be said of community-service work. He said it was important for both sides to work together to address what he described as "the scourge of gangs and gang violence" in America's neighborhoods.

He said it would require an integrated, comprehensive approach that includes both law-enforcement and the prevention efforts uniquely offered by community-service groups.

"Increasing prevention in your neighborhood can come from something as simple as meeting the community leader or volunteer sitting next to you in this room today," he said. "Each conversation at a summit like this has the potential for shared ideas and new, creative approaches to reducing violent crime and protecting the future of our children."

Mr. Gonzales said the increased responsibilities for law enforcement since September 11 are one of the reasons law-enforcement officials need partners in community service more than ever. He said their goals are the ultimate complement to law enforcement because they seek to make neighborhoods safer by preventing criminal activity so that arrests and prosecutions are not needed.

"To the community servants here today, I also offer thanks. You'd like to keep kids from joining gangs and living the 'thug life' altogether and that is my idea of an outstanding solution," he said.

"Kids in tough situations join gangs to find companionship and status -- false promises of a lifestyle that in reality brings crime, violence, jail time and even death," he said. "The violence of gangs then spills over into the community, making it less safe for everyone."

Project Safe Neighborhoods is a nationwide commitment to reduce gun crime in America by networking existing local programs that target gun crime and providing these programs with additional tools necessary to be successful.

The Bush administration has committed more than $1.5 billion to the effort since the program's inception in 2001. The funding is used to hire new federal and state prosecutors, support investigators, provide training, distribute gun-lock safety kits, deter juvenile gun crime, and develop and promote community outreach efforts as well as to support other gun-violence-reduction strategies.

AG: Attack Gang Violence With Innovation, As Well As Funding (LOWSUN)

By Rita Savard

Lowell (MA) Sun, December 16, 2006

BOSTON -- A rise in gang violence and shootings is shattering the peace in communities nationwide.

Promising more funding for anti-gang programs, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said law enforcement and community leaders can serve as the "shot heard around the world" by partnering to halt youth violence.

"We need to mine new ideas," Gonzales told hundreds of law enforcers gathered yesterday at the Boston Convention Center for the Second Annual Anti-Gang Summit. "Violent crime has gone up in Massachusetts and no single group can bring it down alone."

Law enforcement has had to keep a sharp eye turned toward terrorist activity in a post 9/11 world, Gonzales said. Because police are stretching resources farther than ever, more people must join in the effort to deter youth from choosing a life of crime.

Crime-fighting partnerships involving the whole community are key, Gonzales said.

"New problems and trends always seem to be around the next corner... cooperation puts us on solid footing," he said.

In Lowell, incidents of gang-related violence have increased this year over last, according to Lt. Mark Buckley, commander of the Lowell Police Department's Criminal Bureau.

In 2005, 54 aggravated assaults with firearms were reported in Lowell, up 14 from 2004, the most current data available from police records.

But state aid received this year to fund anti-gang programs has helped Lowell beef up resources and establish a multifaceted plan to curb gang violence in the city, Buckley said.

Sharon Hanson, director of research and planning for the Lowell Police Department, shared initiatives under way in Lowell at yesterday's conference.

Lowell was awarded $820,000 from the Charles Shannon Community Safety Initiative grant for prevention programs this year. The grant money has enabled police to create a formal support system for teens, said Hanson.

"Police presence has become much more visible in gang hot-spot neighborhoods," said Hanson. "Kids are being kept busy. We've been able to create more opportunities and more jobs for the city's youth."

Since August, Lowell has installed a city advisory board to reduce gang violence, revitalized and created new recreation programs and focused on a truancy prevention program.

A new program at Lowell High School, which allows students to buy back some of their truant time by regularly attending classes, has brought 71 students back to school in October and November, Hanson said.

Increasing programs at the city's Recreation Department has pulled in roughly 300 teens, and provided jobs to an additional 59, Hanson added.

Researchers from the Harvard Kennedy School of Government have been keeping tabs on Lowell's performance measurements.

"We're not only doing these things but we're getting feedback with real numbers and real information to see how we're doing," Hanson said.

Applauding police for their efforts, Gonzales said the federal government realizes the need to pump more money into anti-violence programs.

"An environment poisoned by drugs and gang violence is no place for a child's dreams to flourish," Gonzales said. "We face a tough challenge ahead. But a network of law enforcement and community is stronger than violence."

U.S. Attorney General: Hub's Violent Crime Grave Concern (BOSH)

By O'Ryan Johnson

Boston Herald, December 16, 2006

The blood spilled on Boston's streets this year drew the attention of the nation's top prosecutor yesterday as he attended a conference on gang violence at a time when the city hopes a fractured gang truce can stop a street war from erupting.

"I am concerned that, despite the diligence of the men and women in this room, preliminary crime reports in Boston for the first six months of this year show an increase in violent crime," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Nonfatal shootings are up 10 percent this year, while fatal shootings are up 13 percent. With 71 murders on the year, Boston is approaching last year's 10-year record homicide total of 75.

Gonzales, who was in town to speak at the annual Project Safe Neighborhood Conference at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center, said the feds have put street violence under a microscope, not just in Boston, but across the country.

"To help cities like Boston - and any city or state facing a violent crime challenge - Justice Department officals have been traveling the country, meeting with state and local law enforcement in areas that have violent crime increases and those that have experienced decreases so we can better understand why in each case," he said.

In Boston, a cease-fire between long-feuding gangbangers from H-Block and Heath Street was strained when H-Block peacemaker Jahmol Norfleet, 20, was murdered.

Fed Presecutors Get First Convictions On Economic Espionage (FRESBEE)

By Jordan Robertson

Fresno Bee, December 15, 2006

Federal prosecutors scored their first-ever convictions for economic espionage to benefit a foreign nation when two Silicon Valley engineers pleaded guilty to stealing trade secrets and trying to smuggle them to China.

Fei Ye, 40, a U.S. citizen from China, and Ming Zhong, 39, a permanent resident of the U.S. from China entered their pleas Thursday in San Jose federal court to two counts each as part of a deal with prosecutors. Both would have faced 10 counts each if they went to trial in January.

Ye and Zhong were accused of stealing confidential microchip blueprints and other trade secrets from four technology companies - NEC Electronics Corp., Sun Microsystems Inc., Transmeta Corp. and Trident Microsystems Inc. - and planning to start a microprocessor company with the financial backing of various Chinese government agencies.

The case highlights the threat to U.S. businesses from thieves looking to sell hard-won intellectual property overseas, said U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan.

Few cases allege intent to benefit a foreign government - the most serious crime under the Economic Espionage Act of 1996 - because it's difficult to prove, but he said U.S. companies are frequently targeted by overseas concerns.

"Silicon Valley understands full well the threat they are faced with here," he told The Associated Press. "It's not only a threat to the economic value of the products being produced, but in some cases, it's a threat to our national security and military infrastructure."

On the same day federal prosecutors secured the convictions, a Chinese engineer was indicted for allegedly stealing trade secrets from a Silicon Valley company that made military training software and trying to sell them to Asian governments.

Xiaodong Sheldon Meng, 42, a Chinese national with Canadian citizenship, was indicted on 36 felony counts, including the rare charge of economic espionage to benefit a foreign government and various violations of military technology export laws.

Prosecutors say Meng stole the code for software made by his former employer, Quantum3D Inc., that's used to train military fighter pilots, and tried to sell it to the Royal Thai Air Force, the Royal Malaysian Air Force and a company with ties to China's military.

Under U.S. law, anyone attempting to sell such information overseas must first obtain a license from the State Department and is subject to strict regulations. Meng never applied for such a license.

His lawyer, Angela Hansen, called the charges "baseless" and said in a statement the government has "misinterpreted innocent acts."

No foreign government or agent were named as conspirator in either case, and prosecutors declined to discuss whether any foreign officials or agents knew about the alleged schemes.

In economic espionage cases, the law does not require proof of complicity by a foreign government, and investigators often don't know the extent of foreign involvement.

Ye and Zhong, who remain free on bail following their pleas Thursday, are scheduled to be sentenced April 23. Each face a maximum of 30 years in prison.

The pair were arrested in 2001 at San Francisco International Airport, attempting to board a flight to China. According to the indictment, their luggage was crammed with thousands of pages of documents stolen from their former employers, including schematic drawings of computer chips under development, internal instructions for the design and layout of circuits and components and other confidential information.

Documents seized from their homes included a corporate charter and a fundraising application touting the project's ability to raise China's stature in the field of integrated circuit design, the indictment said.

Other documents showed a panel of Chinese government officials had reviewed the company's business plan, deemed it feasible and encouraged agencies to provide financial support, it said.

A business partner who tipped off the FBI told investigators the startup, called Supervision Inc., had received $2 million in funding from two Chinese cities, Hangzhou and Guangzhou, to develop the new microprocessor, according to an affidavit.

James Pooley, an intellectual property litigator and adjunct law professor at the University of California, Berkeley, said the conviction was a much-needed victory for the Justice Department.

"You're finding people who aren't just trying to take something opportunistically from their employer. They're going places, planning to take trade secrets, and combining secrets from many different places," Pooley said. "This shows the problem is real and it's big."

The only other case to allege economic espionage to benefit a foreign government involved two researchers indicted in Ohio in 2001 for allegedly stealing genetic materials used for Alzheimer's disease research and funneling it to a Japanese government-funded corporation.

But the case fizzled after Japan refused to extradite one defendant, Takashi Okamoto, because a Japanese judge ruled he had not violated U.S. laws. The other defendant, Hiroaki Serizawa, pleaded guilty in the U.S. to a much lesser charge of making false statements to investigators.

Nanny And Senator's Grandchild Flee Masked Intruders In Silver Spring Home (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

Masked intruders forced their way into the Silver Spring home of a U.S. senator's daughter yesterday morning, startling a nanny who ran outside with the lawmaker's 2-year-old granddaughter and left his youngest grandson behind.

A Montgomery County police SWAT team later found the baby safe in his crib.

Police think the incident was a burglary gone awry because the intruders apparently didn't realize the house was occupied.

The burglars approached the red-brick house on the 2400 block of Hayden Drive in Forest Glen about 9:30 a.m., police said. After hearing suspicious noises outside, the 42-year-old nanny opened the door.

"When they burst in, the nanny grabbed the little girl and left the child in the crib," police spokeswoman Cpl. Sonia Pruitt said.

The 1-year-old baby, Jimmy, is the youngest grandson of Sen. Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M.

The nanny ran to a neighbor's house to call police, who initially feared the incident could turn into a hostage situation. Domenici's daughter, Helen, called her father shortly after being notified of the situation. Neither she nor her husband was home during the incident.

"The senator was deeply concerned," said Steve Bell, Domenici's chief of staff.

Police, who would not comment on whether anything was taken from the house, think the burglars fled through the back door before authorities arrived. They remained at large last night.

Shortly after the incident, Reyna Escobar, who lives two houses away, noticed that the nanny's van, which was parked outside the house, had its side door open. Escobar called the nanny to alert her.

"She was crying," said Escobar, 36. "All she told me is some men had broken in. She said she couldn't talk to me."

An emergency response team, which includes SWAT officers, was dispatched to the quiet, hilly street about 30 minutes after the men entered the house.

"The concern was that the suspects could still be inside the home with the 1-year-old," police spokeswoman Lucille Baur said. "The nanny believed that the suspects could have been armed."

The nanny was so shocked by the incident that she was unable to tell detectives conclusively how many burglars she saw and whether they carried weapons, police said.

After authorities determined that the baby was safe, his parents, the nanny, the baby and his sister, Andie, were taken to a nearby church. An officer with the U.S. Capitol police was also sent to the scene after the senator's office notified them of the situation, Bell said.

Late yesterday, the senator released a statement saying he and his wife Nancy were "relieved and thankful that no one was hurt during this frightening incident at my daughter's home this morning. I am grateful for the quick action by the Montgomery County Police to secure the house and ensure my grandchildren's safety."

Helen Domenici, the homeowner, and twin sister Paula are the youngest of the senator's eight children, according to a biography on the lawmaker's Web site. Reached at home yesterday afternoon, Helen Domenici declined to comment.

The nanny is an El Salvadoran immigrant who has been employed by the couple for about three years, Escobar said. The nanny walked away from a reporter yesterday after a police employee told her that she didn't have to talk to the media.

Escobar and other neighbors said they feel that Forest Glen is no longer the kind of community in which people don't always bother locking their doors.

"I'm scared. I have children, too," she said yesterday. "I'm afraid I could be next. I'm keeping my door locked."

Four homes in the vicinity were burglarized last month, police said. The last of those crimes, which occurred Nov. 28, led to the arrest of a teenager from the District. Police said he was a suspect in all four burglaries.

Capt. Betsy Davis, who heads the Silver Spring police station, was on her way to an undetermined death call when she heard about the incident and headed to Hayden.

"I'm not happy," she said yesterday outside the house. "I've got a neighborhood in a panic."

After the TV news trucks drove away from the house, the owners, the children and the nanny returned.

Davis greeted the nanny warmly when the two met at the front door. "You did a good job," Davis said. "You did the right thing."

MySpace, Not Yours (WP)

INCREASINGLY, candidates for state attorney general nationwide have been campaigning on promises to crack down on online sexual predators, and understandably so. Youth and children are particularly vulnerable in Internet chat rooms and social networking sites, where the cloak of anonymity and a naive presumption that cyberspace is populated by kindred spirits can lead to damaging encounters and sexual exploitation. That is the impetus behind a proposal by Virginia's attorney general, Robert F. McDonnell (R), to require convicted sex offenders to register their e-mail addresses, instant-messaging handles and other online identities so they can be blocked from preying on youth online. Mr. McDonnell's proposal is anchored in a legitimate concern; unfortunately, it rests upon some dubious assumptions both about sex offenders and the likelihood of effective enforcement.

The Virginia proposal tracks a federal bill dealing with the same theme offered this month by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.). The idea, which other states may adopt, is to provide social networking sites the means necessary to screen known sex offenders. Already, MySpace.com has announced it would use Virginia's e-mail registry to stop convicted sex offenders from using the venue.

About a fifth of MySpace.com's users are under 18. But apart from anecdotal accounts, there is no evidence -- no studies, no statistics, nothing but inference -- to show that many of the loathsome predators who have victimized children and young people online are convicted sex offenders. Moreover, if a convicted child molester or rapist were intent on preying on unsuspecting innocents online, it would be easy to evade the proposed law by creating a new e-mail identity. Once a sexual predator decides that he is willing to risk prosecution and imprisonment for his crime, he is unlikely to balk over failing to register an e-mail address.

Every state has enacted a law requiring convicted sex offenders to register their whereabouts with authorities and in many cases prohibiting them from taking certain jobs (as coaches for youth teams, for instance) or from living close to schools. Mr. McDonnell argues that it is only logical to add cyber-addresses to the information that offenders must furnish to the authorities. Perhaps. But there is little reason to think that move will go very far beyond symbolism.

Discovery Of Hit List Led To Wave Of O.C. Arrests (LAT)

By H.G Reza, Times Staff Writer

Investigator says 5 police officers, prosecutor are targets of racist group with ties to prison gangs.

This week's arrests of 57 people allegedly tied to a white supremacist gang were sparked when authorities learned of a hit list with the names of an Orange County prosecutor and five police officers, an investigator said Friday.

Anaheim Police Lt. K. Switzer said authorities learned of the list last month. He said the probe began when another Orange County police department learned that one of its officers had been targeted by Public Enemy Number 1, a street gang involved in identity theft, credit card fraud and methamphetamine sales. The group has ties to the racist Aryan Brotherhood and Nazi Low Riders prison gangs.

Switzer said investigators were trying to determine why those six people were targeted and if it was a gang edict or the work of a single gang member.

"It's not uncommon to hear that gangs are upset with the law enforcement community, but to hear specific names of officers who are threatened is unique," Switzer said. "That crosses the line and gets our attention."

He said one of those targeted was a gang prosecutor from the Orange County district attorney's office but declined to name the individual. District attorney spokeswoman Susan Kang Schroeder declined to comment.

Switzer said the list included the name of an officer who supposedly worked in Anaheim. However, he said, no one by that name worked for the department. "We were still concerned," Switzer said. "It seems they had the wrong name, but we don't know why they targeted our department," he said.

He also declined to name the other departments whose officers were on the list.

The investigation began about a month ago, Switzer said, and 10 arrests were made before Thursday's sweep. More arrests are expected, he said.

Public Enemy Number 1, also known as PEN1, "is rapidly gaining prominence due to [the gang's] violent nature and attacks on police officers," according to the California Department of Justice's 2004 report on organized crime in the state. The report said the group has about 200 members in California and is "one of the most powerful and fastest-growing gangs inside and outside prison."

A law enforcement source who requested anonymity said PEN1 was especially dangerous because members had obtained personal information about judges, prosecutors and police officers. The source said someone affiliated with the gang stole personal data while working at a company that had access to such records.

The gang started in Long Beach in the 1980s, and its membership grew rapidly, particularly in Huntington Beach and southern Orange County, according to the Anti-Defamation League, which tracks racist groups. The league said Public Enemy Number 1 leads a coalition of white supremacist groups called the Southern California Skinhead Alliance.

The Thursday sweep involved about 300 officers from about 25 agencies, including the FBI and U.S. Marshals Service. Switzer said authorities raided about 75 locations throughout Southern California.

The arrests were peaceful, and officers seized two handguns, a shotgun, a rifle and small amounts of drugs, he said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Mary Cheney's Pregnancy Is Just Fine, Bush Tells Magazine (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15 — Mary Cheney's baby will have two mommies, and that is just fine with President Bush.

When People magazine asked him what he thought of the news that Vice President Dick Cheney's daughter, who is a lesbian, was pregnant with a child whom she will raise with her longtime partner, Heather Poe, Mr. Bush said: "I think Mary is going to be a loving soul to her child. And I'm happy for her."

Mary Cheney and Ms. Poe are not married, though they have said that, for all purposes, they consider themselves to be.

People released parts of the interview on Friday, and the quotation about Ms. Cheney's baby prompted a new round of questions about the president's past statements against same-sex marriage and, more particularly, child rearing by gay couples.

For instance, in an interview with The New York Times in 2005, Mr. Bush said in response to a question about gay adoption: "The ideal in society is to raise children with a man and a woman. Private adoption firms can make whatever choice they choose to do."

He added, "I believe children can receive love from gay couples, but the ideal is — and studies have shown that the ideal is where a child is raised in a married family with a man and a woman."

During his regular press briefing, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said Mr. Bush still believed that children should ideally be raised by a man and a woman as parents. But, Mr. Snow said, "he believes that Mary Cheney's child will, in fact, have loving parents."

Asked if Mr. Bush believed a child raised by parents of the same sex would be at a disadvantage, Mr. Snow replied, "He does not make comments on that, and nor will I."

Mary Cheney, 37, has said that she considered quitting the Bush-Cheney re-election campaign in 2004 when the president supported a proposed constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage. She is now an executive at Time Warner's AOL unit.

Mr. Bush is also quoted by People as saying, "There's no doubt in my mind a woman could do the job" of president.

The magazine quotes the first lady, Laura Bush, as saying that she believed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice could be a good candidate but was not running, "probably because she is single, her parents are no longer living, she's an only child."

"You need a very supportive family and supportive friends to have this job," Mrs. Bush said.

Also in the interview, Mr. Bush acknowledged that he sometimes had to take "sleep aids" when traveling abroad, though "I must tell you, I'm sleeping a lot better than people would assume."

George & Laura Bush: The PEOPLE Interview (PEOPLE)

People, December 15, 2006

The President and First Lady talk about the war, the future and their marriage. Plus: President Bush answers your questions.

The war, the elections, the GOP scandals: During these difficult times, the President and First Lady talked to PEOPLE about remaining focused on what they hold dear – family, country and one another.

By many measures – the progress on the war, the elections, poll results – it's been a rough year. Do you feel that way? What's your take on it?

THE PRESIDENT: I think it's been a very difficult year in Iraq – for our troops, for the families of the troops, for the Iraqi people. And it's been difficult for the American people, because success in Iraq has been slower coming than any of us would like. And so the task at hand now is to come up with a new way forward. I think most Americans fully understand the importance of success; they're wondering whether we have a plan to succeed. It's my job to listen to a lot of opinions and come up with a strategy that says we have a plan.

Did you think progress would be further along at this point?

THE PRESIDENT: I did. The reason it has been slower is because of the sectarian violence that was caused by outside forces. Now the task is to empower the Maliki government so that they can stop the violence to help them achieve the stability that 12 million Iraqis wanted when they went to the polls (in December 2005). There have been some remarkable achievements, but it is a very tough time now in Iraq.

Nearly 3,300 U.S. servicemen and women have been killed in the Iraq and Afghanistan operations – more than the number of Americans killed on September 11. Is democracy in Iraq worth the death toll?

THE PRESIDENT: If I didn't think removing the Taliban from Afghanistan and helping this young democracy in Iraq after we removed Saddam Hussein were worth it, I wouldn't have our troops there. Success in Afghanistan and Iraq, in Lebanon and elsewhere in the Middle East, is vital to the security of your children and your grandchildren. This is a long-term ideological struggle to protect future generations of Americans.

This year, we invited readers on our Web site to ask you questions. Here's one:

Nina Frazier of New Braunfels, Texas, asks: If you believe in the war, why didn't you encourage your own daughters to fight for your country? Or did you?

THE PRESIDENT: I believe Americans can contribute to the security and well-being of our country in a variety of ways. That's why we have a volunteer army. What we say to young people is that if you want to serve your country you can do so in the military, or you can do so by teaching children in inner-city Washington, D.C., like one of our daughters did. Or you can help form education programs in New York City, like our (other) daughter. There are all kinds of ways to serve.

Nancy Pelosi shattered Congress's glass ceiling by becoming the first female Speaker of the House. Do you think there's anything a woman would do differently with the Presidency?

THE PRESIDENT: I think it depends on the individual, but there's no doubt in my mind a woman could do the job.

Mrs. Bush: I agree. But it isn't easy to live here. Dr. (Condoleezza) Rice, who I think would be a really good candidate, is not interested. Probably because she is single, her parents are no longer living, she's an only child. You need a very supportive family and supportive friends to have this job.

The White House family had some happy news this week: Mary Cheney, the Vice President's daughter, is pregnant.

THE PRESIDENT: The Vice President took me aside and gave me the good news. He and his wife, Lynne, are very happy for Mary.

You said in 2005 that ideally "a child is raised in a married family with a man and a woman." Knowing Mary and her partner, Heather, do you still think that?

THE PRESIDENT: I think Mary is going to be a loving soul to her child. And I'm happy for her.

Many readers asked how you handle stress.

THE PRESIDENT: I pray daily. I exercise nearly daily, and I've got a loving wife who provides a comfortable, warm place for me to come home to.

Mrs. Bush, how do you feel when you hear some of what's said about your husband? Are there moments that sting?

Mrs. Bush: Sure, yes. I don't like that. But we've been involved (in politics) for years.

Is it worse today than in the past?

Mrs. Bush: When you go to the Lincoln Library in Springfield, Ill., and see what political cartoons and pamphlets said about President Lincoln, you see that it's not worse. People are the same no matter what generation.

A lot of readers asked how you shut off the day's events. Do you ever take sleep aids?

THE PRESIDENT: Generally not. But occasionally when I travel, I'm expected to get on an airplane and fly eight hours and pop out and be fresh and diplomatic and on message. If I'm having trouble sleeping, I'll take a sleep aid. But I must tell you, I'm sleeping a lot better than people would assume.

Do you ever need anything more than a cup of coffee to stay sharp?

THE PRESIDENT: I have a couple of cups in the morning, and drink a lot of water. Hydrating helps. There are ways to maintain your health, and one is exercise. I believe prayer is very important; others don't, but I do. I don't drink alcohol. I can remember when I used to drink, I had trouble sleeping at night.

Favorite book of the year?

THE PRESIDENT: Team of Rivals, about Abe Lincoln, by Doris Kearns Goodwin.

Nichole Grimm of Waynesboro, Va., asks: After being married for almost 30 years, what are the little ways you keep surprising each other to keep your marriage alive?

THE PRESIDENT: I hope mine is humor, that I'm able to joke and laugh. Laughter is an important part of a healthy lifestyle. This is a town that's not laughing a lot lately.

Mrs. Bush: We've done the same thing since we first got married. We wake up in the morning and drink coffee and read the newspapers. We like to go to bed early. Those quiet times that we're together at the end of the day give us the most comfort with each other.

Angela Roy wrote from an APO address in Europe: What are the craziest things you ever gave each other for Christmas?

Mrs. Bush: I think George would say those sweaters that I give him every single year – which I'm not giving him this year. The best gift he ever gave me was when I opened a present under the tree and there was a little porcelain library. It was the library at SMU, my university. (It represented) a beautiful garden and walkway that leads into the library there. He had given it as a gift to my university. That was, by far, the most moving gift he ever gave me.

Are your daughters coming home for Christmas?

Mrs. Bush: They are. Jenna is working with an international organization in Central and South America about education policy. And Barbara is working for a museum in the education department.

Rena Dillard of Nashville asks: Do you have a favorite Christmas memory of them as little children?

DOJ_NMG_0107394

Mrs. Bush: I love to tell the girls this story. They would always help me decorate the tree, and then we'd have hot chocolate. Once when they were really little, I said, "Sit under the tree" – and it makes me want to weep – "and I'll go make the hot chocolate." (The First Lady's eyes fill with tears.) And I came back and they were so literal. They were squished under the branches, sitting way back by the trunk of the tree waiting for their hot chocolate. I'll never forget those precious little babies under the tree.

Suzanne Young of Des Moines asks: What are your plans for contributing to society after the end of your presidency?

THE PRESIDENT: Tell Suzanne that I'll be thinking about that after my presidency. I'll be active. There's a lot of really good initiatives we started here, such as battling HIV/AIDS on the continent of Africa, or dealing with malaria, or Laura's literacy initiatives, and the Freedom Agenda. I've got so much on my mind, and this job is so exciting that it's really hard to settle down and plan the next 10 years of our life.

Bush Happy About Mary Cheney's Pregnancy (AP)

President Bush says he is happy for Mary Cheney, the openly gay daughter of Vice President Dick Cheney, who revealed earlier this month that she is pregnant.

"I think Mary is going to be a loving soul to her child," Bush said in an interview with People magazine. "And I'm happy for her."

Bush was asked about Mary Cheney's pregnancy in light of his previous statements that a child ideally should be raised by in a family headed by a married father and mother.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said on Friday that Bush has not changed his mind. "But he also believes that every human life is sacred and that every child who comes into this world deserves love," Snow said. "And he believes that Mary Cheney's child will, in fact, have loving parents."

Asked if Bush believes that children who are raised by gay and lesbian parents are at a disadvantage, Snow said, "He does not make comments on that and nor will I." Mary Cheney, 37, and her partner of 15 years, Heather Poe, 45, are expecting a baby in late spring.

A number of conservative groups have expressed dismay at Cheney's pregnancy.

Bush Sticks To His Views On Gays Becoming Parents (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Although he recently expressed confidence that Mary Cheney will make a loving parent, President Bush continues to believe it is best that a child is raised by a man and woman married to each other, the president's spokesman said Friday.

The pregnancy of Vice President Dick Cheney's younger daughter, a lesbian, has reignited public discussion on same-sex couples becoming parents.

Some social conservatives, who support Bush and the vice president on most issues, learned of Mary Cheney's pregnancy with dismay, saying it undermined efforts to emphasize the primacy of the traditional family unit.

Commenting on the controversy, Bush last week told People magazine, "I think Mary is going to be a loving soul to her child. And I'm happy for her."

Pressed on whether his remark contradicted views he previously expressed that being raised by same-sex couples was not ideal for a child, he avoided a direct response.

"Mary Cheney is going to make a fine mom, and she's going to love this child a lot," he said.

In 2005, Bush said in an interview that he thought it best for a child to be raised by a man and woman married to each other. He does not favor same-sex marriage.

"I believe children can receive love from gay couples, but the ideal is — and studies have shown that the ideal is — where a child is raised in a married family with a man and a woman," he told the New York Times.

On Friday, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow was asked whether the president stood by this belief.

"Yes, he does," Snow replied.

"But he also believes that every human life is sacred and that every child who comes into this world deserves love," Snow said. "And he believes that Mary Cheney's child will in fact have loving parents."

Snow said Bush had not addressed whether he thought children raised by gays were at a disadvantage.

In the People interview, Bush said that he found out about Mary Cheney's pregnancy when the vice president "took me aside and gave me the good news."

Bush added that the vice president and his wife, Lynne, "are very happy for Mary."

The president did not mention Mary Cheney's partner of 15 years, Heather Poe.

Since the Bush administration took office in 2001, Mary Cheney has played a low-key but growing role in its political operation.

In 2004, she held a senior staff position in the Bush reelection campaign, and regularly traveled with her father aboard Air Force Two.

She is to give birth in the late spring.

Cheney's Lesbian Daughter Will Be A "Loving Mother": Bush (AFP)

AFP, December 15, 2006

President George W. Bush, a staunch defender of traditional values, believes vice-president Dick Cheney's lesbian daughter will be a "loving mother."

In an interview with celebrity magazine People, Bush said he was delighted to hear Mary Cheney was expecting a child with long-time partner Heather Poe.

"The Vice President took me aside and gave me the good news. He and his wife, Lynne, are very happy for Mary," Bush told the magazine.

Last year Bush said he believed that ideally "a child is raised in a married family with a man and a woman."

Asked if he still believed that, given that he knew Mary Cheney and her partner, he told People: "I think Mary is going to be a loving soul to her child. And I'm happy for her."

In May, Mary Cheney was critical of Bush's support for a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage.

However she said she had no doubt that "Bush was the absolute best person to be leading us at this time in our country's history."

In New Jersey, Gay Couples Ponder Nuances Of Measure To Allow Civil Unions (NYT)

By Kareem Fahim

HOBOKEN, N.J. Dec. 15 — Away from the loud political arguments over the New Jersey Legislature's vote to establish civil unions for same-sex couples, gays and lesbians across the state have begun to grapple with the practicalities: What verb to use? Get unified?

After drinks at a bar here Thursday night, hours after the vote, Rosanna Durruthy, 44, said she and her partner would soon start planning the ceremony they had talked about for years. "This is great," said Ms. Durruthy, a Hoboken resident who has lived with her partner for nine years. "Will we have the major event where we get the villa in Tuscany? We're still discussing it." (She favors the Amalfi coast.)

Ms. Durruthy celebrated the news amid laughter and a long embrace with her old friend Bill Carter, 37, who lives in Texas with his partner. Mr. Carter was happy for his friend and said he considered the law a collective leap forward, but added of his home state: "There are no rights there; sodomy just came off the books."

New Jersey is the third state to give approval to civil unions; Massachusetts permits gay couples to marry but only if they live in the state. Since Vermont began allowing civil unions in 2000, between 250 and 400 New Jersey couples have gotten hitched there (along with about 200 New York couples a year). Connecticut's civil union laws took effect in October 2005.

The 2000 Census found about 16,000 same-sex couples living together in New Jersey, though the Urban Institute, a research organization, says the true count is as much as 50 percent higher; nearly one-third of them are raising children.

In interviews with more than a dozen gays and lesbians over the past three days, many talked about following through on long deferred plans now that the law has been passed. Other couples welcomed the broader rights but said little would change, saying that their commitments did not need a government sanction. There was approval from single people as well, even if some had not followed the debate as closely as their friends who share children, homes or bank accounts.

The legislation does not spell out procedures for obtaining civil unions, but advocates for same-sex marriage and state officials said the process was likely to mirror that for marriage. In New Jersey, couples apply for a marriage license in the municipality where the bride lives, unless the bride lives out of state; such rules would most likely have to be tweaked.

After a 72-hour waiting period, set aside to make certain a couple wants to get married, a municipal registrar issues a marriage license. Weddings in New Jersey can be performed by mayors, many judges, village presidents and ministers.

Eric Kabel, who works for a nursing agency and lives in Rahway, said that he and his partner signed up for a domestic partnership in New Jersey the first day that a law passed in 2004 went into effect.

"Neither of us were real activists," he said. "But we wanted them to see the number of people who signed up as partners."

When the civil union law takes effect — 60 days after the governor's expected signature — the couple will head to City Hall, Mr. Kabel said, adding, "I don't care if the city clerk does it."

But while they are eager to claim the rights and benefits provided by the new law, Mr. Kabel lamented that a heterosexual couple who met "five minutes ago" can get a marriage license, while he and his partner of 16 years cannot.

"We're a suburban, boring couple, with a yard, a dog," he said. "We're friendly to our neighbors."

Steve Mandeville and Victor Aluise, partners of 16 years who share a house in Ocean Grove, exchanged wedding bands years ago, in Sedona, Ariz.

"We were in a beautiful place, it was a beautiful day," Mr. Mandeville recalled. "It doesn't matter what you want to call it. If it will keep the heterosexual people happy, let's just call it a union. Isn't that what a marriage is anyhow?"

Mr. Aluise said the two had not yet decided if they would have another big ceremony, but they would wait until April 25 — the anniversary of their domestic partnership registration — to register for their union. "I'm elated, and I'm proud to be a New Jerseyan now," he said.

Though advocates for civil rights for gay people vowed to keep pushing for same-sex marriage, Alan Fox, the manager of the bar in Hoboken where Mr. Carter and Ms. Durruthy had a drink, the Cage, said he had no desire for gays to win the right to marry.

Marriage, Mr. Fox said, had been for his parents (who eventually divorced). If he married, "it would be offensive to my people like my mother," Mr. Fox said.

Jan Moore, 70, hailed the new law as good for young people. "They won't be made to feel like second-class citizens, people who have to walk around and hide who they are or what they are," she said in a telephone interview from her home in Ocean Grove.

Ms. Moore's partner, a 77-year-old woman who refused to give her name, gave voice to the fears felt by an earlier generation. "I was in New York when the cops used to raid bars," she said. "You had to show papers. They'd say, 'Does your mother know who you are?' "

She also said she had no interest in marriage. "I'm an old Italian," she said. She said when she was growing up "it was always a man and a woman."

Ms. Moore, a great-grandmother, said she and her partner have been together for 36 years.

"We've climbed a mountain," Ms. Moore said. "I didn't think I would see this in my lifetime."

Town Is Sued Over System Used In Voting (NYT)

By Barbara Whitaker

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

PORT CHESTER, N.Y., Dec. 15 — The United States Justice Department filed a lawsuit on Friday against this Westchester County village, charging that its at-large voting system illegally diminishes Hispanic influence.

DOJ_NMG_0107397

The suit, which contends that the system violates the Voting Rights Act, seeks an injunction that could scuttle Board of Trustees elections in March.

"The right to vote is the bedrock of our government," Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney for the Southern District of New York, said in a statement. "The at-large system of electing Port Chester's Board of Trustees dilutes the votes of Port Chester's minority citizens and undermines democracy."

Mayor Gerald L. Logan criticized the government's lawsuit as "unfortunate and heavy-handed."

"We are extremely disappointed that the government chose divisive litigation instead of direct communication," he said. "There appears to be no interest in working cooperatively with Port Chester."

The Justice Department notified officials in April that it intended to file a lawsuit if they did not take steps to set up a district-based voting system. The department provided three separate plans to break the village into voting districts. On Dec. 4, the village board voted to notify the department that it did not believe the current system violated the act, setting the stage for a court battle.

According to the lawsuit, the village's at-large system — in which all residents vote for each member of the board of trustees — allows for white-bloc voting that prevents Hispanic voters from electing their preferred candidates. The government noted that more than 46 percent of the village's population and 21.9 percent of its voting-age citizens are Hispanic. Still, no Hispanic person has been elected to public office in the village.

The United States attorney's office also cited instances of what it said was voting polarized by race and ethnicity, as well as a history of anti-Hispanic discrimination in New York State, Westchester County and the village.

The court filing was supported by affidavits from residents and former candidates for either the board of trustees or the school board who are Hispanic or African-American and who identified what they said were instances of racial or ethnic appeals to undermine their candidacies. They also cited cases in which they said support in a smaller community was canceled out by white voting in other areas.

Anthony Piscionere, who is representing the village, said that officials were open to making changes to assure all ethnic groups and races were represented in elections. But, he said, three experts hired to review the Justice Department's data found it did not support the contention that the village violated the Voting Rights Act.

In addition, he said, districting the 2.4-square-mile village would be costly and have long-term consequences.

"If the evidence doesn't support the action, would you do it?" he said.

He said a Voters Rights Commission had been formed to increase voter participation. Mayor Logan noted that while according to the 2000 Census there were more than 3,000 Latinos of voting age in Port Chester, only 2,600 people voted in the last election and the winning candidate received 1,659 votes.

"It is apparent to all who know our village that we face apathy and not discrimination," he said.

But according to statements of former Hispanic and African-American candidates filed with the government's lawsuit, a problem does exist.

Cesar Ruiz, who ran unsuccessfully for trustee in March 2001, said he felt it was impossible for a Hispanic or African-American candidate to be elected under the current system. He recalled a supporter who told him: "I like you, you're a good guy. I've known you for years. But the Democrats are telling me not to vote for you because you are Hispanic."

Graciela Heymann, executive director of the Westchester Hispanic Coalition, a service and advocacy group that has an office in Port Chester, said it was difficult to say who was right in the case because of a lack of data.

However, she said, there was no doubt that there needed to be greater Latino representation in the village. Public hearings on the districting issue have highlighted tensions between longtime residents and Latinos who have recently moved there.

"I really feel that Port Chester is like a tale of two cities with people living separate lives," she said.

Feds Sue Village Over Hispanic Voting (AP)

AP, December 16, 2006

The federal government sued a suburban New York village Friday, alleging that its at-large method of electing trustees is unfair to Hispanics and violates the Voting Rights Act.

DOJ_NMG_0107398

The government requested that Port Chester — or a judge, if necessary — devise a system that would include a Hispanic district.

"Ethnically and racially polarized voting patterns prevail" in Port Chester's local elections, according to a statement from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other Justice Department officials.

Mayor Gerald Logan blasted the lawsuit, calling it "unfortunate and heavy-handed" and noting that Port Chester has used at-large elections since 1868.

"We cannot and will not stand idly by and allow the federal government to upset and divide our village," he said.

The village is about 25 miles from New York City and is governed by a mayor and six trustees. Port Chester, with a population of about 28,000, is 43 percent Hispanic, according to the 2000 Census. The citizen voting-age population was 22 percent Hispanic, but no Hispanic has ever been elected as a trustee.

In court papers, the government said Hispanic candidates have been defeated in the past by "white bloc voting."

The next election is set for March 2007, and the Justice Department is asking for an injunction against it unless there is a new system in place.

At a court session Friday afternoon, however, Judge Stephen Robinson suggested there may not be enough time to reach a "thoughtful" decision and stop that election. He scheduled hearings for Feb. 12.

Last April, the Justice Department advised Port Chester that its system violated the Voting Rights Act and threatened a lawsuit. The trustees voted unanimously this month that the system does not violate the law.

Feds Sue State Over Juvenile Site (OKLA)

By Josh Rabe

Oklahoman, December 16, 2006

TULSA — The U.S. Justice Department on Friday filed a complaint against the state, challenging the conditions at a Sand Springs juvenile detention center

Federal prosecutors believe the state hasn't corrected serious violations found in a two-year investigation at the L.E. Rader Center, said Cynthia Magnuson, spokeswoman for the Justice Department.

She said violations included inappropriate sexual relationships, violence and abuse of psychotropic medications.

The U.S. attorney general's office filed the lawsuit Friday against the state, Gov. Brad Henry, the director and chairman of the Office of Juvenile Affairs and the superintendent of the juvenile facility.

The complaint accuses the state and juvenile justice officials of failing to protect federally protected civil rights of about 215 teens at the center.

"These allegations are very serious, and we were unable to resolve this," Magnuson said. "It just came to a point where we had to file suit."

'Not cooperative'

The Justice Department threatened legal action in a June 2005 letter Assistant Attorney General R. Alexander Acosta sent Henry.

"The facility was not cooperative and wouldn't let us conduct the sort of investigative work we usually would do," Magnuson said.

Since the letter was issued, state juvenile affairs officials have been reluctant to correct those problems, she said.

In a written statement released Friday, Gene Christian, executive director of the state Office of Juvenile Affairs, said his office anticipated legal action and looks forward to a final resolution to the situation.

Christian said he could not comment specifically on the case because it is pending.

Henry's spokesman, Paul Sund, had a similar response.

State Attorney General Drew Edmondson's office was reviewing the complaint Friday and couldn't yet address specific allegations, said Charlie Price, a spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0107399

Most cases of prison civil rights abuse are resolved out of court through consent orders in which an agency agrees to outside oversight for a certain time, Magnuson said. In rare instances, the Justice Department has sought court orders to close facilities.

ANTITRUST:

Airlines And Antitrust (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 16, 2006

For airline passengers, those half-empty flights on which you can spread out and take a couple of seats are a godsend. But for the airlines, they are misery. Those Ancient Mariner flights help to explain the sudden urge to merge in the airline industry.

United and Continental proposed a merger this week, even as US Airways's managers are trying to convince Delta's creditors to sell Delta to them rather than let it emerge from bankruptcy as an independent airline. More of this may be in the offing. Meanwhile, in Washington, Democrats are already sounding the political alarm about airline consolidation.

Senator Frank Lautenberg wants to be sure that any deals are "good for the flying public." His counterpart in the House, Minnesota's James Oberstar, is even more emphatic that the Justice Department should block all airline mergers. "I don't think there's any benefit from mergers except for the benefit of stockholders and airline officials," Mr. Oberstar averred this week.

We'd have thought a competitive and healthy airline industry is in everyone's interest. Mr. Oberstar's deepest concerns are for the unions who elect him, and unions tend to gripe about mergers for fear of losing jobs. But Delta's pilots are now experiencing what can happen when the alternative to merger becomes bankruptcy. The pilots' pension fund is being tossed over to the federal government, which means a sizable haircut for the pilots' lucrative pensions. Airline employees aren't immune to the industry's woes or good fortune.

And speaking of bankruptcy as an alternative, let's recall the last time the Justice Department took Mr. Oberstar's antitrust advice -- in 2001, when it rejected the proposed merger of United and US Airways. Both airlines later ended up in bankruptcy court and seeking taxpayer aid.

Still, Mr. Oberstar has identified a genuine political problem for the industry. Consolidations only make sense if they allow the merging airlines to take out marginal capacity, as US Airways has been explaining. But in the real world, "marginal capacity" translates to those half-filled flights to often small destinations.

Customers like those flights. And the politicians who represent the cities where those flights land hate to see them cut or reduced. The trouble for the industry is that all the big players are trapped in a prisoner's dilemma -- but one in which, by the rules of antitrust enforcement, they aren't allowed even to attempt to cooperate with each other. This leaves them with a choice between killing their own marginal flights -- and letting their competitors reap the benefit -- or limping along with unprofitable networks.

US Airways's provocative answer is to merge with Delta, cut marginal or overlapping capacity, make sure the extra planes don't keep flying the unfriendly domestic skies, and make money with a more compact network. The model is the US Airways merger with America West, in which US Airways was bought out of bankruptcy, allowing for contract terminations that would have been harder to shake off outside bankruptcy court. It figures it can repeat the trick with Delta.

By US Airways's account, this is even better than killing off one of the big carriers through a Chapter 7 liquidation, because in that case the remaining legacy carriers might buy up the planes and routes the departing carrier left behind. In that sort of auction of assets, the same old prisoner's dilemma rules apply. The routes may not be great, but buying them up is better than letting your competitors get them, so everyone goes at it.

Critics of mergers complain that the combined giants will proceed to monopolize certain routes. But an undeniable fact of modern airline life is that the barriers to entry are low and capital is plentiful. The planes can be leased, rather than purchased outright, and the startups lack the legacy and union costs of the Americans and Continentals.

This helps explain why low-cost carriers now account for 35% of the market, up from 10% not very long ago. A combined US Airways-Delta might try to monopolize a route, but it would soon face competition on that route from a JetBlue or AirTran or some startup we haven't seen yet. In this environment, capacity reduction and the elimination of marginal routes has to be part of any story that leads to a less self-destructive industry in the future.

An airline industry shakeout may mean more people on some flights, but it doesn't have to mean more "crowding." JetBlue just announced that it was increasing the leg room on its Airbus 320s. Not coincidentally, JetBlue is also growing and is (generally) profitable. Perhaps Mr. Oberstar ought to take another look at his list of beneficiaries in a more consolidated, more profitable airline business.

Airlines, Now Healthy, Getting Frisky (NYT)

By Mark A. Stein

HOW well have the commercial airlines rebounded from their near-death brushes with bankruptcy in the first half of the decade? Consider this: flights are packed, fares are rising and profits have reappeared despite stubbornly high fuel costs. The best may be to come, as some of the biggest airlines flirt with mergers that could permit them to cut costs and raise fares even further.

Federal regulators, meanwhile, eased up on some of the rules and prosecutorial tools after the collapses of Enron and WorldCom touched off a series of corporate scandals involving accounting fraud, insider trading, backdated stock option grants and other malfeasance.

THE BAGGAGE CAROUSEL The week began with news that another major airline was about to be acquired and ended with the announcement of just such an offer, but the two deals were related only in that they illustrated the industry's budding revival.

Qantas, the Australian airline, was the one that agreed to be acquired, accepting an $8.7 billion offer from a consortium led by Macquarie Bank and the Texas Pacific Group. Earlier in the week, Continental Airlines confirmed it was being courted by United, its much larger rival.

Both deals follow US Airways' offer last month to buy Delta Air Lines for $8 billion. Delta's board is considering that offer as it tries to emerge from bankruptcy court protection.

If one big domestic merger goes through, other airlines will feel pressure to pair off, too, or risk winding up at a competitive disadvantage because they have higher costs or smaller route networks. While such consolidation may bolster airlines' bottom lines, reduced competition would probably also result in more-crowded flights and higher fares, at least in the short term.

Delta, which opposes US Airways' bid, will file a plan next week outlining how it intends to operate as an independent airline once out of bankruptcy court protection.

EASING THE RULES Federal regulators and prosecutors moved to narrow or roll back some rules and investigative methods adopted after Enron and WorldCom imploded in multibillion-dollar accounting frauds, starting a wave of corporate scandals that are still unfolding.

The Justice Department acted first, imposing new limits on prosecutors in white-collar corruption cases. They now must seek approval from senior officials before asking companies to waive their attorney-client privilege, and they must disregard if a company has hired lawyers for potential witnesses when deciding whether to charge the company.

A day later, the Securities and Exchange Commission moved to relax an auditing provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 for smaller companies. In the law, Congress left it to the S.E.C. to decide precisely how thoroughly auditors must review the financial controls companies employ to detect fraud in their accounts.

The United States Chamber of Commerce and other business groups that have been critical of the S.E.C. rules and the Justice Department's approach may still try to persuade Congress to further reduce regulations and enforcement.

HOLDING STEADY The Federal Reserve left its benchmark interest rate steady, holding firm to its position that a slowing economy will subdue inflation in the months ahead but warning in a statement that "some inflation risks remain."

The possibility that inflation will not slow as expected has worried Fed board members, particularly Jeffrey M. Lacker of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, who has dissented each time since the central bank stopped raising rates in August.

While the Fed's Open Market Committee indicated in its statement that another rate increase could soon be needed to hold price increases down, it also acknowledged that "recent indicators have been mixed" and it could not rule out the possibility that economic growth and inflation could slow enough to warrant a rate cut next spring.

One barometer of inflation, the Labor Department's producer price index, will be updated Tuesday with figures from November.

BIDDING WAR Rival steel makers from India and Brazil opened a bidding war for the British-Dutch producer Corus, accelerating a worldwide consolidation of steel companies amid sharply higher costs for raw materials and energy.

Tata Steel of India began the scrap by offering $9.2 billion in cash for Corus, which itself was created by the 1999 merger of British Steel and Royal Hoogovens of the Netherlands. Within hours of Tata's bid, however, the Brazilian company, Companhia Siderúrgica Nacional, offered $9.6 billion.

Both bidders have access to cheap iron ore, a crucial matter in a global market where ore prices have risen in consecutive years. Tata also has the advantage of India's booming appetite for steel among road builders, land developers and automakers.

If either bid succeeds, the deal would be the second largest in 2006, trailing only Mittal Steel's $38.3 billion takeover of the Spanish-French-Luxembourgian steel maker Arcelor last summer.

UNHAPPY ANNIVERSARY On the eve of a high-level visit by American officials, the Bush administration accused China of failing to honor promises to open its economy to foreign competition and crack down on piracy of foreign goods.

The criticism came in a report to Congress by Susan C. Schwab, the United States trade representative. The analysis, which praised China in some areas, was required by American law on the fifth anniversary of China's joining the World Trade Organization.

The United States may seek arbitration from the World Trade Organization if it cannot resolve its disputes with China.

GOLDEN GOLDMAN The investment bank Goldman Sachs said its profit soared 93 percent in its fiscal fourth quarter, meaning it earned nearly as much in 2006 as it had in the previous two years combined — both of which were also record years.

Driven by a record year in mergers and acquisitions, a robust stock market rally and rapid growth in credit markets — which are now much bigger than stock markets — Goldman posted a record annual profit of $9.5 billion on record revenue of $37.7 billion.

Soaring profit means soaring bonuses. Investment bankers who generated a lot of business can expect $20 million to $25 million each, while top traders can take home up to $50 million, according to executives at other leading banks.

Democrat Senator Issues Warning About Airline Mergers (DOW)

By Corey Boles

Dow Jones Newswires, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--A senior Democrat senator Friday expressed concern about the impact on competition from potential consolidation in the U.S. airline industry.

Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg (D-NJ) said he is concerned that renewed speculation the industry is about to embark upon another round of takeover activity could leave consumers shortchanged.

"What matters to me is to see if this proposal is good for the flying public, if it makes air travel more convenient, less expensive and with higher quality service," Lautenberg said in a statement Friday.

Last month, Delta Air Lines Inc. (DALRQ) rejected an unsolicited $8 billion approach from U.S. Airways Group Inc. (LCC), saying the company was on track to emerge from bankruptcy protection in early 2007 on its own.

Airline shares then moved up sharply on Wednesday with the AMEX airline index increasing 3% on word of private discussions between the chief executives of UAL Corp. (UAUA), parent of United Airlines, and Continental Airlines Inc. (CAL) about a possible tie-up.

Also Wednesday, shares in regional carrier MidWest Air Group Inc. (MEH) shot up 22% - commensurate with the amount of a hostile takeover offer from AirTran Holdings Inc. (AAI).

Analysts have long predicted that the industry needs to go through a wave of consolidation in order to cut costs and duplication of services. The sector was hard hit by the steep drop in the numbers of people flying in the wake of 9/11. Airlines also struggled to swallow the spike in oil prices earlier in the year which led to a dramatic rise in their costs.

Once news of U.S. Airway's approach for Delta was made public, the Department of Justice quickly made it clear its antitrust unit would investigate any potential transactions in the sector.

Lautenberg said that, in addition to the concerns he had about ensuring sufficient competition in the sector, he also wanted to seek reassurances that, were there to be a deal, there would be assurances given about protecting employees' jobs at the two airlines.

"I also want to know more about plans for employees who have worked at Delta and U.S. Airways for many years, and employees who are near their retirement. What happens to them," his statement said.

Lautenberg said that were actual consolidation in the industry to materialize, he "would ask serious and thoughtful questions in the Senate Commerce Committee about this proposal. Too much is on the line here to give it a rubber stamp."

He said he wouldn't hesitate from holding oversight committee meetings into airline consolidation.

Lautenberg sits on the aviation subcommittee and could possibly become its chairman once the party takes control of Congress in January. A spokesman for Lautenberg's office would only say that the subcommittee chairman roles won't be decided until January.

Staff members for other Democrat lawmakers said they share Lautenberg's concerns but are waiting to see how any consolidation plays out before they commit to staging oversight hearings.

Milwaukee Business Journal, December 16, 2006

Merck & Co. said Thursday that the federal regulatory antitrust waiting period for its $1.1 billion deal to buy Sirna Therapeutics Inc. expired.

The two companies broke news of the deal on Oct. 30, when Merck (NYSE: MRK) said it would pay $13 a share in cash for San Francisco-based Sirna (NASDAQ: RNAI).

The end of the required waiting period satisfies one condition for the deal to be completed. Sirna's stockholders have yet to vote on the deal -- that's set for Dec. 28 in San Francisco's Grand Hyatt Hotel.

Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based Merck is a giant drug company with 61,500 workers.

Sirna seeks treatments for conditions like age-related macular degeneration, asthma and hepatitis C using RNA-interference technology. It has about 70 workers.

Hearst Buys Copley's LA Newsapers; To Sell To MediaNews (AP)

AP, December 16, 2006

TORRANCE, Calif. (AP)--Copley Press Inc. said Friday it sold the Daily Breeze and three weekly newspapers to Hearst Corp. in a deal that will eventually transfer ownership of the Los Angeles-area paper to Denver-based MediaNews Group Inc.

MediaNews, which also owns the Daily News of Los Angeles and other area papers, will run the Breeze while a sale of the papers from Hearst is pending, MediaNews said Friday.

Financial details weren't disclosed. But in court documents filed earlier this month, the purchase price was estimated at $25 million for a deal that includes the Palos Verdes Peninsula News, The Beach Reporter and More San Pedro.

"We are delighted to acquire these fine newspapers and expand our reach in the exciting media market of Los Angeles," said Dean Singleton, chief executive of MediaNews. "The Daily Breeze and its sister weekly newspapers are a wonderful addition to the Los Angeles Newspaper Group."

The Breeze, which has a paid circulation market share of about 3.5% in the Los Angeles area, has an average daily circulation of 70,076 and 284 employees.

Copley also is selling the building that houses the Breeze. MediaNews plans to keep the paper in its current location under a short-term lease with Copley.

The purchase of the Daily Breeze will give MediaNews a stronger foothold in the Los Angeles area. The company's newspapers cover many Southern California suburbs, and its largest holding, the Daily News of Los Angeles, competes against the Los Angeles Times.

Singleton has used a similar approach around the San Francisco Bay area, where he runs the Oakland Tribune and other suburban newspapers that vie for readership against the San Francisco Chronicle.

Copley, parent company of the San Diego Union-Tribune, said in June it wanted to sell its Los Angeles Newspapers, citing competitive pressures in the market.

The complex deal involving New York-based Hearst and MediaNews Group was documented in court filings earlier this month as part of a federal antitrust case targeting their plans to consolidate some business operations of their Bay Area newspapers.

A San Francisco investor is trying to block the consolidation, claiming such cooperation violates antitrust laws.

In the filing in San Francisco, the media companies disclosed plans for Hearst to purchase the Daily Breeze from Copley and then sell it to MediaNews along with two other publications, the Monterey County (Calif.) Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press.

The Daily Breeze is one of 20 newspapers published by Copley, which is based in San Diego.

Copley is the sixth-largest private family owned newspaper group in the U.S. and is the 19th largest newspaper group in the country. Copley also said earlier this year it was exploring the possible sale of its seven newspapers in Ohio and Illinois but intends to retain the Union-Tribune.

The company also operates Copley News Service, which provides news, commentary and features from bureaus in Washington, D.C., Los Angeles, Chicago and Mexico City, as well as in Sacramento and the state capitals of Ohio and Illinois.

The news service shared a Pulitzer Prize in April with the Union-Tribune for exposing the bribery scandal that brought down then-U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

The company that became The Copley Press was started in 1905 in Illinois by Col. Ira C. Copley. He expanded to California in 1928. Helen Copley ran the company from 1973 until her retirement in 2001 and her son, David C. Copley, succeeded her.

Founded by political activist and retired pharmacist S.D. "Doc" Barkley, the Torrance paper began as a weekly in 1894 known as The Breeze. It covered several Los Angeles beach communities before it became part of the Copley family holdings in the late 1920s.

U.S. Regulators Move To Streamline Merger Reviews (NYT)

Hoping to reduce the time and expense involved in the merger review process, the Justice Department's antitrust division on Friday announced changes to its five-year-old guidelines for vetting corporate transactions. Many of the changes focus on the "second request," in which regulators, after launching a preliminary investigation into a deal's competitive effects, extend the waiting period and ask the parties for more information. Among the new provisions is an option that allows companies to limit the scope of the documents they must produce in a second request, the Justice Department said.

Second request have become less common in recent years, according to figures published in a document accompanying Friday's announcement. In the fiscal years 2000 and 2001, before the antitrust division took up its 2001 Merger Review Process Initiative, about 40 percent of preliminary investigations led to second requests. In 2002 and 2003, that percentage fell below 29 percent. In 2004 and 2005, it stood at 24 percent.

Merger reviews have also gotten shorter. Since the 2001 initiative was announced, the average length of time from the opening of a preliminary investigation to the early termination or closing of the investigation has fallen from about 93 days to 57 days, the Justice Department said.

DOJ Announces Reforms To Antitrust Review Policy (WSJ)

By Corey Boles

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, December 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107404

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--The Department of Justice on Friday announced measures to reduce the cost and duration of merger investigations carried out by its antitrust unit.

The voluntary amendments come as part of wider series of measures aimed at reducing the burden on companies going through the merger approval process.

The new option would place limits on the extensiveness of DOJ requests for further information from merging companies. Only certain central files and a targeted list of 30 employees, deemed central to the business, would be searched by the DOJ during a takeover investigation.

In a statement, the DOJ said the new option would be available to most parties whose M&A activities are subject to review by the antitrust division.

In order to qualify, companies must agree to provide requested information to the DOJ early in the merger process, agree to an investigation schedule set by the department and also to a sufficient period for the division to conduct post-complaint discovery.

"Efficient merger enforcement - reaching the right answers as quickly as possible with the least burdens necessary - is one of our top priorities," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the antitrust unit.

Other changes announced Friday would see a shorter default period for reviews from the current three-four years to a new two year period and limitations on when the DOJ can request additional information from companies.

A review of merger policy guidelines began in 2001 aimed at helping the division identify legal, factual and economic issues regarding proposed merger more quickly.

The DOJ said that since reforms began, the average investigation now lasts around 57 days compared to 93 days previously.

DeKalb Raid Ends In Gunfire ATF Agents Shot While Serving 'Firearms-related' Warrant (AJC)

By Mae Gentry, Mike Morris, The Atlanta Journal-constitution.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 16, 2006

Two agents with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives were shot early Friday while serving a warrant at a DeKalb County apartment complex, police said.

One agent was struck in the knee and the other in the lower abdomen. Both men were treated at a local hospital and released.

The shooting occurred before dawn at the Pinewood apartment complex near Panola Road in Lithonia, DeKalb police dispatchers said.

ATF spokesman Marc Jackson said the agents, whose names have not been released, were serving a federal search warrant for "firearms-related offenses."

"They knocked and announced their presence," Jackson said. After they entered the apartment, he said, "they were met with gunfire from within the residence."

Jackson said he did not know whether agents returned fire. After the shooting, other agents talked the suspects out of the apartment.

Jeffrey Pearce, ATF assistant special agent in charge, said two men and a woman were taken to the DeKalb County Jail, where the woman was released. The suspects were not wounded, he said.

Monte Edward, 22, who came to the apartment complex after the shooting, said his cousin lived in the unit raided by authorities and that he had once lived there.

Edward said he received a phone call from a neighbor saying, "Someone's kicking in your door." He said the neighbor screamed and told him, "Somebody's shooting."

Edward said his cousin, 23-year-old Chardriguez Durden, was in the apartment with a woman and a man.

DOJ_NMG_0107405

Durden of Stone Mountain has been charged with six counts of aggravated assault on a police officer and violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act, according to a news release from DeKalb police. Paul Thompson Jr., 19, of Covington has been charged with violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act, the release said.

Federal charges are pending.

Durden's father, Charles Durden, 47, of Snellville came to the scene as federal agents were removing bags from the apartment. It was unclear what was in the bags.

"I just don't get it," the father said. "You come, kick in somebody's door at 4 o'clock in the morning and what do you expect? This area has had a lot of burglaries and home invasions."

Chardriguez Durden's attorney, Tony Mathis, said the apartment had been burglarized twice before and that his client was afraid.

"He fired from his bedroom through the door," Mathis said. "When he heard them say 'police,' he put the weapon down and laid on the ground.

"All of them were afraid. They thought someone was breaking into the house."

Mathis said Chardriguez Durden was concerned about the wounded agents. The attorney also said the weapon the agents wanted was not in the apartment.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigrants' Families Figuring Out What To Do After Federal Raids (NYT)

By Julia Preston

Immigrant families scrambled yesterday to find detained relatives, arrange care for children of deported parents and recover from the loss of work as a result of raids this week by immigration authorities at meat-packing plants in six states.

The raids, part of a federal operation against identity theft, had stunning effects on the surrounding towns, residents said. In all, 1,282 legal and illegal immigrants were arrested, and in most cases the plants, all operated by Swift & Company of Greeley, Colo., were the largest employer around.

"Many people are still very frightened," Mayor Luis Aguilar of Cactus, Tex., said.

In Cactus, 275 employees were arrested.

In Worthington, Minn., with 230 arrests, residents said dozens of immigrants had gone into hiding.

"I've never seen anything like it, the sadness, the emptiness, the fear," a schoolteacher, Barbara Kremer, said. Ms. Kremer said she had provided shelter in her house since the raid for 24 immigrants who were afraid to return to their homes.

The raids, by Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents, netted dozens of immigrants who were legal residents but did not have their papers with them at work. Others arrested were illegal who have to leave the country or face deportation.

Many have children or spouses who are legal residents or Americans, and they have to decide whether the families will stay here or return to their home countries.

Veronica Rodriguez Perez, 20, an American who is works on a production line at the Swift beef-processing plant in Greeley, Colo., said she had not been able to talk with her husband, a Guatemalan, since he was arrested on Tuesday. Mrs. Perez said immigration agents separated during the raid from her husband, Roberto Pérez García.

"They made him and myself seem like criminals," she said. "He tried to give me a kiss on the forehead, but they would not let us talk to each other."

Mr. Pérez worked in the slaughterhouse side of the plant, she said. They have an 11-month-old son who was born in Colorado. Mr. Pérez, who was in the United States illegally, had not applied for residency because of the legal costs, she said.

Many of the arrested immigrants were taken to Camp Dodge in Johnston, Iowa, a National Guard base. Others were bussed to an immigration detention center in Atlanta for deportation proceedings.

The chief executive officer of Swift, Sam Rovit, said that production was slightly slowed at the plants, but that the losses in replacing the workers could be in the millions.

Swift executives said they had sought to work with immigration officials to pre-empt the raids. In March, the immigration agency subpoenaed the work documents of every Swift employee. After reviewing the papers, the agency retained them for many employees, including 665 at a plant in Marshalltown, Iowa, on suspicion that they were fake or stolen, Donald F. Wiseman, the Swift general counsel, said.

Swift began to interview its employees. About 400 left the company after the interviews, with many acknowledging that their documents were not legal, Mr. Wiseman said. He added that the immigration agency later ordered the company to stop the interviews.

On Nov. 28, Swift sought an injunction against the raids in Federal court in Amarillo, Tex. Judge Mary Lou Robinson denied the request.

Mr. Rovit said Swift, third largest meatpacker in the nation, paid good wages by industry standards, twice the minimum wage, with health benefits. With tight profit margins, he added, Swift would be hard-pressed to replace the workers for work, which is demanding and has historically attracted immigrants, including immigrants without proper documents.

"Nobody wants to have illegal immigrants," Mr. Rovit said.

He said a continued crackdown would bring "a shrinking in the industry, because there is not enough labor to go around."

Prosecutors in several states began filing criminal charges against accused suppliers of the illegal documents. In Salt Lake City, officials unsealed a complaint against Veronica Carrillo, a Mexican immigrant accused of selling real United States birth certificates to Swift employees.

Rift Over Illegal Immigration Leads To Talk Of Secession (NYT)

By Paul Vitello

FARMINGVILLE, N.Y., Dec. 14 — Assuming a new name has often been part of the immigration experience. Now this Long Island hamlet, bruised for a decade by its reputation as a place where illegal immigrant day laborers crowd into rooming houses, is considering a name change of its own.

Farmingville, or at least the more affluent half of it, where few if any of the new immigrants live, would have itself be known instead as the village of Oak Hills.

Some people here acknowledge this is a kind of white flight by incorporation — a maneuver pioneered 20 years ago when an enclave within the increasingly Hispanic community of Central Islip, in Suffolk County, broke off to become the village of Islandia.

But many of the homeowners here who have signed a secession petition in recent days say that they are not leaving Farmingville — Farmingville has left them.

Now known as an illegal immigrants' haven, the community has been the scene of frequent demonstrations by residents, and by groups that come periodically to taunt the day laborers. On CNN, Lou Dobbs marks Farmingville with pushpins regularly on the map of his continuing crusade against illegal immigration.

And then there is the movie. A documentary based on a 2000 attack in which two men beat two Mexican day laborers almost to death evinced a complex portrait of the community but left the overriding impression that Farmingville is a place without pity. The film, which won a Sundance Film Festival prize, is titled simply — and many here think unfairly — "Farmingville."

"It seems like every time something is said about Farmingville, it's a negative rather than a positive," said Del DeMarino, 63, a resident since 1972 who is the chief organizer of the Committee for an Incorporated Village. "It's just not possible to change that now."

Demographers say the majority of immigrants are now settling in suburbia, where frustration with perceived federal inaction against illegal newcomers has led to a variety of ad-hoc local initiatives. In Suffolk County, for example, there have been crackdowns on overcrowded rooming houses in Farmingville and other areas, and laws passed against employment of illegal immigrants, neither of which has had much effect.

Unable to build fences like the 700-mile one proposed for the Mexican border, a handful of unincorporated communities like Farmingville are seizing on self-rule as a tool of self-preservation — or, as some see it, self-segregation.

"We know what they're talking about when they say they want to separate from 'Farmingville' — they mean the Mexicans," said William White, a local resident who opposes the name change.

Mr. DeMarino, a salesman for a shipping company and a Republican active in local politics, said immigration was not his only motivation.

There are fingers of other ZIP codes and hamlets that lie across parts of Farmingville, and the new village would incorporate them, he said, "giving us one identity." There is also a state road improvement project about to begin, and an incorporated village may be able to wield more influence over it than an unincorporated area.

But as he steered his Jeep through streets of widely spaced homes, elaborately decorated for Christmas, on the wealthier side of Farmingville that would become Oak Hills, Mr. DeMarino acknowledged that it was mainly the "stigma thing."

"See that house?" he said, pointing to a two-story colonial-style home with a broad lawn. "That house has been on the market for eight months. He dropped the price three times. Nice house. But if you are trying to sell a house in Farmingville, you have a problem."

Asked if that might have more to do with the slowing real estate market, Mr. DeMarino said Farmingville's notoriety compounded the problem.

Hard by the Long Island Expressway, Farmingville is an unincorporated area in the Town of Brookhaven. According to the 2000 census, 8 percent of its 16,000 residents were Hispanic, up from 3 percent in 1990.

In what passes for downtown, a stretch of broad boulevard dividing the east and west sides of Farmingville, the storefronts feature an unusual number of Laundromats within a few short blocks (three), money-order vendors specializing in international transfers and inexpensive, footlocker-size luggage (two), and window advertisements in Spanish (innumerable).

Miriam Valenciano, who owns a small house behind the downtown district, was skeptical when told about the proposed name change. "You mean we'll have an upper-class Farmingville and a lower-class Farmingville," she said. "That's what it sounds like to me. I think it's a little derogatory."

Inside a variety store, a man who gave his name only as John bought large stacks of tickets from a New York State Lottery machine. "What about the taxes?" he said when asked about the Oak Hills proposal. "They start a new village, there's new taxes, right? I don't want nothing to do with it."

Advocates of the plan say residents of the new village would have to pay only a minimal amount in new taxes to cover clerical costs. Services like garbage collection, road maintenance and snow removal would probably be handled through a contract with the township, and are unlikely to significantly change most residents' tax bills.

Exact boundaries have not been determined, but the proposed village of Oak Hills — named for the oak trees that thrive in the sandy soil of this part of the island — would be a tract of land in the western half of Farmingville where homes sell for about $500,000 and up, according to local real estate agents. It would exclude houses in the eastern half that are generally valued about $100,000 less.

Many of those cheaper houses on the east side have been converted, often illegally, into makeshift apartments for the men who get picked up in trucks for construction and landscaping jobs each morning.

"I've got nothing against those people, they work hard, but I think we have a right to protect our property values," said Joseph Alfini, 53, a retired electrician who lives in the core of the proposed village. "The landlords who rent these rooms out, they cannot afford to buy houses over here. If we have our own building department, we can keep it that way."

The Rev. Alan Ramirez, a vigorous defender of the day laborers, said of the movement: "They don't need to change their name. What they need to change is their attitude of hostility toward their neighbors."

State law requires any new village to have a minimum of 500 inhabitants and a contiguous area of not more than five square miles; Oak Hills would probably have about 3,000 residents. Once petitions are signed by 20 percent of the registered voters within the proposed boundaries, a majority vote in an election referendum would establish the new village.

Farmingville's secessionists began collecting petitions last month and hope to hold an election early in the new year.

Mr. DeMarino, the leader of the campaign, was interviewed at his home the other day while a crew of three Spanish-speaking women cleaned his house. A member of the town Republican committee, he has run twice unsuccessfully for councilman in the Town of Brookhaven.

DOJ_NMG_0107408

Asked whether he might like to be mayor of Oak Hills someday, Mr. DeMarino smiled and said, “I cannot entertain that notion at this time.”

TAX:

Last-Minute Lawmaking By Hastert, Reid (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

In the wee hours of the morning Dec. 7, Senate negotiators rejected a Medicare measure pushed by outgoing House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) that would have meant big revenues for an insurance company in Hastert's home state. But a day later, the $100 million proposal was alive and well, paired with a plan for a major Nevada land swap backed by Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), the incoming Senate majority leader.

The leaders' dealmaking went on behind the scenes during the final, frenetic hours of the 109th Congress. Hastert's provision, which would give certain Medicare beneficiaries additional time to change their health-care coverage, and Reid's plan, which involves more than 900 square miles of federal land, were included in a massive tax and trade measure approved by Congress shortly before its final adjournment early last Saturday morning.

Both provisions have been criticized as potentially harmful to public interests. Land-use activists complained this week that Reid's provision would sell too much of the federal land to private developers and that it circumvents land-disposal procedures. Several senior senators objected to Hastert's provision on the floor of the Senate, saying it favored one type of Medicare plan over others. Representatives of Aon Corp., an insurance company based in Hastert's home state, lobbied for the provision.

The Hastert measure "creates an unlevel playing field," said Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), the incoming chairman of the Finance Committee. Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), the outgoing chairman of the tax-writing committee, added: "I am also disappointed in the process that led to the provision being included in the bill."

Baucus, Grassley and incoming Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said they will probably attempt to strike the Medicare provision when the new Congress convenes next year.

The Hastert and Reid provisions were parts of an amendment quietly inserted in the $50 billion, 10-year tax and trade bill on a procedural vote. The huge bill was treated by lawmakers as the last legislative train out of town. Other provisions slipped in at the last minute included a $1 billion expansion of health savings accounts, a Republican-backed program that allows tax-free savings for health care, and 520 tariff suspensions worth tens of millions of dollars to U.S. corporations.

The last-minute deal involving Hastert and Reid apparently began with a phone call on the afternoon of Dec. 7 from Reid to House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), according to a senior Democratic Senate aide familiar with the private negotiations.

Reid asked why his land provision had not been included in the tax and trade bill. Thomas brought up the subject of Hastert's amendment and said it was his intention to add it to the bill in tandem with Reid's measure, according to the senior aide. Several people familiar with the talks -- both Democrats and Republicans -- suggested that one provision was exchanged for the other, but spokesmen for Reid and Hastert said they do not believe there was a trade.

The Hastert provision would allow certain Medicare beneficiaries -- those who receive physician and hospital benefits through the original Medicare program -- to switch their health coverage after the open-enrollment period for Medicare closes at the end of March. The provision also limits the type of plan that they can choose as an alternative: those that do not offer prescription drug coverage.

Representatives of Aon Corp. lobbied Congress for the policy. According to a listing on the Web site of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, Aon's Sterling Life Insurance Co. subsidiary is one of fewer than two dozen companies, most of them smaller, regional firms, that offer private fee-for-service plans without drug coverage -- the type of plan that the provision would benefit most.

Most organizations offer plans that combine Medicare physician, hospital and prescription drug benefits. The groups that would be aided by the provision, such as Sterling, concentrate on offering private health plans under Medicare that allow beneficiaries to get drug coverage through a different organization. The measure's cost would result from the additional Medicare patients who switch to such programs, which cost the government more money.

A Hastert spokesman said the speaker pressed for the provision to expand enrollment in Medicare plans overall. Aon officials repeatedly declined to comment.

Reid's provision would designate 900 square miles of Nevada as wilderness and would allow 70 square miles to possibly be sold to private investors. It is one of several proposals by Reid that would make large stretches of federal land in Nevada a combination of wilderness and private development. Proceeds of the land sales would go to assist local governments. Reid's Republican colleague from Nevada, Sen. John Ensign, co-sponsored the provision.

Some environmental groups approve of the land provision; one is the Campaign for America's Wilderness, which likes the way it expands wilderness designations. Other groups, such as the Seattle-based Western Lands Project, decry the loss of land to developers and the loss of revenue for the government.

"He's selling off federal land that belongs to all of us and keeping the money in Nevada," said Janine Blaeloch, director of the Western Lands Project.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Reid, defended the provision as a way to protect wilderness areas, improve water conservation and enhance fire-prevention efforts. "The bill was the subject of numerous negotiations with stakeholders and will protect more than 500,000 acres of wild and sensitive public land as wilderness," Manley said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Incoming Chairmen Ready To Investigate (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

Incoming Democratic committee chairmen say they will hold a series of hearings and investigations early next year to build the case for their call for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq and for possible action against defense contractors found to have wasted billions in federal funds.

The emerging plans to grill administration officials on the conduct of the war are part of a pledge for more aggressive congressional oversight on issues such as prewar intelligence, prisoner treatment at Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo Bay, and the government's use of warrantless wiretaps.

Among the most eager incoming chairmen is Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), a lawyer with a professor's demeanor and a prosecutor's doggedness. As head of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Levin, 72, will be his party's point man on the Iraq war and on the Democrats' call to begin withdrawing troops in the coming months.

Levin said he also plans inquiries into "documentation of waste and fraud and abuse in the contracting areas" of the military. Aggressive oversight "is not just a budget issue," he said, but at some point "becomes a significant moral issue." In the House, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), another leading advocate of a phased withdrawal, has vowed to use his Appropriations subcommittee chairmanship to investigate the Iraq war, holding "two hearings a day for the first three or four months . . . to find out exactly what happened and who's been responsible for these mistakes."

In committee after committee next month, the gavel will be handed by Bush allies to ardent Democrats deeply frustrated by what they see as the GOP-led Congress's refusal to conduct meaningful oversight and to hold the executive branch accountable.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said he will use his Judiciary Committee perch to conduct "real oversight" of the FBI and the Justice Department and to delve into "the abuse of billions of taxpayers' dollars sent as development aid to Iraq."

"I am not prepared to accept answers like 'I can't talk about it,' " Leahy said in a recent speech at Georgetown University's law school.

Levin, a sharp critic of the administration's use of prewar intelligence, will have new, substantial powers to press the White House for information and for a new direction in Iraq.

In a recent interview in his Senate office, Levin said the Senate Armed Services Committee's first priority will be to seek ways to stabilize Iraq and gradually disengage the United States from the war. But the committee will also hold retrospective hearings, he said, to determine whether administration officials manipulated intelligence before the war and whether the post-invasion provisional government abused its contracting powers and wasted huge sums of money.

"There is a responsibility from a lessons-learned perspective and an accountability perspective to fill in the blanks," said Levin, who voted against authorizing the war in 2002. "And there have been a number of blanks." Some lower-level military personnel have been held accountable for matters such as detainee mistreatment, he said, "but almost none in the intelligence community."

Having Levin replace John W. Warner (R-Va.) as chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee will "hugely" change oversight, said Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), a longtime colleague. Rockefeller, incoming chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, also plans more aggressive hearings.

"Oversight doesn't have to be a hostile process," Rockefeller said. But he said he and Levin are determined to overcome the administration's long-standing refusal to hand over documents concerning the White House contention in 2002 and 2003 that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. "The public must understand that you can't do that," Rockefeller said.

Warner is not considered an administration apologist, but the committee's posture is certain to be more combative as soon as Levin assumes the chairmanship, colleagues and analysts said.

Levin "takes issues of oversight and hearings and authorization very seriously, and he guards very carefully the prerogatives of Congress," said Kurt Campbell, a former Pentagon official now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Levin will quiz military commanders on their advice about Iraq, Campbell said, and he will dig deeply into allegations of mismanagement and favoritism in the granting of contracts and plum jobs after the fall of Hussein.

"I think the Republicans will bristle at some of the things he wants to do," Campbell said, "because this really gets to the question of whether the previous Congress dropped the ball."

Levin plans to use his new powers in his long-running dispute with the Bush administration over the conduct of Douglas J. Feith, former undersecretary of defense for policy. Levin says Feith exaggerated the relationship between Hussein's government and al-Qaeda when the Bush administration was trying to build public support for the Iraq invasion.

The administration's repeated refusal to give Levin 58 documents related to Feith's activities is about to be tested. "We're entitled to those documents," Levin said. "If necessary, I intend to subpoena those documents."

Levin's House counterpart, incoming Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), also plans Iraq-related hearings. "His big priorities are support for our troops and their families; readiness, especially in the Army and Marine Corps; oversight; and Afghanistan, which he feels is the forgotten war," said his spokeswoman, Loren Dealy. "His concerns have been the lack of oversight in general. He feels it has not been adequate."

Levin said Iraq's future is his top priority. The situation "has got to be solved by the Iraqis politically," he said. "There is no military solution to it."

He said the 2003 invasion obligated the United States to help post-Hussein Iraq get back on its feet. "We have carried out that obligation," Levin said. "We've been there three years plus. We've given them the opportunity."

Levin said he plans later hearings on the abuses of Iraqi detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison and the treatment of terrorism suspects at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and elsewhere.

Under Warner, the committee showed some interest in those topics, Levin said, "but the subpoenas haven't gone out, obviously. We may have to issue subpoenas in that area as well."

Johnson Improving (SFAL)

By Faith Bremner

Sioux Falls Argus Leader, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Tim Johnson continued to make progress Friday in his recovery from a brain hemorrhage and surgery two days earlier.

The South Dakota Democrat was in critical but stable condition in the intensive care unit at George Washington University Hospital, according to his staff and doctors late Friday.

"Considering his initial presentation, his progress is encouraging," said Dr. Anthony Caputy, one of three neurosurgeons who operated on the senator Wednesday night to relieve pressure on the brain.

"He is now stabilized and continues to show signs of responsiveness to the medical staff and the family," Caputy said in the statement.

Patients with brain hemorrhages, such as the one Johnson had, typically experience post-operative brain swelling, Caputy said.

"Much like a bruise, it takes time to heal," Caputy said.

Doctors are monitoring the senator's progress with CT scans, the most recent of which was done Friday morning. That scan showed that the pressure on his brain is now normal and that there is no further bleeding, the statement said.

To prevent the risk of blood clots going to his lungs, doctors placed a special filter in a major vein Thursday night in a procedure done at his bedside. Johnson will stay in the hospital until his overall condition improves. He probably will undergo physical therapy because of weakness on his right side, the medical team said.Held his wife's hand

Johnson's wife, Barbara, said her husband was responding to her voice and following directions and that he had reached for her hand and held it. Johnson has also opened his eyes.

Johnson, a two-term Democrat, was diagnosed with congenital arteriovenous malformation (AVM), a condition that occurs when a tangle of blood vessels in the brain bypasses normal brain tissue and directly diverts blood from the arteries to the veins.

Over time, the veins can enlarge and bleed into the brain. Johnson probably was born with the condition.

His illness triggered a rash of speculation in the news media about what would happen to the Senate if Johnson were not able to serve.

The Senate is divided 51-49 in favor of the Democrats. If Johnson were to resign or die, and South Dakota's Republican governor were to appoint a Republican replacement, control of the Senate could shift to the GOP.

For the first time since Johnson was taken to the hospital Wednesday afternoon with stroke-like symptoms, his family and staff got some sleep Thursday night, said Julianne Fisher, a spokeswoman for Johnson.

South Dakotans also watched Johnson's progress closely this week.

Dan Christopherson, the mayor of Vermillion and a friend of Johnson's, said it was a shock to hear of Johnson's illness because he always appeared to be the picture of good health.

Chamberlain Lawyer Leonard Andera has known Johnson since the senator was a young man in Vermillion, and he said people in Chamberlain who know of his relationship with Johnson have asked him for updates.

"There's a lot of talk about the critical condition, but I just say, anytime they mess around with your brain, it's going to be critical for the first several hours, no matter how successful things are," Andera said.

Christopherson said: "I think if anyone can pull through this, it'd be Tim. He's a tough character."

Surgery "Considered A Success," Senator's Office Says (WP)

By David Brown

Wednesday's operation to stop bleeding in Sen. Tim Johnson's brain was "considered a success," his office said yesterday, although the few details released about his condition suggested he was not fully conscious two days after the procedure.

The statement quoted Anthony Caputy, one of the surgeons who performed the emergency surgery on Johnson (D-S.D.), as saying: "Considering his initial presentation, his progress is encouraging. He is now stabilized and continues to show signs of responsiveness to the medical staff and the family."

Johnson, 59, briefly became incoherent on Wednesday. He was rushed to George Washington University Hospital and diagnosed with an arteriovenous malformation, an unstable tangle of blood vessels in his brain. The malformation bled Wednesday night, and surgeons operated to stop the hemorrhage and remove a large clot that was pressing on his brain.

The pressure inside Johnson's brain is now normal and he has not bled further, the statement said. It noted that after events like his, the brain is often swollen.

"Much like a bruise, it takes time to heal," Caputy is quoted as saying.

Johnson's physicians also put a filter-like device in his inferior vena cava, the largest vein the body, which carries blood back to the heart from the legs, abdomen and chest. It will catch any clots that may form in his leg or pelvic veins and that could dislodge and travel to his lungs -- a potentially fatal event.

Such clots can form when a person is immobile for a long time. Normally, physicians give such patients the anticoagulant heparin to prevent clots. With Johnson's recent bleeding, however, that would be too risky.

Senator Showing Weakness After Surgery (NYT)

By Kate Zernike, Lawrence K. Altman

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15 — Senator Tim Johnson of South Dakota was showing weakness on his right side on Friday after surgery to relieve bleeding in his brain, his office said, and will remain in the hospital until the swelling in his brain goes down.

“The surgery was considered a success,” the office said in a statement.

Surgeons removed the blood during a procedure late Wednesday and stabilized the bleeding, the statement said, relieving the pressure on the brain.

Mr. Johnson, 59, remains in the intensive care unit at George Washington University Hospital in critical but stable condition.

“Considering his initial presentation, his progress is encouraging,” Dr. Anthony Caputy, the chairman of the hospital’s department of neurosurgery, said in the statement, adding that Mr. Johnson continues to show “signs of responsiveness” to hospital staff and his family.

Mr. Johnson, a Democrat, began to stutter Wednesday while on a conference call with reporters, then walked back to his office, aides said. After being examined by the Capitol physician, he was admitted to George Washington University Hospital with what his office called “the symptoms of a stroke.”

His illness raised the possibility that the Democrats might lose the 51-to-49 majority they are expecting to assume in the Senate that convenes in early January.

Doctors said the bleeding was caused by a rare tangling of the blood vessels in the brain, known as a congenital arteriovenous malformation. It affects about 300,000 Americans, but only in about one in 10 cases is there bleeding. About half of those with bleeding end up with almost imperceptible damage, doctors say, and about 10 percent to 20 percent suffer damage so severe they cannot function as they did before the bleeding.

Mr. Johnson’s doctors said the post-operative swelling of his brain was normal. They had done a CT scan of the brain Friday morning, they said, and it showed no further bleeding, but they said they would continue to monitor this for several days.

Mr. Johnson, who is right-handed, experienced significant weakness on the right side of his body from the stroke and will need long-term physical therapy to regain the function of his arm and leg, his office said.

Even if his condition improves rapidly, he may need such therapy to help regain the ability to walk, write, dress and get in and out of a car.

Mr. Johnson’s initial symptom from the stroke was apparently the speech difficulty he experienced while talking with reporters on Wednesday. Mr. Johnson is sedated, as is standard in care for his type of illness. If the speech difficulty continues after the sedation is lightened, Mr. Johnson may need speech rehabilitation, the statement indicated.

Mr. Johnson may also need further brain surgery because while the surgeons removed the blood that leaked from the malformation, they did not repair the malformation, according to the statement.

Senator Is Showing Signs Of Recovery (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0107413

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson, whose emergency brain surgery this week raised the prospect of a shift in power in the Senate, showed signs of recovery Friday, his office said.

Considering the seriousness of the medical problem found in Johnson's brain, "his progress is encouraging," Dr. Anthony Caputy said in a statement released by the lawmaker's staff.

Caputy was a member of the team that operated on the 59-year-old South Dakotan on Wednesday night.

Johnson was experiencing post-surgery swelling in his brain, but that was considered routine. "Much like a bruise, it takes time to heal," Caputy said.

With Democrats having captured a 51-49 majority in the Senate that convenes in January, Johnson's condition has riveted Washington's political community.

Should Johnson die or resign from office, South Dakota's Republican governor has the authority to replace him. If he chose a Republican as a replacement, the Senate would be knotted at 50-50. Vice President Dick Cheney, the Senate's presiding officer, would break the tie, returning the chamber to Republican control. But news of Johnson's increasing alertness substantially quelled such speculation.

After becoming disoriented Wednesday, Johnson was rushed to George Washington University Hospital, where doctors performed emergency surgery to relieve bleeding in his head stemming from the congenital defect arteriovenous malformation.

AVM, as the condition is called, can lead to speech problems, paralysis or, in rare cases, death.

A CT scan performed on Johnson early Friday showed "that the pressure has been relieved from his brain, and there is no further bleeding," Dr. Vivek Deshmukh, the lead surgeon, said in the statement from the senator's office. "Currently, his brain pressures are normal," Deshmukh said.

Johnson's office has not disclosed the precise location of the tangle of arteries and veins that caused the bleeding, a critical factor in determining what kind of long-term effects he may suffer.

Johnson was complaining of weakness on his right side when he arrived at the hospital. Doctors said they anticipated that physical therapy would be part of his recovery process.

Democrats Arrive At The Heart Of The Matter (NYT)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

Washington

The Democrats are positioned to make a down payment to the voters who gave them majority control of the House and the Senate. Their ability to pay in full is another question.

House Democrats, more than their Senate colleagues, can set certain partisan markers: a minimum-wage hike, ethics reform, reduced student loan interest rates and changes in labor law, which will make union organizing less difficult.

As the majority, Democratic leaders and committee chairs can focus public attention on job, pension and health care security issues; publicize evidence of decreased mobility on the economic ladder; and spotlight the growing vulnerability of middle-income families to sharp and sudden downward financial swings.

The threat to the middle class is real. “I won by almost 13 points, with almost no newspaper endorsements, against an incumbent who had given out $1 billion in projects,” says Sherrod Brown, a new senator for Ohio. “It was because of the strength of our message about the middle class.”

So much for the down payment. After that, the going for the Democrats gets tougher. They will encounter two roadblocks: Republican chokeholds on federal spending, meant to “starve the beast” by radically depleting coffers, and intense internal Democratic policy conflicts.

Democrats on the House Budget and Appropriations Committees released a report early this month, titled The Republican Legacy, which describes the spending restrictions confronting them. The 110th Congress “will face a fiscal challenge of historic proportions. The cost of the Iraq war, coupled with the growing price tag of tax cuts passed over the previous six years, have left the nation deeper in debt than ever." (Since 2002, Congress has appropriated $379 billion for the Iraq war.)

One solution, raising taxes, is widely seen as a third rail for Democrats. "We are not talking about that now," said a spokesman for the incoming speaker, Nancy Pelosi.

The intraparty conflict pits its business and labor wings against each other on policies dealing with the international marketplace. Should lawmakers encourage the flow of cheap goods from China to stock the shelves of Wal-Mart, benefiting American shoppers, many of whom are low income? Or should policy be designed to protect American jobs and wages by raising trade barriers?

This split is profound. Barney Frank — echoing a large swath of his party — contends that this nation's "enormous economic power" could be used to stem the hemorrhage of services and production overseas. Trade agreements could be made contingent upon rules requiring that China and other countries abide by environmental and labor standards. "People greatly exaggerate the value of a cheap T-shirt," Frank says, upholding the position of organized labor and dismissing the argument that such goals are unattainable and unenforceable.

A leading Democratic proponent of free trade, who does not want to publicly engage the topic yet, has a counterargument, that China is moving full speed ahead, that "you cannot put labor provisions into a trade agreement with China. They'll walk away." That globalization is inexorable. That "we are either going to be inside the net or outside the net." That America needs to deal with dislocation effects and negative distribution consequences. He points out that Midwestern law firms are outsourcing research to India, that the U.S. needs a better education system, that Korea has a national broadband infrastructure, that Shanghai and Beijing airports are more modern than J.F.K., that key military agencies no longer support basic research.

He argues that chemical plants need security and that America needs universal health coverage. "There's a lot we can do to make it better," he says, like locating businesses in the U.S. in clusters around universities, and locating production closer to centers of "intellectual ferment." He is firm on one point: "We need to get back on track fiscally. We have to have higher revenue. Business is not supporting taxes. They rail against government spending. We don't have the means to pay for what we need."

This conflict goes to the heart of Democratic struggles to develop a credible economic policy. The Democrats have a two-year window in which to confront their internal schisms and to present a stronger face to the electorate in 2008.

Violence Builds Between Palestinian Factions (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 15 -- Rival Palestinian factions exchanged gunfire Friday in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, leaving more than 30 people wounded, as leaders from both parties warned of an escalation that could push the territories toward a deeper conflict.

The secular Fatah and Islamic Hamas movements, each with an armed wing, have been engaged in a political struggle for much of the year, but the latest unrest has been more brazen and regular than previous confrontations.

The day began with leaders of the governing Hamas movement accusing an influential Fatah lawmaker, Mohammed Dahlan, of orchestrating an outbreak of shooting at a border crossing the previous evening as Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh's convoy passed. The gunfire killed Haniyeh's bodyguard and wounded his son and a political adviser, among others.

"We joined this movement in order to be martyrs, not ministers," Haniyeh told tens of thousands of Hamas supporters gathered in Gaza City's Yarmouk Stadium for a rally celebrating the radical Islamic movement's 19th anniversary. "The Palestinian government will not remain with its hands tied in light of what happened."

Hours earlier, Hamas spokesman Ismail Radwan told reporters in Gaza that Dahlan "bears direct responsibility for the assassination attempt" against Haniyeh, who had been returning from an overseas trip cut short because of rising partisan violence in the territories.

The accusation came at the end of a week of partisan reprisals in Gaza, set off by the fatal shooting Monday of a Fatah-affiliated intelligence officer's three young sons. Fatah officials accused Hamas of carrying out the shooting. Hamas officials denied any involvement.

Leaders of the two parties have been negotiating for months to form a new power-sharing government acceptable to foreign donors, who cut off economic aid to the Palestinian Authority following Hamas's victory in January legislative elections. Hamas has refused to recognize Israel's right to exist -- a key condition for the restoration of aid -- and is classified as a terrorist organization by the United States, the European Union and Israel.

The unity-government talks have recently broken down. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, a Fatah leader, signaled last week that he may call new general elections in hopes of resolving the crisis. He is scheduled to give a national address Saturday outlining his plans. The Hamas cabinet announced Friday that it would boycott the speech.

Hamas officials have said they will not accept new elections less than a year into their four-year term, and it is unclear whether Abbas has the legal authority to call for the vote. But Abbas has been reluctant to fire Haniyeh, which he has the power to do, for fear of exacerbating partisan tensions.

Fatah officials reacted angrily to Radwan's accusation, which preceded gunfights in Gaza City and in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Dahlan headed the Preventive Security Service in the 1990s during a crackdown on Hamas activists in the Gaza Strip. He is a powerful figure in Gaza and has many followers in the security services.

In an interview with the satellite channel al-Arabiya, Dahlan, who is also an Abbas confidant, said the accusations "are not worth answering."

Early Friday, Hamas activists rallied in the streets of Gaza for demonstrations marking the anniversary celebration. A Hamas-dominated security force had deployed across the city.

But gunfire broke out around the marchers, possibly from Fatah loyalists in the area. The shooting lasted several minutes, witnesses said, but there were no reports of casualties.

Around the same time, members of the Fatah-controlled security services in Ramallah moved against a Hamas anniversary march with clubs and shields, witnesses there said. Gunfire broke out soon after. Hospital officials said more than 30 people were wounded, most if not all of them from Hamas.

"What we are seeing is the beginning of an ugly civil war," Fatah lawmaker Saeb Erekat told reporters in Ramallah. He said Fatah would hold Hamas responsible for any attempt to harm Dahlan.

Palestinian Factional Strife Escalates Into Gunfights Between Fatah And Hamas (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 15 — The Palestinians seemed to edge toward open civil conflict on Friday as Hamas, the faction that controls the government, accused its rival, Fatah, of trying to assassinate the prime minister. Gunmen from the two factions clashed in the streets, wounding at least 30 men.

Fatah denied that it had tried to kill the prime minister, Ismail Haniya. But the accusation and shooting raised the stakes in the bitter confrontation between Fatah, the faction that is led by the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and controls branches of the security forces, and Hamas, the radical Islamic group in charge of most of the government.

“What a war, Mahmoud Abbas, you are launching, first against God and then against Hamas,” a Hamas leader, Khalil al-Hayya, told tens of thousands of Hamas supporters at a rally at a sports stadium in Gaza City.

Hamas staged rallies in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank to mark the 19th anniversary of its founding. The injuries occurred outside a mosque in Ramallah, in the West Bank.

In recent years Palestinian factions have periodically battled one another, but they have always stopped short of all-out confrontation. The violence and the heated oratory in recent days, though, have increased talk about such a confrontation, or even the possibility of a Palestinian civil war.

The clashes on Friday came on the eve of an important speech by Mr. Abbas, who was expected on Saturday to spell out his plan for ending months of political deadlock. Hamas said it would boycott the speech, to be delivered in Ramallah.

Friday's events were an extension of a strange episode on Thursday, when Israel demanded the closing of the border between Egypt and the Gaza Strip to stop Mr. Haniya from returning to Gaza with tens of millions of dollars in cash after a tour of the Middle East.

Hamas officials have been secretly taking suitcases of cash into Gaza because Israel, the United States and the European Union have cut off the flow of money to the Palestinian government since Hamas came to power, saying it is a terrorist group.

On Friday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in an interview with [a news organization] that she planned to request tens of millions of dollars from Congress to help Mr. Abbas's security forces.

The border standoff, which lasted seven hours, quickly turned into an internal Palestinian battle. Hamas gunmen stormed the Rafah border terminal in southern Gaza to support Mr. Haniya, who was stranded on the Egyptian side. The Hamas gunmen first clashed with the Palestinian security forces, who are loyal to Mr. Abbas. Later they battled Egyptian security forces on the other side of the frontier.

Mr. Haniya was eventually allowed to enter Gaza after leaving the money with Hamas officials who stayed behind in Egypt. As Mr. Haniya was leaving the border area in the back of a pickup truck, his convoy came under fire. In the truck, one bodyguard was killed and one of Mr. Haniya's sons and one of his political advisers were wounded.

At a news conference in Gaza City, Hamas alleged that Muhammad Dahlan, a powerful Fatah member of parliament and a former security chief in Gaza, was behind the shooting. "Muhammad Dahlan bears the direct responsibility for the assassination attempt which targeted the prime minister," said Ismail Radwan, a Hamas spokesman.

Mr. Dahlan already had an extremely tense relationship with Hamas. He was responsible for crackdowns against the group when he was in charge of the preventive security force in Gaza in the 1990s. Mr. Dahlan is from Gaza, the Hamas stronghold, but now spends much of his time in the West Bank.

He rejected the charge. "Hamas's allegations are simply a means of masking its failures towards the Palestinian people," Mr. Dahlan said. "The Hamas government is fully responsible for yesterday's events."

In Gaza City, Hamas gunmen waged a brief battle with security forces aligned with Fatah near Mr. Dahlan's home. No injuries were reported.

In his speech at the Hamas rally in Gaza City, Mr. Haniya described the shooting a day earlier. "When my convoy started moving there was fire from all over," he said. "The youths formed a human shield around me. Then this martyr fell directly next to me," a reference to his slain bodyguard.

Mr. Haniya said his government had the names of those involved, but he did not divulge them, and did not blame Fatah or any other group by name. "We are going to give these names to the minister of interior and we are going to implement the law," Mr. Haniya said.

In his remarks, Mr. Haniya said Hamas's achievements since its founding in 1987 included two uprisings against Israel and the withdrawal of Israeli soldiers and settlers from the Gaza Strip.

While he also noted Hamas's political successes in winning parliamentary elections and heading the government, he suggested that those were less important. "We have joined this movement to become martyrs and not ministers," he said, referring to the willingness of many Hamas members to die for their cause.

Friday's violence centered on Ramallah, where Hamas supporters tried to march to the city center following midday prayers at one of the main mosques. Security force members aligned with Fatah used batons to beat and push back demonstrators.

The security forces also fired into the air, and later into the crowd, according to witnesses. Hamas supporters threw stones and bottles. Several of the wounded suffered gunshot wounds.

The Hamas-Fatah tensions, and other internal Palestinian disputes, have been growing worse for months, and this week appeared to mark a new low, with several deadly shootings.

In an attack that outraged Palestinians, unidentified gunmen shot to death three brothers, ages 3 to 9, as they were being driven to school on Monday. The boys were the sons of a Fatah member, Baha Balousha, who holds a senior post in the security forces.

Mr. Abbas, meanwhile, faces the difficult task of trying to resolve the political standoff at a time of almost daily internal violence. After months of negotiations between Hamas and Fatah on a national unity government, he said recently that the talks had reached a dead end.

Aides to Mr. Abbas say the president has been considering a range of options. The Palestinian Basic Law, which effectively serves as a constitution, does not say exactly how such a political crisis may be resolved. One possibility, according to aides, is that Mr. Abbas could call a referendum on whether the Palestinians should hold new presidential and parliamentary elections.

The president has the power to dismiss the current Hamas government, but a new government would need approval by the parliament, which is dominated by Hamas. Mr. Abbas might call for new parliamentary elections, but Hamas says he does not have the power to do so.

Mr. Hayya, the Hamas leader who spoke at the Gaza City rally, said his faction would not accept a referendum or new elections. Hamas won parliamentary elections in January, and the parliament is supposed to sit for four years.

Hamas, Fatah Intensify Clashes (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

TEL AVIV -- Armed clashes intensified between rival Palestinian factions yesterday as Hamas accused Fatah fighters loyal to President Mahmoud Abbas of fomenting civil war and trying to assassinate Hamas Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh at a Gaza border station Thursday night.

The latest violence threatened to undermine months of talks on a unity government between the Islamist Hamas party and Mr. Abbas' once-dominant Fatah to end a deadly power struggle within the Palestinian territories.

Security officers and Fatah militia men fired into a crowd of demonstrators carrying green Hamas banners through central Ramallah yesterday, wounding at least 31.

"What a war, Mahmoud Abbas, you are launching, first against God, and then against Hamas," said Hamas' parliamentary faction leader Khalil al-Hayya before a crowd of 100,000 Hamas supporters gathered at a Gaza rally.

Earlier in the day, Hamas spokesman Ismail Radwan accused Fatah strongman Mohammed Dahlan of attempting to assassinate Mr. Haniyeh as he returned to the Gaza Strip from a fundraising trip abroad. Fatah spokesmen denied the charges.

The spike in tensions came just a day before Mr. Abbas is scheduled to deliver a major speech that's expected to rebuke the Hamas-led Cabinet and raise the possibility of new elections.

"The Hamas movement bears full responsibility for any injury to a Palestinian citizen, Dahlan or others," said Saeb Erekat, a Palestinian negotiator who is an aide to Mr. Abbas.

The Hamas prime minister was delayed on the Egyptian side of the Rafah crossing point Thursday. Israel had shut the border to block Mr. Haniyeh from carrying tens of millions of dollars into the Gaza Strip. After about seven hours, Mr. Haniyeh was allowed to cross the border, but was forced to leave the money behind in Egypt.

On the Palestinian side of the border, Hamas gunmen forced their way past Mr. Abbas' presidential guard, which maintains security at the crossing, and shot up security cameras and computers in the terminal.

Once Mr. Haniyeh had emerged on the Palestinian side of the border terminal, his entourage came under a hail of gunfire that killed a bodyguard and wounded his son and his chief political adviser, Ahmed Yousef.

Addressing the Gaza rally of supporters yesterday, Mr. Haniyeh said the takeover of the border crossing by Hamas gunmen "signals the beginning of the rebellion to protect our honor and sovereignty. Foreign elements are deciding who comes in and who goes out." The prime minister added that Hamas joined the government to become "martyrs," not Cabinet ministers.

A U.S.-brokered agreement on the Rafah border station gives both Israel and monitors from the European Union the right to close the crossing on a temporary basis. But officers from Mr. Abbas' presidential guard are responsible for security -- a fact noted by Hamas officials who accused Fatah of an assassination attempt.

The clashes were just the latest developments in a week of Hamas-Fatah turmoil.

On Monday, three children under the age of 9 were killed in Gaza City in an apparent assassination attempt on their father, a Fatah loyalist and a top officer in the Palestinian military intelligence service. Two days later, a leader of Hamas' military wing was assassinated outside a court building in the southern Gaza town of Khan Younis.

Since coming to power in parliamentary elections in March, the Hamas government, which refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist, has faced a U.S.-backed international aid boycott that has left the government nearly bankrupt.

Mr. Haniyeh was just returning from a two-week trip abroad during which he got pledges of $250 million from Iran. Hamas' reign has been accompanied by steadily increasing chaos, especially in Gaza.

The prospect of Hamas breaking the boycott and strengthening its military wing is a cause for concern in Israel, the United States and allies in the region.

Tensions Rise Among Palestinians (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, December 16, 2006

JERUSALEM — Hamas officials Friday accused the rival Fatah party of trying to assassinate Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh during a burst of gunfire a night earlier, as fresh clashes injured more than 30 people in the West Bank and raised worries on both sides of a slide toward wider violence.

Amid rising tensions, the ruling Hamas movement deployed members of a special security force around a Gaza stadium as tens of thousands of supporters gathered to mark the anniversary of the radical Islamist group's founding in 1987. Before the event, rival gunmen in Gaza briefly exchanged gunfire but no one was hurt.

In the West Bank city of Ramallah, Palestinian riot police, armed with rifles and clubs, fired into the air and clashed with Hamas demonstrators who marched through downtown. The incident, during which at least 12 people were shot and others were beaten, followed a string of flare-ups this week that prompted both sides to warn of civil war.

The clashes and the accusations of an assassination attempt aimed at Haniyeh raised tensions as Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is scheduled to make a speech today about the worsening political deadlock.

But it remains unclear how Abbas, who belongs to Fatah, plans to resolve the impasse. Early elections, as urged by some in Fatah, would be seen by the elected Hamas government as tantamount to a coup attempt and could ignite worse violence.

In remarks to Hamas supporters Friday, Haniyeh appealed for unity among the Palestinian factions.

Hamas' allegations against Fatah marked a new level in the bitter war of words between the two groups, which have been locked in a struggle for power since Hamas won parliamentary elections in January.

Some Hamas officials charged that Mohammed Dahlan, a Fatah lawmaker and former security chief who holds sway over thousands of armed officers in Gaza, was to blame when Haniyeh's convoy was fired upon Thursday as the prime minister returned from Egypt. Dahlan oversees the Palestinian end of the U.S.-brokered agreement last year that sought to improve the flow of people and goods through Gaza's border crossings.

Dahlan, who is considered close to Abbas and seen by some as a possible future Palestinian leader, denied the accusations and blamed Hamas for the disorder at the border crossing.

"Hamas' allegations are simply a means of masking its failures toward the Palestinian people," Dahlan said in a statement.

A bodyguard was killed and Haniyeh's son and a top political advisor were slightly injured during the incident.

Dozens of Palestinian militants stormed the border terminal and opened fire after Israel closed the crossing to block Haniyeh from returning with suitcases that held $35 million. The money was donations to the Palestinians that Israeli officials said was destined for use in terrorism. The Palestinian leader later was allowed to enter Gaza without the money, which was left in Egypt.

Abbas' Presidential Guard, which is responsible for security at the border crossing, denied targeting Haniyeh. The scene at the border terminal was described as pandemonium, with militants firing weapons and smashing windows, computers and other equipment.

Saeb Erekat, an Abbas aide and chief Palestinian negotiator, said that the allegations against Dahlan amounted to a death threat. Abbas on Friday ordered an investigation of the incident.

Abbas' aides have been saying for more than two weeks that he would address the fraying political situation. Erekat said Abbas would proceed despite tensions heightened by recent violence, including the fatal shootings in Gaza this week of three boys, all younger than 10, who were the sons of a Fatah intelligence official.

Abbas has said his attempts to reach agreement with Hamas on a power-sharing arrangement have hit a dead end. Aides said last week he was leaning toward calling early elections for parliament and the presidency.

But Hamas says Abbas lacks authority to call new elections for parliament, where it holds a majority of seats and therefore could veto a replacement government should Abbas sack the Hamas Cabinet. Hamas leaders say they would vigorously resist new elections.

Going to early elections would represent an act of desperation and a huge gamble for Abbas, who is viewed almost universally as a weak leader and vulnerable to being toppled by Hamas at the polls. A loss would leave Israel and the West with no one on the Palestinian side with whom to do business, because they consider Hamas a terrorist group and refuse to deal with it.

Abbas might well settle for a less-drastic step, such as urging new talks on a unity government while threatening elections if they fail. Or he could ask voters to decide whether to hold early elections.

Months of factional negotiations proved fruitless, mainly because of Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by past agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

Hamas is under pressure to meet those three conditions to end the months-old embargo on aid from the West. The aid cutoff, along with Israel's decision to withhold about $50 million monthly in tax revenue and customs duties, has been a blow to the Palestinian economy and left the government unable to fully pay its 165,000 employees.

Hamas Says Abbas Seeks War (FT)

By Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, December 16, 2006

Security forces loyal to President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah fired on a Hamas rally in the West Bank on Friday and firefights erupted between the rivals in Gaza, pushing the Palestinians closer to civil war.

“What a war Mahmoud Abbas you are launching, first against God, and then against Hamas,” senior Hamas leader Khalil al-Hayya told a Gaza City rally of 100,000 Hamas supporters, who fired their guns in the air and chanted “God is Greatest”.

At least 32 Hamas supporters in the West Bank city of Ramallah were wounded by gunfire from Abbas’s forces, hospital officials said. Several were in critical condition.

On Thursday Israel prevented Ismail Haniyeh, the Palestinian prime minister, from returning to Gaza in order to stop him bringing in cash possibly donated by Iran.

Reports said Mr Haniyeh, from the Hamas movement, was carrying $35m (€26.5m, £17.8m) in cash, believed to be part of the $350m he raised during a regional tour that took in Iran, Syria and Qatar. He was later allowed entry, but without the cash.

However, anger spilt over into violence following the order to close the Rafah terminal on the Gaza-Egypt border, given by Amir Peretz, Israeli defence minister.

The closure prompted about 2,000 Hamas supporters to storm the terminal where they had a gun battle with guards. Others used explosives to blow a gap in the concrete wall dividing Gaza and Egypt.

Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas legislator, said the closure “could lead the region to an explosion and the Zionist enemy and its allies will bear the responsibility for the consequences”.

The European Union monitoring team at Rafah said its 16 staff were evacuated and safe.

Hamas members have carried about $80m in cash into Gaza since March, when the west imposed an aid boycott aimed at bringing down the Islamic movement but which has increased poverty across the occupied territories.

The clashes at Rafah came as Hamas supporters threatened to defy any call for new elections that Fatah’s Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian Authority president, may make in a speech tomorrow.

Months of negotiations between Fatah and Hamas for a national unity government have foundered, along with hopes for an easing of the western boycott. But Hamas and independent analysts say Mr Abbas has no legal authority to call early elections.

Mr Haniyeh cut short his trip abroad to deal with the internal turmoil. Hamas to-day plans to celebrate the 19th anniversary of its foundation with marches and demonstrations in Gaza.

There were clashes in Gaza and the West Bank this week after Fatah blamed Hamas for the shooting dead on Monday of three young boys who were the sons of an intelligence official loyal to Mr Abbas.

Hamas, Fatah Clash In Deepening Violence (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 16, 2006

Gunmen allied with Hamas and Fatah clashed at a West Bank mosque and in Gaza Strip streets on Friday, as violence spread to areas of the Palestinian territories normally untouched by factional strife.

Hamas accused a Fatah leader of orchestrating the previous day's attack on Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh — and a Hamas politician appeared to call for the Fatah strongman's assassination. Leaders of both groups have warned that the violence threatens to degenerate into civil war.

The clashes in Gaza City and the West Bank town of Ramallah marred celebrations Friday marking the 19th anniversary of Hamas' founding. However, the Islamic militant group pushed ahead with its rallies, and about 70,000 loyalists gathered at a stadium in Gaza City, cheering wildly, sobbing and firing in the air when Haniyeh arrived flanked by more than 50 armed bodyguards.

"We joined this movement to become martyrs, not ministers," Haniyeh declared in a fiery speech, referring to Hamas loyalists' willingness to die for the Islamic cause.

He then left for an emergency session of the Hamas-led Cabinet, called to discuss the escalating unrest.

The fighting Friday in the normally peaceful city of Ramallah began when Hamas supporters tried to march toward the town center, where Fatah-allied police had deployed to prevent a planned Hamas celebration.

Police formed a cordon around a Hamas mosque to prevent those inside from marching, then beat them with clubs and fired their rifles in the air when the activists tried to leave. The marchers fought back, throwing stones and bottles at the police, some of whom fired into the crowd.

Thirty-two people were wounded by stones and gunfire, hospital officials said.

In Gaza City, masked Hamas gunmen waged battle with Fatah-allied police near a security post.

The showdown, a block from the home of Mohammed Dahlan, broke out shortly after Hamas accused the Fatah strongman of orchestrating the attack on Haniyeh on Thursday at the Gaza-Egypt border terminal.

The latest round of fighting erupted Monday with a drive-by shooting that killed the three young sons of a Fatah security official and continued Wednesday with the gangland-style execution of a Hamas judge.

On Thursday, Haniyeh rushed home from a trip abroad to try to quell the violence.

But Israel ordered the Rafah crossing closed to keep Haniyeh from bringing in an estimated $35 million he had collected abroad to help alleviate the Palestinian financial crisis. Israeli officials said Haniyeh could return to Gaza without the money, which it said was to be used for terror attacks. Maria Telleria, spokeswoman for European monitors at the crossing, said Haniyeh left the funds in Egypt.

Israeli Deputy Defense Minister Ephraim Sneh told Israel's Army Radio that government officials made the right decision not to let Haniyeh bring the money into Gaza, adding that if Haniyeh had been killed, "I wouldn't put up a mourning tent."

While Haniyeh was delayed at the crossing, angry Hamas militants stormed the border terminal and fought with security forces stationed there who are loyal to President Mahmoud Abbas, Fatah's leader.

When Haniyeh finally crossed, unidentified men began firing toward him. One of his bodyguards was killed and his son and 26 others were wounded.

At the bodyguard's funeral, Khalil al-Hayeh, head of the Hamas bloc in parliament, told mourners that Dahlan was trying to instigate a coup against the government and appeared to call for his assassination.

DOJ_NMG_0107421

Al-Hayeh exhorted the crowd to "get us the plotters of the coup."

"We will, we will," the crowd replied.

Dahlan said the allegations were an attempt by Hamas leaders "to mask their sweeping failure to manage Palestinian political and social life."

Various other Hamas officials accused Palestinian collaborators with Israel, Abbas and the U.S. of involvement in the shooting.

The violence came amid a political deadlock between Abbas and the Hamas-led Cabinet and parliament following failed efforts to form a unity government. Abbas hoped such a government would end crippling international economic sanctions imposed on the Palestinian Authority after Hamas won January elections.

Hamas, responsible for dozens of deadly suicide bombings in Israel, is listed as a terror group by the U.S. and European Union.

Abbas, a relative moderate, was to address the Palestinians on Saturday on his plans for ending the impasse and was expected to threaten early elections. A call for new elections, which Hamas says is illegal, would likely further inflame the situation.

US To Beef Up Lebanese Army Amid Crisis (AFP)

AFP, December 16, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Washington was considering a financial package to beef up the military of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, who has expressed fears of an attempted Syrian-backed coup.

"We are still working out the details of what we can do to support the army," Rice said in an interview published in The Washington Post Friday.

In addition, she said, the Bush administration needed to have consultations with Congress over the package.

"But we have wanted very much to support the reform of the Lebanese armed forces, the reequipping of the Lebanese armed forces," Rice said as supporters of the Syrian-backed Shiite militant group Hezbollah and its Christian allies continued mass demonstrations in Beirut against Siniora's Western-backed government.

Syria was the powerbroker in Lebanon for nearly three decades. It was forced to withdraw its troops from Lebanon last year amid a public outcry over the murder of former premier Rafiq Hariri, widely blamed on Syria, a charge Damascus denies.

Lebanon's pro-Syrian political opposition now wants to bring down Siniora's government over demands for greater power sharing, seen by the government as a ploy to reassert Syrian influence in the country.

The United States and European Union have warned Iran and Syria against meddling in the affairs of their neighbors.

"It's not just the package that we would put forward, but it's also the package that I think others are prepared to, including the mainstream Arab states are prepared to contribute to," Rice said.

"Because ultimately that's one of the most important things that you can do is to strengthen the Lebanese armed forces probably not to replace the United Nations forces for some time, but to be more capable themselves of defending the country and providing a stable platform," she said.

She said she could not give details of the aid package.

The United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) is deployed near the border with Israel, tasked with backing up the Lebanese army under a UN accord which ended hostilities between Israel and Hezbollah on August 14.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Testimony Helps Detail CIA's Post-9/11 Reach (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

MILAN -- A few days after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the CIA station chief in Rome paid a visit to the head of Italy's military intelligence agency, Adm. Gianfranco Battelli, to float a proposal: Would the Italian secret services help the CIA kidnap terrorism suspects and fly them out of the country?

The CIA man did not identify which targets he had in mind but was "expressly referring to the possibility of picking up a suspected terrorist in Italy, bringing him to an airport and sending him from there to a foreign country," Battelli, now retired, recalled in a deposition.

This initial secret contact and others that followed, disclosed in newly released documents, show the speed and breadth with which the CIA applied in post-9/11 Europe a tactic it had long reserved for the Third World -- "extraordinary rendition," the extrajudicial abduction of Islamic radicals overseas for interrogation in friendly countries.

A year after the first contact, the CIA officer held another meeting with his Italian counterparts, this time sharing a list of more than 10 "dangerous people" the agency was tracking in Italy, Belgium, Austria and the Netherlands, according to a deposition from Gen. Gustavo Pignero, another high-ranking Italian military intelligence official. "It was clear that this was an aggressive search project, that their willingness to employ illicit means was clear," Pignero said, adding that the list was later destroyed and he could not recall the names.

U.S. spies drew up suspect lists with the help of European intelligence agencies and chased some of the men around the globe before putting a brake on the operations in early 2004, about a year after the invasion of Iraq, according to documents unearthed in criminal investigations, lawsuits and parliamentary inquiries.

All told, the U.S. agency took part in the seizure of at least 10 European citizens or legal immigrants, some of them from countries not cited in that list of "dangerous people" received by the Italian spies. Four renditions occurred on European soil: in Sweden, Macedonia and Italy. Six operations targeted people who were traveling abroad or who had been captured in Pakistan; European intelligence agencies provided direct assistance to the CIA in at least five of those cases, records show.

Each prisoner was then secretly handed over to intelligence services in the Middle East or Africa with histories of human rights abuses. Some remain imprisoned in those countries; others have been taken to the U.S. naval prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. One man was later released after being taken from the Balkans to Afghanistan, the victim of an apparent case of mistaken identity.

In the early stages, the CIA had prepared even more ambitious plans, according to the depositions from the Italian intelligence officials, who testified last summer during a criminal investigation into a CIA-sponsored kidnapping of a radical Islamic cleric in Milan.

For example, Pignero said in his deposition that the CIA's Rome station chief had offered in 2002 to abduct a fugitive leader of the Red Brigades -- a Marxist network blamed for dozens of assassinations in Italy -- who had found refuge in South America. "The Americans would capture him and turn him over to us, and we in return would have to 'extradite' him to Italy without any legal proceedings," Pignero said.

In exchange, the CIA wanted help in abducting Islamic radicals living in the Italian cities of Turin, Vercelli and Naples, Pignero said. Italian intelligence officials rejected the offer, he added, because it was "contrary to international laws."

Reports of clandestine CIA operations have fueled deep public anger in Europe, where many people regard renditions as a blatant violation of national sovereignty and international law. Since last year, prosecutors have opened four separate criminal investigations into CIA activities in Europe. A dozen countries have conducted legislative inquiries into whether local spy agencies were involved.

Last month, a European Parliament committee investigating CIA operations in Europe condemned the practice of rendition "as an illegal and systematic instrument used by the United States" and called it "counterproductive in the fight against terrorism."

"I think that after the 11th of September, the CIA thought that all the ways useful to capture their enemies, the alleged terrorists, were now possible," Giovanni Claudio Fava, an Italian legislator who led the parliamentary probe, said in an interview in Brussels. "They wanted to clean Europe of all these dangerous, alleged terrorists. They didn't have faith in the quality and capacity of our own security controls and our justice system."

In the past year, U.S. officials have sought to repair the diplomatic damage. They have met repeatedly with their European counterparts to defuse opposition to renditions, the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo and the disclosure in November 2005 that the CIA had set up secret prisons for terrorism suspects in Eastern Europe.

John B. Bellinger III, legal adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said U.S. diplomats have made some headway. But he added that ongoing political disputes have "undermined cooperation and intelligence activities."

"I'd say that many European government officials and academics acknowledge now that there is a legal murkiness that applies to international terrorism," he said in a telephone interview from Washington. "On the negative side of the ledger, we do continue to have these hysterical, inflated allegations denouncing the United States that unfortunately do fan the flames of suspicion and anti-Americanism."

The CIA declined to comment.'He Was Too Loud'

The most detailed disclosures about the CIA's European rendition project have emerged from Milan, where Italian prosecutors have spent two years investigating the disappearance of Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, a militant Egyptian-born cleric known as Abu Omar.

When Nasr vanished in February 2003, police and prosecutors in Milan thought at first that he had slipped out of the country on his own, perhaps to join resistance forces in Iraq in advance of the U.S.-led invasion. The CIA lent credence to their suspicions a few months later, when it delivered an intelligence bulletin to Rome stating that Nasr had been seen in the Balkans.

In fact, prosecutors later discovered, Nasr had been grabbed on the street in Milan as he was walking to a mosque and stuffed into a white van, which sped to Aviano Air Base, a joint U.S.-Italian military installation. From there, he was put on a plane to Ramstein Air Base in Germany, and onward to Cairo, where Nasr claims he was tortured for months with electric shocks and sexually abused.

Prosecutors in Milan have since issued arrest warrants on kidnapping charges for 25 CIA operatives and a U.S. Air Force officer, alleging that they conspired with Italian secret service agents to abduct Nasr. Although none of the Americans is likely to be extradited to Italy, prosecutors have served notice that they intend to try them in absentia and asked a judge last month to formally indict the defendants.

Senior Italian intelligence officials have also been charged in the case, including Gen. Nicolo Pollari, director of the Italian military intelligence agency known as Sismi. Pignero, his former deputy, was arrested in June, shortly after he gave his deposition to prosecutors. He died of cancer three months later, on Sept. 11.

European investigators are still examining other mysterious cases of missing or detained people. Among them is the disappearance a few weeks before Nasr's kidnapping of another Egyptian-born Islamic fundamentalist.

Gamal al-Menshawi, a physician and occasional mosque preacher who knew Nasr personally, had left his home in Graz, Austria, bound for the Islamic holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia. His wife was waiting for him there, but he never arrived, according to Egyptian exiles in Austria and Italy who know him.

Menshawi's trail vanished after he arrived in Amman, Jordan, for a flight connection. He later surfaced in Egypt. European Parliament investigators have concluded he was detained there for two years without facing charges.

He was released in 2005 and is living in Alexandria, Egypt, according to Austrian journalists. He has severed contact with friends and colleagues in Europe, who strongly suspect he was subjected to a rendition, although they lack proof or direct evidence of U.S. involvement.

Arman Ahmed al-Hissini, imam of the Viale Jenner mosque in Milan and an acquaintance of Menshawi and Nasr, said both have been silenced by the Egyptian security services.

DOJ_NMG_0107425

"The Arab secret services, they give names to the CIA of people who they want, people who are on the outside, such as Europe," said Hissini, an Egyptian native known locally as Abu Imad. "They give the names to the CIA, because the CIA can go to work in these countries."

There is also little doubt about Menshawi's fate among those who knew him in Austria's Islamic community.

"I see the American government as being primarily responsible," said Mohamed Mahmoud, chairman of a group called Islamic Group of Austria. "This is not the first time someone has disappeared."

"The Americans look around in Europe for who is being loud, who is speaking out, and then those people are kidnapped," he added. "He was very vocal; he was too loud for them. He talked openly about Egypt's government, about the U.S. government, about the Islamic community in Austria.'"They Needed Information'

About the same time, another Islamic militant from Austria disappeared during a stopover at the Amman airport.

Masaad Omer Behari, a Sudanese citizen who had lived in Austria for more than a decade, has said he was arrested by Jordanian secret service agents on Jan. 12, 2003, as he was traveling home to Vienna from a trip to Sudan.

Behari told European Parliament investigators in October that he was held for three months in a Jordanian prison, where he was interrogated about Islamic militants in Austria and elsewhere in Europe. "On the first day I was in prison, they told me they did not think I was a terrorist, but that they needed information about the Islamic scene in Vienna," he said.

Documents obtained by the investigators show that Behari had been under surveillance by Austria's domestic intelligence service since 1998, when he was interrogated about an alleged plot to blow up the U.S. Embassy in Vienna. Behari said he was innocent and never faced charges, but was pressured by Austrian secret service agents to leave the country after the Sept. 11 hijackings.

"I have experienced hard times because I did not cooperate with the security authorities in Europe and with the Americans," Behari said, according to a transcript of his testimony. The Austrians "threatened me that they would cause me problems. I thought it was only 'blah-blah,' but it was the truth."

Austrian authorities said they have not opened official inquiries into the disappearances of Menshawi or Behari, in part because neither is an Austrian citizen.

"Since the alleged abductions did not take place on Austrian soil, in an Austrian airplane or on an Austrian ship, we see no need for action," said Rudolf Gollia, spokesman for the Austrian Interior Ministry.

Military Taking A Tougher Line With Detainees (NYT)

By Tim Golden

GUANTÁNAMO BAY, Cuba, Dec. 10 — As the first detainees began moving last week into Guantánamo's modern, new detention facility, Camp 6, the military guard commander stood beneath the high, concrete walls of the compound, looking out on a fenced-in athletic yard.

The yard, where the detainees were to have played soccer and other sports, had been part of a plan to ease the conditions under which more than 400 men are imprisoned here, nearly all of them without having been charged. But that plan has changed.

"At this point, I just don't see using that," the guard commander, Col. Wade F. Dennis, said.

After two years in which the military sought to manage terrorism suspects at Guantánamo with incentives for good behavior, steady improvements in their living conditions and even dialogue with prison leaders, the authorities here have clamped down decisively in recent months.

Security procedures have been tightened. Group activities have been scaled back. With the retrofitting of Camp 6 and the near-emptying of another showcase camp for compliant prisoners, military officials said about three-fourths of the detainees would eventually be held in maximum-security cells. That is a stark departure from earlier plans to hold a similar number in medium-security units.

Officials said the shift reflected the military's analysis — after a series of hunger strikes, a riot last May and three suicides by detainees in June — that earlier efforts to ease restrictions on the detainees had gone too far.

The commander of the Guantánamo task force, Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., said the tougher approach also reflected the changing nature of the prison population, and his conviction that all of those now held here are dangerous men. "They're all terrorists; they're all enemy combatants," Admiral Harris said in an interview.

He added, "I don't think there is such a thing as a medium-security terrorist."

Admiral Harris, who took command on March 31, referred in part to the recent departure from Guantánamo of the last of 38 men whom the military had classified since early 2005 as "no longer enemy combatants." Still, about 100 others who had been cleared by the military for transfer or release remained here while the State Department tried to arrange their repatriation.

[Shortly after Admiral Harris's remarks, another 15 detainees were sent home to Saudi Arabia, where they were promptly returned to their families.]

The detainee population here has also been reshaped by the arrival in September of 14 terror suspects, including the accused mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, who had been held by the Central Intelligence Agency in secret prisons overseas.

United States officials said these so-called high-value suspects were being held apart from the rest of the Guantánamo prisoners, at a secret detention facility supervised by C.I.A. officers. The 14 have been visited twice by representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross, but have not yet been interrogated by military intelligence officials, these officials said.

Next year, after the Defense Department finishes rewriting rules for the military tribunals that the Bush administration first established in November 2001, the intelligence agency's prisoners are to be charged with war crimes. The timetable for their prosecutions remains uncertain.

Military officials said they would continue to try to improve conditions at the prison to the extent that security considerations allowed. They said they have abandoned special cell blocks for discipline and segregation, so that prisoners who violate rules are now punished simply by the withdrawal of various privileges in their regular cells. The authorities have also standardized rules for exercise, allowing each detainee at least two hours a day, they said.

Since spring 2004, the military's handling of the detainees had been heavily influenced by the political and diplomatic pressures that grew out of the Abu Ghraib scandal and other cases of prisoner abuse. At the same time, Guantánamo's focus was shifting from interrogations to the long-term detention of men who, for the most part, would never be charged with any crime.

With little guidance from Washington, senior officers here began in 2005 to edge back toward the traditional Geneva Convention rules for prisoner treatment that President Bush had disavowed after 9/11 for the fight against terrorism, military officials said. Military officers began listening more attentively to the prisoners' complaints, and eventually met a few times with a council of detainee leaders.

Those talks were quickly aborted in August 2005. The hunger strikes were effectively broken last January, when the military began strapping detainees into padded "restraint chairs" to force-feed them through stomach tubes.

But those protests gave way to several drug overdoses in May and the hangings in June of three prisoners — all of whom had previously been hunger strikers.

The current Guantánamo commanders eschewed any criticism of their predecessors. But they were blunt in laying out a different approach.

Asked about his discussions with prisoners, Colonel Dennis said he basically had none. As for the handful of detainees who have continued to wage hunger strikes, including three who were being force-fed last week, he said they would get no "special attention" from him.

"If they want to do that, hook it up," he said, apparently referring to the restraint chair system for force-feeding. "If that's what you want to do, that's your choice."

Admiral Harris said he had ordered a hardening of the security posture on the basis of new insights into the threat that the detainees pose. "We have learned how committed they are, just how serious they are, and how dangerous they are," he said.

Several military officials said Admiral Harris took over the Guantánamo task force with a greater concern about security, and soon ordered his aides to draw up plans to deal with hostage-takings and other emergencies.

He and Colonel Dennis both asserted that Camp 4 — where dozens of detainees rioted during an aggressive search of their quarters last May — represented a particular danger.

Admiral Harris said detainees there had used the freedom of the camp to train one another in terrorist tactics, and in 2004 plotted unsuccessfully to seize a food truck and use it to run over guards.

"Camp 4 is an ideal planning ground for nefarious activity," he said.

But according to several recent interviews with military personnel who served here at the time, the riot in May did not transpire precisely as military officials had described it. The disturbance culminated with what the military had said was an attack by detainees on members of a Quick Reaction Force that burst into one barracks to stop a detainee who appeared to be hanging himself.

But officers familiar with the event said the force stormed in after a guard saw a detainee merely holding up a sheet and that his intentions were ambiguous. A guard also mistakenly broadcast the radio code for multiple suicide attempts, heightening the alarm, the officers said.

Admiral Harris conceded that an error "could have been" made, but said "it was certainly no accident" that the prisoners had slicked the floor of their quarters with soapy water and excrement, and fought the guards with makeshift weapons. He said he believed the guards acted properly.

The May 18 search took place after at least two prisoners were found unconscious from overdoses of hoarded drugs. The detainees who attacked the guards were known as especially religious, and had been angered in the past by searches of their Korans.

After the three suicides in June, Camp 6 was substantially reconfigured. Staircases and catwalks were fenced in so that detainees could not jump from them to attack guards or try to kill themselves. Shower stalls were built higher so they could not be used for hangings. Exercise yards were divided up into a series of one-man pens.

The detainees will still look out the small windows of their computer-controlled cell doors to see the stainless steel picnic tables where they were once supposed to have shared their meals; they just will not be able to sit at those tables with other detainees.

Military officials confirmed that since the suicides in June, three detainees who were part of the council that negotiated with military commanders had been kept isolated from nearly all other prisoners in Camp Echo, a collection of bungalows where detainees often see their lawyers.

Those detainees include Shaker Aamer, a Saudi resident of Britain who is accused of having ties to Al Qaeda; Ghassan al-Sharbi, a Saudi electrical engineer who was charged earlier with plotting to make bombs for Qaeda forces in Afghanistan; and Saber Lahmar, an Algerian religious scholar seized in Bosnia.

Lawyers for Mr. Aamer and Mr. Lahmar said that they had been alone for most of that time, and that the isolation was causing them psychological damage.

“They have thrown away the key and forgotten him even though he is spiraling down physically and psychologically,” Mr. Lahmar’s lawyer, Stephen H. Olesky, said.

Noting that a petition for relief on behalf of Mr. Lahmar has been before a federal appeals court for nearly two years, he added, “They know we do not have a judge to take this case to, so they can pile on the detainee.”

Colonel Dennis, the commander of the detention group, said Mr. Lahmar was being allowed to exercise and had access to any medical attention he required.

Tortured Canadian Still On U.S. "Watch List" (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

TORONTO, Dec. 15 -- Maher Arar, the Canadian Muslim who was whisked by U.S. agents from a New York airport to imprisonment and torture in Syria, remains on the U.S. "watch list" despite an exhaustive Canadian inquiry that found he is an innocent man, the U.S. ambassador to Canada said Friday.

Ambassador David Wilkins said in an interview with CBC Radio that Arar "is on the watch list and has been since he was deported" in 2002 to Syria, where he was held for 10 months, much of it in a coffin-like dungeon.

His transfer to Syria, part of a series of U.S. clandestine "extraordinary renditions" of terrorism suspects for interrogation in foreign countries, created a scandal in Canada.

The head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police resigned last week after a two-year judicial inquiry found his officers gave U.S. agents false information to cast suspicion on Arar.

The Canadian Parliament has apologized to Arar, now 36, and the Canadian government is preparing compensation for the engineer.

But the United States has never acknowledged any mistake in the matter, and Wilkins's disclosure Friday indicates Arar might again be detained by the United States if he were to enter the country.

His removal to Syria "was based on information from a variety of sources, as is his current watch list status," Wilkins said in a statement he issued later Friday. U.S. officials have made "our own independent assessment of the threat to the United States," he said.

"That the United States would have the gall to keep Maher on a watch list, implying that he poses a threat to this country, is outrageous," said one of Arar's attorneys, Maria LaHood, a lawyer with the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York. The nonprofit group filed a suit on Arar's behalf against the U.S. government, but it was dismissed.

"This administration is unwilling to admit its mistakes and still tries to conceal them," she said.

In Ottawa, New Democratic Party leader Jack Layton said the Canadian government should demand that the United States remove Arar's name from the list. "Otherwise, it sends a message the Canadian government will not stand behind its own citizens," he told reporters.

Rail-Cargo Plan Aims To Avert Terrorism (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

DOJ_NMG_0107428

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

Federal officials unveiled a plan yesterday to tighten security for railroad shipments of hazardous materials, saying the rules would reduce the risk of terrorists using dangerous chemicals to kill thousands of people.

The proposals -- which drew criticism from Democrats, who said they did not go far enough -- would require freight and passenger systems to keep closer tabs on rail cars containing dangerous chemicals. A separate set of rules proposed by the Transportation Department would compel rail operators to find safer and more secure routes for such shipments, authorities said.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the rules, which will be open to public comment for 60 days, would "reduce the risk that chemicals can be turned into deadly weapons when they are in transit."

Authorities are concerned that terrorists might target rail cars in the hopes of releasing a plume of hazardous chemicals in a populated region. The proposals would cost the rail industry about $162 million over 10 years, officials said.

Chertoff said many of the proposed rules have already been adopted by the rail industry on a voluntary basis.

Democratic members of Congress said the rules did not adequately address overall rail security.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.), who has introduced rail security legislation in the past, said the plans would not do enough to secure rail stations, bridges and tunnels, which are also vulnerable to attack.

He said the government should also have the authority to force companies to reroute hazardous materials around populated areas when terror alert levels are raised.

"This plan is just window dressing," he said. "It doesn't have any substance."

The D.C. Council grew so concerned about a possible attack on rail cars containing hazardous chemicals that in 2005 it banned such shipments within 2.2 miles of the Capitol. That ban has been put on hold pending the result of a lawsuit by CSX Transportation Inc. and the U.S. government. Several other cities have also banned the shipments and are closely watching the District's court case.

Chertoff said banning chemical shipments from urban areas would be difficult because the rail system weaves in and out of those areas. Many of the chemicals -- such as chlorine used to purify water -- are destined for use in metropolitan areas, he said.

"If you are going to deliver to a city, you have got to get it into the city," Chertoff said.

Chertoff said the rules are aimed at protecting rail cars when they are most vulnerable: when they are not moving and are waiting to be transferred to other companies. Under the proposal, authorities would require a "secure handoff" from one company to another, preventing a car from "sitting there unattended," Chertoff said.

When cars are stationary for long periods of time, companies would be required to watch them or park them in secure areas, he added.

Transportation Security Administration officials would have the authority to conduct inspections of rail operations and levy fines if they found security breaches. The companies would also be required to provide authorities with the exact locations of hazardous shipments within minutes of a request, Chertoff said.

Feinstein Criticizes DHS On Foreigner Exit Program (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

Supporters of the troubled US-VISIT program warned yesterday that the decision to suspend a crucial part of the national security program launched after the 2001 attacks will leave the nation vulnerable to terrorism.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said the government will be left with no way of knowing whether all visitors leave the country after the administration decided to drop a plan to track departures at land borders because of technical and cost problems.

Feinstein called the decision a "very serious failure" on top of multiple delays since the system was proposed in 1996.

US-VISIT is designed to detect criminals, suspected terrorists and visitors whose visas have expired by recording travelers' fingerprints and digital photographs when they enter and exit the United States. Having spent $1.7 billion since 2003, Department of Homeland Security officials say they have successfully recorded 61 million people entering the country through 115 airports, 15 seaports and 154 of 170 land ports.

But they cannot build an exit tracking system without spending "tens of billions" of dollars more and an additional five to 10 years developing the technology.

"This program is central to protecting our national security," said Feinstein, incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee's homeland security panel. "Billions of dollars and countless hours have been invested, and if DHS is going to throw this all away, the American people deserve to know why."

DOJ_NMG_0107429

Others expressed relief that the department was acknowledging what critics have insisted for years: that billions of dollars might be wasted on contracts that could not deliver results. Developing an exit system is difficult because of the volume of cross-border traffic, technological demands and practical limits.

Such an entry-exit system was recommended by the panel that investigated the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, but several studies have challenged its feasibility.

"Always make sure you state it clearly when the emperor has no clothes, to me is the moral of the story," said Kathleen Walker, incoming president of the American Immigration Lawyers Association, citing repeated studies and government testimony about US-VISIT's flaws.

DHS's retreat came after Congress's audit arm, the Government Accountability Office, reported Thursday that US-VISIT officials had concluded that the exit program could not now be launched at land crossings without major traffic delays or enormous cost to expand facilities, roads and communication links.

In an interview, US-VISIT Director Robert Mocny said the agency is completing a January spending report to Congress that will lay out plans to expand the exit system at airports and seaports but will leave out land ports.

Land ports record 309 million crossings a year, compared with 87 million at airports. But U.S. officials say airports pose a greater security risk because most land crossers are repeat travelers, or Mexican, Canadian and U.S. citizens who are for now exempt from US-VISIT.

In comments to reporters, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff acknowledged that the department was sidetracking the land exit system.

"If we required all the people leaving the country by land going into Canada to stop to give a biometric print," Chertoff said, "you would see lines that are 10 or 15 miles long, stretching from the border deeply into New York or into Detroit."

Chertoff cited progress in tracking and screening unwanted people before they enter the United States. US-VISIT has captured more than 1,100 criminals who were using false documents, officials have said. Other programs are underway to integrate homeland security and FBI fingerprint databases, to automatically generate risk assessments on travelers and to improve monitoring of some immigration violators.

"The highest priority is to keep terrorists out of the country. Letting them come in the country and then worrying whether they haven't left in 90 days seems, to me, an inferior concern to keeping them out in the first place," Chertoff said.

US-VISIT has also spent $71 million testing the use of radio-frequency identification technology -- involving tiny microchips with a unique code embedded in a tag on visitors' departure forms -- as an alternative to a fingerprint or facial-scan system. But a January 2006 test correctly identified only 16 percent of 166 vehicles with such tags. Among the drawbacks is that the tags cannot be physically tied to an individual.

Israelis Warned To Avoid Goa, A Longtime Favorite Tourist Destination For Young Travelers (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

ANJUNA, India, Dec. 15 — A favored destination of young Israelis seeking respite from the frazzle and stress of home, the tourist haven of Goa got a rude reminder of reality this week.

Based on information gleaned by its counterterrorism agency, the Israeli government issued a rare terrorism alert on Thursday warning of a planned attack by Al Qaeda on tourists during the New Year's holiday season. The advisory described the information as "a concrete threat" but gave no further detail.

The Israeli Embassy urged its citizens to visit another time or, if they must be in the state of Goa, to stay away from crowded places. "We advise them to be alert and to take this threat very seriously," the embassy spokesman, Lior Weintraub, said Friday by telephone from New Delhi, the capital.

In Anjuna, on Goa's northern coast, where Internet cafes cater to Israelis checking e-mail messages from home and where restaurants serve schnitzel for lunch, the news of Al Qaeda's suspected designs was greeted with a mixture of apprehension and aplomb.

"Now we feel at home," Yossi Damti, 23, fresh out of the Israeli Army, said with a shrug on Friday afternoon.

"We got used to it," said his friend, Orif Tordjman, 21, who had also just completed her military service. "We're not going to leave because of this alert."

Goa is among India's most coveted tourist destinations. For Israelis, it is also a common stop on the post-military-service tourist circuit. The embassy in New Delhi estimated that around 35,000 Israelis come to Goa each year, crowding into a handful of coastal villages like this one.

Alerts like this latest one, which was unusual for its level of specificity, are particularly vexing for the Indian government, which has long maintained that Al Qaeda does not operate on Indian soil. In August, in the days leading up to India's

Independence Day, the United States Embassy said it had received information that foreign terrorists, including Al Qaeda, planned to carry out a series of bombings in and around New Delhi and Mumbai. Indian officials dismissed the alert as a routine advisory.

India has cultivated warmer relations with Israel and the United States, making it, according to some security analysts, more vulnerable to Qaeda attacks.

Local news outlets on Friday quoted the chief minister of Goa, Pratapsing Rane, as saying that his state remained safe for tourists. Tourism is among the state's principal sources of revenue.

At an Internet cafe on Anjuna's main strip, Shai Zimon, 23, who had been traveling across India for the past 6 weeks, said he was hunting for a ticket to fly to Thailand for New Year's Eve, but not because of the terrorism threat. "You can't base your trip on what the government says," he said.

If you did, piped in a Swiss woman, Gitta Klee, also checking e-mail messages, no one would ever go anywhere.

Ms. Klee, 53, who has lived in Goa for more than 27 years, theorized that the terrorism alert was the brainchild of anxious parents not wanting their children to party in Goa. "Me, I don't think this place is interesting enough for terrorists," she said.

Word seemed not to have spread yet to the non-Israeli tourists who crowd into some of the same cheap guesthouses here. A pair of German tourists waiting for a bus to the beach were oblivious to the alert. A British tourist, Mustapha Dari, 24, said he had heard only something vague from a friend who had watched the news the night before on Indian television. His friend, Raffi Israelion, 20, a Parisian, confessed that he was particularly worried because local residents often took him to be Israeli.

At a Jewish community house on Friday afternoon, the news had seeped in, and the visit of a foreign journalist was enough to spark fear and hostility. At first, two women sitting on the porch of the house, where preparations were under way for a service to mark the first night of Hanukkah, said they knew of three friends who had canceled their New Year's Eve plans for Goa.

They said friends and family in Israel had already called them and urged them to return home. They weren't sure what they would do. One of the women, who gave her name only as Adi, said she did not want Al Qaeda to "ruin our plans."

Nor, it turned out, did she want to say any more to a stranger. The conversation quickly turned tense. Why are you asking for our names, they demanded. Why do you want to know when the first candle would be lit on the menorah this evening? Why are you asking if we will stay here for the New Year's holiday?

"All this situation, I don't know," Adi said nervously, and quickly disappeared into the house.

WAR NEWS:

Women Lose Ground In The New Iraq (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Browsing the shelves of a cosmetics store in the Karrada shopping district, Zahra Khalid felt giddy at the sight of Alberto shampoo and Miss Rose eye shadow, blusher and powder.

Before leaving her house, she had covered her body in a billowing black abaya and wrapped a black head scarf around her thick brown hair. She had asked her brother to drive. She had done all the things that a woman living in Baghdad is supposed to do these days to avoid drawing attention to herself.

It was the first time she had left home in two months.

"For a woman, it's just like being in jail," she said. "I can't go anywhere."

Life has become more difficult for most Iraqis since the February bombing of a Shiite Muslim mosque in Samarra sparked a rise in sectarian killings and overall lawlessness. For many women, though, it has become unbearable.

As Islamic fundamentalism seeps into society and sectarian warfare escalates, more and more women live in fear of being kidnapped or raped. They receive death threats because of their religious sects and careers. They are harassed for not abiding by the strict dress code of long skirts and head scarves or for driving cars.

For much of the 20th century, and under various leaders, Iraq was one of the most progressive Middle Eastern countries in its treatment of women, who were encouraged to go to school and enter the workforce. Saddam Hussein's Baath Party espoused a secular Arab nationalism that advocated women's full participation in society. But years of war changed that.

In the days after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, many women were hopeful that they would enjoy greater parity with men. President Bush said that increasing women's rights was essential to creating a new, democratic Iraq.

But interviews with 16 Iraqi women, ranging in age from 21 to 52, show that much of that postwar hope is gone. The younger women say they fear being snatched on their way to school and wonder whether their college degrees will mean anything in the new Iraq. The older women, proud of their education and careers, are watching their independence slip away.

"At the beginning, we were very happy with those achievements and gains, and we were looking for more," said Ina'am al-Sultani, 36, a leader of the Progressive Women's Movement, a nongovernmental organization. "Women are now restrained."

Khalid, 30, whose only visible features as she shopped on a recent day were her round face and long eyelashes, was an accountant at the Planning Ministry until she received a death threat four months ago. She quit, moved to a new home and changed her phone number.

"We're suffering right now," Khalid said, her two sons tugging at her abaya. "The war took all our rights. We're not free because of terrorism."Hope and Fear

Before the war, Sundus Abbas, 38, was a researcher at a governmental organization. After the war, she became a women's rights activist.

After Saddam Hussein was forced out of power, many women like Abbas appeared on television talk shows and wrote newspaper articles challenging traditional views on marriage and other family issues and demanding that women be granted a greater role in government.

"They were there asking for their rights loudly and clearly," said Maysoon al-Damluji, a member of parliament.

There were signs of success. Twenty-five percent of the seats in the new National Assembly were reserved for women. Under Hussein, only one ministry was headed by a woman, Damluji said. Now, of the 38 ministry heads, four are women.

Iraqi women had been earning university degrees since the 1920s. Many earned master's degrees and doctorates and became physicians, engineers and lawyers.

Then came the 1980s war with Iran and the embargo imposed after the 1991 Persian Gulf War. Hussein, who began embracing Islamic and tribal traditions as a way to consolidate power, forbade women younger than 45 to travel abroad without a male relative.

Encouraged by Bush, women began to reassert themselves after 2003. But the collapse of security, the absence of the rule of law and the presence of extremist groups have weakened the budding movement, activists said. In the past year, its leaders have received death threats. Politicians have accused them of working in collusion with enemy countries, and police officers have harassed them, activists said.

On June 4, Abbas received an anonymous e-mail at her Baghdad office warning her to leave Iraq within 10 days. Three days later, another e-mail said she would be killed for not complying with the first threat.

She stayed home and canceled her scheduled appearances. A third threat came June 10 in a telephone text message. She recalled thinking that she did not want to be killed in front of her parents, who had already lost a daughter in a U.S. airstrike.

"I left with a feeling of humiliation and bitterness," she wrote in an e-mail from an undisclosed location. "Just imagine, I left my home, my family, my work and my city, for nowhere."'Psychologically Tired'

Aseel Bahjet and her mother shot nervous glances at each other as the 23-year-old spoke to a stranger in a Karrada perfume shop on a recent afternoon. Her mother wore an abaya. Bahjet wore a long black skirt, a black sweater and a head scarf. The shopkeeper closed the door so that no one would see a foreigner talking to the young woman.

Bahjet, a petite figure with pale skin and big brown eyes, recently graduated from Baghdad University with an engineering degree. But she doesn't know what to do with it.

Her mother, Shadam, wants her to stay at home as much as possible, saying she has heard too many stories about young women being kidnapped. Bahjet has nothing to do at home, other than talk to her friends on the phone.

"There's no chance to build our future," she said.

She lowered her voice and spoke slowly as she searched for the right words in English: "I joke that we should go see psychiatrists. All Iraqis are depressed."

Many young women at Bahjet's alma mater worry that they, too, will have nothing to do after they graduate. On a recent afternoon, Enas Moyad sat in an empty classroom at Baghdad University contemplating her future. Ask her if she is depressed, and she's quick to answer: "I'm psychologically tired."

She is 21.

Like many Iraqi parents, Moyad's had encouraged her to go to school. Now they don't.

This month, a Sunni Arab insurgent group asked Sunni students and professors not to attend classes while it "cleanses" the campuses of Shiite death squads. The group later said in a statement that it was canceling the rest of the school year. The threat was circulated so widely that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki issued a statement urging students to ignore it.

Fearing attacks on the way to campus, Moyad and nine other students have pitched in to hire a Kia minibus to take them there. Some of her girlfriends carry knives in their bags. Others take pistols, she said.

For months, attendance has been falling at the College of Education for Women, where Moyad is in her fourth year. One sociology professor said he had given only two lectures since Sept. 3. Normally, he gives 22 lectures a week.

Moyad, who shows her rebellious side by letting a few dyed blond bangs show from under her green hijab, or head scarf, said she worries about what her degree will do for her in the new Iraq.

"We are afraid that no one will take them," she said.Stay or Leave?

Many educated, professional women have struggled with the question of whether to stay in Iraq.

Muna Nouri, 52, a high school teacher, doesn't want to leave, even if it means having to abide by rules she does not believe in.

As a college student in 1974, Nouri showed off her long black hair. She wore short skirts. She walked around campus with friends who happened to be boys.

As an adult, she and her two daughters -- one is 20, the other 17 -- took walks around their neighborhood in the Hadra district, wearing whatever they wanted.

"I consider myself and my daughters liberated women," she said. "We go out and walk in the street. That was last year even. But this year, it's more difficult. Every day, it's worse than the day before."

The day after sectarian violence erupted in Sadr City late last month, Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr instructed women to continue wearing their hijabs.

"There are some voices being heard against the hijab, from inside and outside Islam," Sadr said. "I say it will remain a protection for our women and call on our sisters to be patient, not to listen to these voices."

Nouri considers herself a religious woman. She prays and reads the Koran. The Islam she knows does not oppress women, she said.

"I think Islam is more liberated than that," she said.

This year, more than 300 teachers and Education Ministry employees have been killed, according to government reports. Nouri does not want to make herself a target at the all-girls' high school where she teaches. So she wears long skirts and a head scarf to work.

"I don't like it, because I think the women here are very beautiful," she said, speaking by phone because she did not want her neighbors to see a stranger visiting her home. "This scarf is not beautiful."

Like Nouri, Bushra Shimirya, 42, had considered herself an independent woman. That changed dramatically in just a few months, she said. She knew things were bad when she could no longer drive her car.

"Anyone who's in her 20s and drives a car for the first time, you feel very happy and very independent," she said. "Like you can do anything."

Since the Samarra bombings, she said, she has felt she can do almost nothing.

Relatives had seen fliers warning women not to drive. They pleaded with her to stop. She resisted.

Shimirya, who has a doctorate in psychological studies, had been driving since she was 20.

But the stares started to bother her. They came from men anytime they saw her behind the wheel of her 1984 Toyota Crown.

So she hired a car service to take her to her job at Baghdad University. She stopped going out unless it was necessary. No more dinners with her girlfriends. No more walking the streets of her affluent Mansour neighborhood.

"It's become so bad that a woman who drives a car will be slaughtered, and a woman who doesn't put a scarf on her hair will be slaughtered," she said.

When classes ended in July, Shimirya and her husband, an engineer, sold their cars, locked up their large, modern-style house and headed to Dubai.

"I miss my home," she said, speaking by phone from Dubai. "I miss my colleagues at work. I miss my neighbors. I miss my family. I miss the air in Iraq. There is nothing more beautiful than Iraq."

New Manual At Odds With Key Iraq Tactics (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. military's new counterinsurgency doctrine takes issue with some key strategies that American commanders in Iraq continue to use, most notably the practice of concentrating combat forces in massive bases rather than dispersing them among the population.

The 282-page counterinsurgency field manual, unveiled Friday, seeks to bring together the best practices in fighting sustained insurgencies that the United States has learned during the Iraq war. It also lists tactics that have tripped up American forces, such as trying to make local security forces act like the U.S. military and overemphasizing killing or capturing enemies rather than providing for the safety of the population.

Although the military has moved away from some of these tactics, others are widely used in Iraq.

Most special operations forces in Iraq spend the bulk of their time and resources trying to kill or capture Al Qaeda members and insurgents. But the manual says the best use of those troops is not hunting enemies but training Iraqi security forces or police.

Perhaps the most controversial section may be the manual's warning about large, sprawling bases, the very kind the Army has erected in Baghdad. The manual warns that such military bases could suggest "a long-term foreign occupation."

A cornerstone of the Iraq plans of Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, has been to concentrate Baghdad's U.S. Army forces in a few large forward operating bases, or FOBs. Counterinsurgency experts have questioned the practice, arguing that to protect the populace from insurgents, military forces must have a constant presence in the area.

The authors of the manual say the new doctrine is not meant as a critique of the Iraq strategy. Retired Army Col. Conrad Crane, who helped oversee the manual's development, said they were not criticizing the practice of putting soldiers on large bases but rather were saying they simply did not want people to hole up and become "fobbits."

"You have to get out and mingle among the people," Crane said. "You can't cede control of the night and the street to the enemy."

Retired Gen. John Keane, former acting chief of staff of the Army, said the military needed to move off the big bases in Baghdad and establish small bases peppered throughout key neighborhoods, as had been done in the Iraqi cities of Tall Afar and Ramadi.

"You put a protect force in that lives in the neighborhood. They stay 24/7 to protect the people," Keane said at a briefing this week. "That piece is what we have never been able to execute in Baghdad."

Although the manual is meant to apply generally to all fights against insurgency, it was clearly written with Iraq in mind. And at some points the introduction and first chapter of the new manual read like a plea for more time for the military to succeed in Iraq.

The new doctrine, which was begun in January and released in draft form in June, cautions that campaigns against insurgents are "often long and difficult" and that progress is hard to measure. Conventional militaries often stumble in the beginning of an insurgency but can succeed if they learn, adapt and push ahead against it, according to the manual.

"The military forces that successfully defeat insurgencies are usually those able to overcome their institutional inclination to wage conventional war against insurgents," the doctrine says.

If there is a theme for the manual, Crane said, it is that the military can adapt and correct its missteps. "That is the historical record: You learn as you go," he said.

Overall, the doctrine says, a counterinsurgency operation is "a struggle for the population's support." To win that confidence, militaries must learn about the culture and people they are trying to protect as well as fight the insurgents who are attempting to destabilize the country, it says.

Lt. Col. Lance A. McDaniel, one of the Marines who helped write the new doctrine, said he expected the manual to influence new strategies in Iraq, although he was not sure exactly what lessons would be embraced.

"I do not know how they will translate this to the field," he said. "But I do think this will be No. 1 on the reading list."

The manual, a public document, can be read at http://usacac.army.mil/cac/repository/materials/coin-fm3-24.pdf.

Options Weighed For Surge In G.I.'s To Stabilize Iraq (NYT)

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15 — Military planners and White House budget analysts have been asked to provide President Bush with options for increasing American forces in Iraq by 20,000 or more. The request indicates that the option of a major "surge" in troop strength is gaining ground as part of a White House strategy review, senior administration officials said Friday.

Discussion of increasing the number of American troops, at least temporarily, has coursed through Washington for two months, as a possible way to reverse the deteriorating security situation in Baghdad. But the decision to ask the Joint Chiefs of Staff to specify where the additional forces could be found among overstretched Army, Marine and National Guard units, and to seek a cost estimate from the White House Office of Management and Budget, signifies a turn in the debate.

Officials said that the options being considered included the deployment of upwards of 50,000 additional troops, but that the political, training and recruiting obstacles to an increase larger than 20,000 to 30,000 troops would be prohibitive.

At present, only about 17,000 American soldiers are actively involved in the effort to secure Baghdad, so even the low end of the proposals being considered by military and budget officials could more than double the size of that force. If adopted, such an increase would be a major departure from the current strategy advocated by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., which has stressed stepping up the training of Iraqi forces and handing off to them as soon as possible.

The details of the plan under study by the White House are not known, but in most scenarios the troop increase would be accomplished in large part by accelerating some scheduled deployments while delaying the departure of units in Iraq.

President Bush has made no final decision, the White House said. Gordon Johndroe, the National Security Council spokesman, said that no memorandums outlining the options for increasing troop strength had gone to the president. But one senior official said the subject was discussed at length on Wednesday during Mr. Bush's briefing at the Pentagon, and the president has reportedly asked detailed questions that some officials have interpreted as suggesting that he is strongly leaning in that direction.

American military officials said Friday night that the Pentagon was planning to send the Second Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division to Kuwait in January. The brigade, based at Fort Bragg, N.C., would serve as a reserve that commanders in Iraq could draw on.

American military commanders have been operating without such a reserve since the Marine unit that had been on call was dispatched to Anbar Province in western Iraq. The Army brigade could become an element of a larger troop deployment to Iraq if the White House decided to increase troops there.

That option has been central to a broader debate in Washington. Advocates of a troop increase say the aim would be to reverse the slide toward an all-out civil war and give the new Iraqi government more time to consolidate control, while training of Iraqis is stepped up.

At the same time, American and Iraqi forces would try to tamp down strife in neighborhoods that contain Shiites and Sunnis, and slow insurgent attacks. To be effective, proponents say, these tactics would need to be married to a broader political and economic strategy to generate employment in Baghdad and stabilize Iraq.

Critics of a surge approach have argued that any American troop increase would lead to more American casualties and merely put off the day when the Iraqis need to assume responsibility for their own security.

There is also concern that the military benefits would be short-lived unless the higher troop levels were sustained for a long period, adding to the strain on American forces. Alternatively, critics say, if the surge in troop levels was too brief, adversaries could simply wait for the reinforcements to leave.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said during a visit to Baghdad this week that American military commanders were discussing the possibility of adding as many as 10 more combat brigades — a maximum of about 35,000 troops — to establish some of control while Iraq's divided political leaders seek solutions to the mounting violence.

On Friday, however, one administration official said that additional work was needed to fit a troop increase into the larger strategy, as well as on technical aspects about how the operation would be carried out. "There has not been a full articulation of what we would want the surge to accomplish," he said.

Strikingly, the surge proposal has not been actively promoted by the top commander in Iraq. General Casey, the senior American commander in Baghdad, has emphasized faster training of Iraqi security forces, an effort that would be supported in part by converting existing combat forces into trainers.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East, has said that the advantages of a surge in troop levels would be temporary, and that it might dissuade Iraqis from doing more to provide for their own security.

Some of the chiefs of the services that would supply forces for the surge have spoken about it in hedged terms. "We would not surge without a purpose," Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, told reporters on Thursday. "And that purpose should be measurable."

But Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who is assuming day-to-day command of American troops in Iraq from Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, is said to be sympathetic to the idea.

The surge proposal has also gained greater support among recently retired officers who served in Iraq, particularly if carried out as part of a broader political and economic strategy.

Two retired Army veterans who served in the unit that took control of the northern Iraqi city of Tal Afar in 2005 — Col. Joel Armstrong and Maj. Daniel Dwyer — helped draft a new study issued Thursday by the American Enterprise Institute that called for sending an additional four or five combat brigades, or some 14,000 to 17,500 troops, to Baghdad.

The study determined that the military could sustain a surge of that level, but that it would require sending several Army brigades back to Iraq a couple of months early and extending the customary yearlong Army tour to 15 months.

In its report last week, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group rejected the idea of a “substantial” force increase on the order of 100,000 to 200,000 troops, saying that those levels were not “available for a sustained deployment” and would feed fears in Iraq that the United States was planning a long-term occupation.

“We could, however, support a short-term redeployment or surge of American combat forces to stabilize Baghdad,” the report added, “or to speed up the training and equipping mission, if the U.S. commander in Iraq determines that such steps would be effective.”

Military planners and White House budget analysts have been asked to provide President George W. Bush with options for increasing American forces in Iraq by 20,000 troops or more, The New York Times has reported.

Citing unnamed senior administration officials, the newspaper said the request indicates that the option of a major "surge" in troop strength is gaining ground as part of a White House strategy review.

Discussion of increasing the number of American troops has gone on in Washington for two months as a possible way to reverse the deteriorating security situation in Baghdad, the report said.

BBC.com, December 15, 2006

US President George W Bush is likely to boost troop levels in Iraq next year, an administration official has said.

Up to 25,000 more troops could be deployed to try to help end the violence, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The comments come a day after prominent Republican John McCain called for up to 30,000 more troops to be sent to Iraq.

Mr Bush had been due to announce a new strategy on Iraq next week, but has delayed his speech until January.

He is holding a flurry of meetings with top US and Iraqi officials and experts on how to change his policy.

In Iraq, the country's biggest humanitarian organisation has accused US troops of attacking its offices and vehicles.

The Iraqi Red Crescent's vice-president said attacks by US-led forces were the biggest problem it faced.

The US military said it was checking the allegations.

'Serious situation'

The US administration source said the mission of the additional troops would be threefold, the BBC's Adam Brookes reports from Washington:

To help secure Baghdad amid daily car bombings and kidnappings

To make a renewed push to quell the insurgency in the Western province of Anbar

To tackle the militias behind much of the sectarian violence in the country, but especially the capital.

The remarks appear to be setting the tone for Mr Bush's announcement of his new Iraq strategy, our correspondent says.

He says the idea of boosting troop levels for one final push at halting the spiralling violence has been much discussed in Washington recently.

The comments came a day after Senator McCain called for more troops to stabilise Iraq.

"The situation is very, very serious," he said in Baghdad.

"It requires an injection of additional troops to control the situation and to allow the political process to proceed," he said.

There are currently 140,000 US troops in Iraq.

Military scepticism

Since a high-level review group published its findings last week, President Bush has been consulting with his military commanders and Iraqi political leaders to shape a new strategy.

President Bush has bid farewell to his outgoing defence secretary

Military commanders, however, have been expressing scepticism that extra troops on their own will have much effect, our correspondent says.

They say that stability in Iraq can now only be had by political means.

The Iraq Study Group, composed of top Democrat and Republican legislators and experts, said combat troops could be withdrawn from Iraq by early 2008.

They said the current US strategy of "staying the course" was no longer viable.

On Wednesday, Mr Bush said he would not be rushed into making "a difficult decision".

"I've heard some ideas that would lead to defeat. And I reject those ideas, ideas such as leaving before the job is done; ideas such as not helping this government take the necessary and hard steps to be able to do its job."

Pentagon To Move Troops Into Kuwait (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 16, 2006

The U.S. military is planning to move a brigade of troops into Kuwait in what could be the first step of a short-term surge of American forces into Iraq to stabilize the violence.

The 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division is expected in Kuwait shortly after the new year, a senior Defense Department official told The Associated Press on Friday. The official requested anonymity because the plans had not yet been announced.

The 2nd Brigade, made up of roughly 3,500 troops, is based at Fort Bragg, N.C., and would be deployed in Iraq early next year if needed, the official said. The move would be part of an effort to boost the number of U.S. troops in Iraq for a short time, the official said. The plan was first reported by CBS News.

In a half-hour video conference with President Bush on Friday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki outlined plans for the national reconciliation conference taking place in Baghdad on Saturday. Al-Maliki cited the desire of many people in Iraq for a larger core of Iraqi political leaders to come together for the common objective of stabilizing the country and promoting the rule of law, National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said in describing the conversation.

Al-Maliki also talked with Bush about providing greater security, in particular in Baghdad, by going after all sources of violence, including insurgents and militias, Johndroe said. Bush reiterated his support for al-Maliki and said he was encouraged by the meetings he had recently with Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi, and with the leader of the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim.

In assessing the state of the war in Iraq, Bush has been meeting this week with top generals and other advisers. The military options being considered include an increased effort to train and equip Iraqi forces.

Meanwhile, the commander of U.S. forces in the strife-ridden Iraqi province of Diyala said Friday that tribal leaders and some political groups in the province are turning to terrorists and insurgents for protection rather than trust Iraqi soldiers and police.

"This sort of unity only worsens the sectarian divide and encourages further violence," said Col. David Sutherland, commander of the 3rd Brigade, 1st Cavalry Division. He spoke to reporters at the Pentagon by a satellite video connection from his headquarters near the city of Baqouba, northeast of Baghdad.

"Public perceptions of corruption, inequity and fear are the driving force behind support to terrorist organizations," Sutherland added. "These are not new problems in Iraq but problems that developed out of a desire for personal and financial gain."

Sutherland said he is trying to turn that around by putting Iraqi police through more rigorous training, placing more U.S. advisers in the Iraqi army and police units and through Iraqi efforts to recruit a police and army force that better reflects the sectarian makeup of Diyala, which is about 55 percent Sunni, 30 percent Shiite and 15 percent Kurd.

Currently, the Iraqi security forces in Diyala are predominantly Shiite, he said.

Sutherland said he is working out arrangements to expand the use of U.S. adviser teams with Iraqi security forces, reflecting the view of senior U.S. commanders that such an expansion can speed the development of competent Iraqi forces.

The Army is considering ways it can speed up the creation of two additional combat brigades — a move intended to expand the pool of active-duty combat brigades in order to relieve some of the strain on the Army from large-scale deployments to Iraq.

Under the plan being developed, the new brigades could be formed next year and be ready to be sent to Iraq in 2008, defense officials told The Associated Press. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because the plans were not final.

The Army's chief of staff, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, told a commission Thursday that he wants to increase the half-million-member force beyond the 30,000 troops authorized in recent years. And he warned that the Army "will break" without thousands more active duty troops and greater use of the reserves.

3 More GIs Killed In Iraq This Week (AP)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 16, 2006

Three more U.S. troops died in fighting this week, the military said Friday, raising to 54 the number of Americans killed in Iraq in December — nearly half of them in Anbar.

The month is shaping up to be one of the deadliest for Americans since the war started, especially for those trying to tame the Sunni-led insurgency in the volatile province west of Baghdad.

At least 25 of the U.S. troops killed this month — most Marines — died in the vast stretch of desert that extends from the capital to the borders with Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia. Three U.S. aircraft also went down in a span of two weeks, starting with the crash of a fighter jet on Nov. 27.

The large number of casualties reflects the strength of Sunni insurgents, including al-Qaida in Iraq, in the region, even as violence in Baghdad shifts to a fight between Sunni and Shiite extremists.

It also comes despite a decision by some U.S. commanders in the area to pull troops out of combat missions and partner them with Iraqi army units as advisers and mentors.

With President Bush weighing strategy changes in the war, the U.S. Army's chief of staff, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, said Thursday that Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq, is considering shifting many troops from combat missions to training Iraqi units, among other options.

Two Marines died Thursday in fighting in Anbar province, the military said. In Ninevah province to the northwest, a soldier assigned to the 4th Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, was killed Tuesday, the military said.

At least 2,942 members of the U.S. military have died since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, meanwhile, issued his first public comment on a bipartisan U.S. report that said American policies in Iraq were failing and urged drastic changes.

"The report should have read the events more accurately and turned them into a good base for a solution. Instead, it contained contradictions in vision and recommendations," al-Maliki said in an interview on the pan-Arab satellite station Al-Arabiya.

He said the 96-page report contained "good elements" regarding the political process and Iraq's unity, but it also included "insults and negative directions" in regard to the Iraq conflict. He did not elaborate.

The prime minister's comments were the latest in a flurry of criticism by Iraqi leaders, who have said the recommendations in the Iraq Study Group report did not acknowledge realities in post-Saddam Hussein Iraq and infringed on the country's sovereignty.

The nonbinding report recommended direct engagement with Iran and Syria, approval of a law that could reinstate thousands of former officials of Saddam's Baath Party to their jobs and a pullback of most American combat brigades by early 2008.

Al-Maliki also said he planned a Cabinet reshuffle but cautioned that he would carefully scrutinize candidates for ministerial posts and warned that he won't accept candidates nominated by his coalition partners if he found them to be unqualified.

"I am not obliged to accept anyone and I will choose ministers myself if I have to," he said.

The warning came as the Shiite prime minister's "national unity" government is facing growing dissent by coalition partners, including Shiite allies like Muqtada al-Sadr, rival politicians seeking to sideline the anti-American cleric and Sunni Arab politicians.

Iraqi Interior Minister Jawad al-Boulani, meanwhile, arrived in Syria on Friday for talks on setting up joint security patrols along the two countries' border, a crossing point for militants seeking to join the insurgency in Iraq.

The two countries recently resumed diplomatic relations after a 24-year rupture.

Both the U.S. and Iraq have accused Syria of failing to take sufficient steps to stop militants from crossing the border to join insurgents fighting U.S.-led forces and Iraqi troops. Syria has repeatedly denied the charge, saying it cannot completely seal its border with Iraq.

In Iraq's western Anbar province, which borders Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, two suicide car bombs exploded Friday at U.S. checkpoints in the provincial capital of Ramadi and American soldiers opened fire to foil one of the attacks, an Iraqi police lieutenant said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was concerned for his safety. He said four Iraqi civilians were killed.

The U.S. military said it had no reports of suicide car bombings in Ramadi.

At least 34 people were killed or found dead Friday, including 22 bullet-riddled bodies discovered in several parts of the capital, apparent victims of sectarian death squads that have killed hundreds in recent months.

Gunmen also killed a Shiite tribal sheik linked to British forces in a drive-by shooting Friday in the southern city of Basra.

The slain cleric, Muhsin al-Kanan, was a member of the provisional council in Iraq's second-largest city, 340 miles southeast of Baghdad, and had good relations with British forces in the area, police said.

Britain has about 7,200 troops in southern Iraq, mostly in and around Basra, and Shiite factions and militias have been fighting for control of the area as they begin to withdraw from some of the provinces in the region. Attacks by insurgents from Iraq's Sunni Arab minority also have occurred in the area.

A senior official from the Iraqi Red Crescent, meanwhile, claimed that harassment from U.S. forces is a greater threat to his group's work than insurgent attacks.

"The main problem we are facing is the American forces more than the other forces," Dr. Jamal al-Karbouli, vice president of the Iraqi Red Crescent, said in Geneva.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, said the U.S.-led coalition forces "strive to ensure they are respectful when they conduct interaction with the local population."

The Curtain Is Drawn On The Rumsfeld Era (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

After a parade of military regalia and a 19-gun salute that echoed across the Potomac, Donald H. Rumsfeld stepped down yesterday as secretary of defense, delivering a warning to those who contemplate "graceful exits from the agonies and . . . ugliness of combat."

Surrounded on the Pentagon mall by the architects of the Iraq war -- from President Bush and Vice President Cheney to former deputy defense secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz and former undersecretary of defense Douglas J. Feith -- Rumsfeld ended his six years in office with a forceful, even defiant, tone. "Our country has taken on a bracing and difficult task. But let there be no doubt: It is neither hopeless nor without purpose," he said.

Still, his voice grew deep and cracked as he concluded that, upon leaving, "I will remember the fallen." And asked by a reporter what his greatest regret was, Rumsfeld replied it was that the Iraq and Afghanistan wars have not ended more swiftly. "It's taken longer than people had anticipated, it's more difficult," he said in an interview yesterday on Fox News.

But even as Rumsfeld issued the last of his infamous and prolific memos known as "snowflakes," inside the Pentagon officials were preparing for what some called a new era of opportunity -- even glasnost -- created by his departure.

"There's Old Europe, and then there's New Europe," one senior Pentagon official quipped -- paraphrasing one of Rumsfeld's more notorious remarks to describe the hope for change under the incoming defense secretary, former CIA director Robert M. Gates, who is to be sworn in on Monday.

Above all, Rumsfeld's resignation -- which came a day after Republicans lost control of Congress on Nov. 7 in elections widely viewed as a referendum on the Iraq war -- opens the door for a more candid assessment of the Pentagon's mistakes in Iraq and for alternative military strategies, said the officials, who were not authorized to speak on the record.

Rumsfeld had "pretty rocky relations with the Congress," said one senior military official, so with Gates's arrival "there is an opportunity for relations with Congress to change."

Army officials hope that Gates will be more receptive to their initiatives to increase the Army's manpower, budget and access to the Army National Guard and Army Reserve. "Rumsfeld came into office with the idea that the Army needed to be smaller. Do you think that idea has changed?" asked another senior military official.

Army officials are still bitter over Rumsfeld's public repudiation of Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, then the Army chief of staff, who predicted in early 2003 that it would require several hundred thousand U.S. troops to effectively stabilize Iraq. Rumsfeld later declined to attend Shinseki's retirement ceremony in June 2003, when Shinseki issued a warning clearly directed at the Pentagon leader: "Beware the 12-division strategy for a 10-division Army," he said.

Yesterday, at least one official cited the perceived snub to Shinseki as the reason for not attending Rumsfeld's farewell.

Still, other officers cautioned that because Gates will be surrounded by the same advisers and administration officials that Rumsfeld was, the change may well be less dramatic than anticipated.

Pace lauded Rumsfeld's courage, compassion and particularly his willingness to accept the blame for misdeeds by subordinates. "Secretary Rumsfeld accepted the responsibility and not once, in public or in private, did I ever hear this man try to shift responsibility to anyone else but himself," Pace said.

Cheney hailed Rumsfeld as his best boss, best friend, an "ideal" public servant and "the finest secretary of defense this nation has ever had."

For his part, Bush portrayed Rumsfeld as a comrade in arms. "Don Rumsfeld has been at my side from the moment I took office. We've been through war together," Bush said.

"We walked amid the rubble of the broken Pentagon the day after September the 11th, 2001. He was with me when we planned the liberation of Afghanistan. We were in the Oval Office together the day I gave the order to remove Saddam Hussein from power," he said.

"In these and countless other moments, I have seen Don Rumsfeld's character and his integrity. He has always ensured I had the best possible advice. . . . He spoke straight. It was easy to understand him."

Rumsfeld, taking the podium as the sun broke through a heavy December sky, chose to focus his remarks not on his six-year tenure but on the future. "Weakness is provocative," he warned, drawing similarities between the threat of extremist groups today and the Cold War threats the nation faced when he ended his previous stint in the top Pentagon job in 1977.

"America's enemies should not confuse the American people's distaste of war -- which is real and which is understandable -- with a reluctance to defend our way of life," said Rumsfeld, who drew prolonged applause at the end of his speech.

Known both for his impatient, demanding managerial style and for his quick wit, Rumsfeld yesterday dispatched the last of thousands of "snowflakes" or memos -- his favored method for issuing questions and instructions.

"The blizzard is over!" he said in the memo addressed to Pentagon personnel. "Thank you for all you do for our wonderful country. Well done!"

He granted "a general amnesty for any outstanding snowflakes."

In Farewell, Rumsfeld Warns Weakness Is "Provocative" (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15 — Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld bade farewell to the Pentagon on Friday with a combative valedictory speech in which he warned against hoping for “graceful exits” from Iraq and said it would be wrong to regard the lack of new attacks on American soil as a sign that the nation is safe from terrorism.

“Today, it should be clear that not only is weakness provocative,” Mr. Rumsfeld said, standing at a lectern with President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney at his side, “but the perception of weakness on our part can be provocative as well.”

It was a clear parting shot at those considering a withdrawal from war that would define his legacy and perhaps that of the president.

“A conclusion by our enemies that the United States lacks the will or the resolve to carry out missions that demand sacrifice and demand patience is every bit as dangerous as an imbalance of conventional military power,” Mr. Rumsfeld said in a buoyant but sometimes emotional speech.

Mr. Rumsfeld resigned in November after an election in which Democrats won control of Congress by promising to force change in Iraq. His successor, Robert M. Gates, takes over on Monday.

Mr. Rumsfeld spoke after receiving full honors on the Pentagon grounds on his last day of work there. The ceremonies began with a 19-gun salute before he walked the grounds to inspect the representatives from all the service branches gathered in formation and in full dress.

Present in the crowd were some of the former administration hawks with whom he planned the invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq: Paul D. Wolfowitz, his former deputy, and Douglas J. Feith, his under secretary for defense policy. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, his frequent rival in Mr. Bush’s cabinet, did not attend.

The ceremony brought to a close perhaps the most controversial tenure for a secretary of defense since that of Robert McNamara, whose record tenure in the job bested Mr. Rumsfeld’s by a mere 10 days. Like Mr. McNamara, Mr. Rumsfeld leaves a war he helped conceive in the hands of others.

And like Mr. McNamara, his record is likely to be dissected and debated for years after his resignation.

Yet for all of its pomp, there was little talk at the ceremony about Mr. Rumsfeld’s famously combative style or the controversies he tended to provoke.

In opening remarks, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, did refer indirectly to the Abu Ghraib torture scandal, which Mr. Rumsfeld has called the low mark of his tenure. But General Pace did so in complimenting Mr. Rumsfeld for ultimately taking the blame for prisoner abuses for which the general placed blame on others down the chain of command.

Mr. Cheney's declaration that "Don Rumsfeld is the finest secretary of defense the nation has ever had," was more in keeping with the tone of the event.

With Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation — forced by Mr. Bush as he seeks a new approach in Iraq — Mr. Cheney is losing one of his closest allies in the administration.

Mr. Rumsfeld hired Mr. Cheney to work in the Ford administration. Both men served as White House chief of staff, in the House of Representatives and as secretary of defense. (Mr. Rumsfeld has been secretary of defense twice, the first time for President Ford.)

And their shared post-Sept. 11 conviction that the United States must use strength as a deterrent and pre-emptively strike at those who plan to attack the nation has remained unbowed in the face of setbacks in Iraq.

"In this hour of transition every member of our military, and every person at the Pentagon, can be certain that America will stay on the offensive," Mr. Cheney said. "We will stay in the fight until this threat is defeated and our children and grandchildren can live in a safer world."

Mr. Rumsfeld leaves the Pentagon having overseen two wars, an attack on the Pentagon itself and what he called a "transformation" in the use of force. That involved a switch to smaller fighting units that he said would be nimbler and more effective than larger ones favored in the past — an approach that saw early success in Afghanistan but has faced a more severe test in Iraq.

Mr. Bush was known to have appreciated Mr. Rumsfeld's efforts, even as calls for the defense secretary's resignation grew louder, and he indicated as much on Friday. "There has been more profound change at the Department of Defense over the past six years than at any time since the department's creation in the late 1940s," Mr. Bush said. "These changes were not easy, but because of Don Rumsfeld's determination and leadership, America has the best equipped, the best trained, and most experienced armed forces in the history of the world."

Mr. Rumsfeld had the last words of the day, using them to warn against backing down in Iraq. "This is a time of great consequence," he said. "It may well be comforting to some to consider graceful exits from the agonies and, indeed, the ugliness of combat. But the enemy thinks differently."

Chief Judge On Saddam Panel Steps Down (AP)

The chief investigator on the 10-judge panel that sentenced Saddam Hussein to death said Saturday that he has relinquished that role, allowing another judge to take over the post for the Iraqi High Tribunal.

Raid Juhi said he will remain as a judge and spokesman on the tribunal, which handles the proceedings against the ousted dictator and other former regime members.

Juhi has been a high-profile figure in the trials against Saddam, who was sentenced to death for the killing of 148 Shiites in Dujail, north of Baghdad, after a 1982 assassination attempt there against the ousted leader. Two other senior members of Saddam's regime were also sentenced to death in the Nov. 5 ruling by the tribunal.

Juhi said he was replaced during annual elections held by tribunal members because he did not run for re-election to his post as main investigator.

"Somebody else was chosen," he said. Juhi declined to identify his replacement because of security concerns.

On Friday, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said he hoped it would only be a matter of days before an appeals court rules on Saddam's death sentence. Defense lawyers filed an appeal Dec. 3. Iraqi law states that if a death sentence is upheld, it must be carried out within 30 days.

Saddam is being tried separately on charges of genocide linked to a military campaign in the 1980s against Iraq's minority Kurds in which tens of thousands of people are thought to have been killed.

Civilian Deaths Hit Afghan Support For Nato (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee

Financial Times, December 16, 2006

Rising anger at the growing number of civilians being caught in the crossfire between Nato troops and Taliban insurgents is creating concern that support for Nato in southern Afghanistan is being severely undermined.

It came as British-led Nato armoured columns swept into the southern province of Kandahar on Friday, launching one of the biggest operations for months.

The issue of civilian casualties topped the agenda at a meeting of Nato and US generals, ambassadors and Afghan ministers that was convened in Kandahar this week by Hamid Karzai, Afghanistan's president, to look at ways of stemming the bloodshed.

Tuesday's meeting came three days after Mr Karzai wept openly on national television about his helplessness to protect the Afghan people from US, Nato or Taliban violence.

"We can't prevent the terrorists from coming from Pakistan, and we can't prevent the coalition from bombing the terrorists, and our children are dying because of that," Mr Karzai said in a speech marking International Human Rights Day.

Almost 4,000 people have died since the beginning of the year in a resurgent Taliban insurgency, most of them in the four southern provinces of the country.

The US-based Human Rights Watch organisation estimates that more than 1,000 of the dead were civilians.

"Nato's strategy has eroded support for its mission as well as for Karzai – nothing could be more telling than Karzai weeping and complaining about Nato killing Afghan civilians," said Sam Zia Zarifi, Asia research director at Human Rights Watch.

The US air force has dropped more bombs on Afghanistan in the past six months than in the first three years of its campaign against the Taliban, according to figures released by the Pentagon.

Some 987 bombs were dropped between June and November and 146,000 cannon rounds were fired by US aircraft in support of Nato allies in the south.

Stoking public anger further has been a recent surge of suicide bombings in southern Afghanistan, which has led Nato troops to react more quickly to defend themselves.

"We are extremely worried – it hurts us, it hurts Afghan civilians. We are worried by it, Nato is also worried by it, and we are working together to reduce such casualties," Mr Karzai told reporters.

Nato spokesman Mark Laity said the organisation was looking at ways to curb civilian casualties as a matter of urgency. "We know that it is damaging to our image, and more important we do not want to harm innocent people," he said.

Tribal elders said two recent incidents in Kandahar where civilians were shot by Nato troops have left local people jittery and angry.

Afghanistan: 2 More Suicide Attacks (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

A suicide attacker's car exploded close to a joint NATO-Afghan convoy in eastern Paktia Province, killing an Afghan soldier and a civilian and wounding a NATO soldier. In neighboring Paktika Province an hour later, a man dressed in a burqa blew himself up and wounded two Afghan soldiers and a civilian. Muhammad Akram Khapalwak, the governor, said the man was a Pakistani.

26 Bosnian Serbs Arrested In U.S. (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

A Justice Department dragnet based on war crimes probes in Europe led to 26 arrests in the past week of Bosnian Serbs who had obtained refugee status in the United States by allegedly concealing their service in the Bosnian Serb military during the bitter Yugoslav conflict of the mid-1990s.

The arrests occurred in at least eight cities, including Denver and Orlando. They reflect an intensified effort by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) to root out unacknowledged members of the Bosnian Serb military using data supplied by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, located in The Hague.

A former U.S. Army intelligence analyst who worked at The Hague from 1997 to 2001, Richard J. Butler, helped instigate the U.S. effort when he prodded the agency to compare immigration records with lists of Bosnian soldiers in units linked to the 1995 massacre of 8,000 Muslims in the town of Srebrenica. The killings are considered the worst European war crime of the past 50 years.

Butler was a key witness at the trials of Bosnian Serb officers involved in the massacre before the Hague tribunal, where he spent three years reconstructing events at Srebrenica from seized military documents, combat reports, photos, videotapes, witness testimony and transcripts of intercepted radio communications. He now works at the immigration office in Atlanta.

In 2004, U.S. officials said, immigration agents in Massachusetts were investigating Marko Boskic, a Bosnian Croat who served in a Serb military unit at Srebrenica, when Butler offered them a list of soldiers attached to other units deployed in or near the Bosnian town.

That list has since become fodder for a nationwide investigation overseen by the immigration office's Human Rights Violators and Public Safety Unit in Washington. Boskic has been convicted of immigration fraud.

Those targeted are a small fraction of the more than 200,000 refugees who came to the United States from the former Yugoslavia during the 1990s, mostly because of the Bosnian conflict. Previous immigration roundups related to Srebrenica, in September 2005 and in June, netted 20 Bosnian Serbs in Phoenix and four Bosnian Serbs in Salt Lake City. Like those arrested in the past week, they were charged with visa fraud, perjury or making false statements.

Some of those recently arrested have been criminally charged and face prison terms, while others have been put into administrative proceedings that could lead to deportation. Most have families or jobs here. After deportation to Bosnia, which is now independent and governed by an ethnic coalition, they could face further investigation, detention and prosecution by the country's indigenous war crimes chamber.

Only a few of those arrested here are accused by the Justice Department of directly taking part in the Srebrenica killings, but all allegedly were in units that did.

A government affidavit filed before the recent arrest of Nedjo Ikonic in Greenfield, Wis., for example, alleges that he commanded a police company that oversaw the evacuation of Bosnian Muslims from Srebrenica as part of the planned massacre. It cites a report written by Butler, witness statements and a police roster recovered by Hague investigators from a headquarters building in Bosnia.

No one answered the telephone at Ikonic's residence yesterday.

Julie L. Myers, assistant secretary of homeland security for ICE, said in a statement that her office "will not allow the United States to be a safe haven for those who failed to disclose their service in military forces that were known to commit atrocities."

An ICE official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said additional investigations are underway of Bosnian Serb, Croat and Muslim immigrants linked to atrocities but declined to provide details.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Small Firms Get Sarbanes-Oxley Extension (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission yesterday gave the smallest public companies five more months to comply with financial-control rules under the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

It was the fourth such delay granted by the SEC to companies with market value of less than $75 million. The decision came two days after the five-member SEC tentatively adopted a plan to give corporate managers at all public companies more flexibility in assessing the strength of internal financial controls. That change would especially benefit smaller companies.

Sarbanes-Oxley requires companies to assess the strength of their internal safeguards to ensure that their financial statements are accurate. Companies have complained that the rules are burdensome and costly, especially for smaller businesses.

Under the latest extension, the smallest companies will have to report on their controls in annual reports for fiscal years ending on or after Dec. 15, 2007. The previous deadline was for fiscal years ending on or after July 15.

The SEC also gave all companies that have recently become public a transition period before they must comply with the financial-control rules.

Regulators Ease Post-Scandal Rules (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, December 16, 2006

The Week's Business: Justice Dept., SEC Actions Backpedal a Bit on Post-Scandal Rules

WASHINGTON (AP) -- They were two early Christmas gifts for corporate America -- with potentially far-reaching effects for investors and the financial landscape.

At the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission, separate actions this week both had the effect of easing landmark rules laid down in response to the 2002 crisis of corporate malfeasance.

Culminating an intense monthslong lobbying campaign by an array of companies, the five SEC commissioners voted at a public meeting Wednesday to propose a plan giving corporate managers more flexibility in assessing the strength of internal financial controls. It would especially benefit smaller companies.

The sweeping antifraud law known as Sarbanes-Oxley was enacted in 2002 amid the wave of scandals that engulfed Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and other big corporations. The law contains a key section requiring public companies to assess the strength of their internal safeguards to ensure that their financial statements are accurate. Companies have complained to the SEC that those rules are overly burdensome and costly, especially for smaller businesses.

The Justice Department, meanwhile, restricted its prosecutors' ability to crack down on companies that withhold confidential information during criminal fraud investigations, in new guidelines issued Tuesday that clipped back the aggressive legal tactics authorized after the scandals. They bar the government from seeking harsher penalties for companies that won't cooperate with prosecutors -- either by denying the prosecutors corporate attorney-client communications or by helping their employees under investigation by covering their legal fees.

"The real issue is how do you get the balance right?" said Joel Seligman, the president of the University of Rochester and an expert on securities law. The new policy may be closer to striking a balance between the need to prosecute corporate crime and the "unequivocal" right of defendants to litigate, he suggested.

The policy "is going to set the tone," Seligman said.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, who wrote the new guidelines, said they won't hinder prosecutors from vigorously pursuing companies accused of fraud and other white-collar crimes. But critics, including a group representing whistle-blowers, called the changes a setback for shareholders and employees who risk losing billions if scandal-tainted corporations aren't fully prosecuted. They accused the Justice Department of caving in to pressure from business interests.

The actions by both the Justice Department, which carries out the Bush administration's policies, and the independent regulator SEC may eliminate the need for Congress to act in similar veins. Some business-friendly Democrats who are assuming power positions in January have expressed support for Sarbanes-Oxley relief for companies -- and their preference for the SEC to wield its regulatory scalpel as opposed to Congress' heavier hand of legislation.

The SEC move was a "reasonable approach" in light of the disproportionate burden of the financial-control rules on small companies, said James Cox, a professor at Duke University who also is a securities-law specialist.

Still, he said, with more leeway under the SEC plan -- allowing, for example, less stringent testing of internal controls for some companies, "Those (financial) numbers are going to be less trustworthy than they would be otherwise. ... Investor protection's going to suffer."

McNulty said the new prosecutorial policy should help companies curb fraud internally by encouraging open talk between corporate attorneys and their clients. "It, in no way, slows down the ability to prosecute these cases successfully," he told The Associated Press.

The actions of both agencies follow a report issued last month by an influential private-sector group, the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, that has been part of the business push for a softening of the laws and rules that flowed from the 2002 scandals. That campaign has gained traction with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson questioning recently whether regulations are hurting the competitiveness of U.S. financial markets by driving some companies away from them.

Among the committee's recommendations: easing of the financial-control rules under Sarbanes-Oxley and tightening the legal standard the government must meet to charge companies with crimes. The group also urged reducing the liability of auditors in shareholder lawsuits over accounting fraud and a shift to a financial regulatory system based on principles rather than rules.

Another group, formed by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, will release its own report early next year. The Chamber has been waging a legal assault against what it views as excessive regulation since 2002, suing the SEC over rules and scoring several victories in high courts.

"Business is putting a big push on in the final years of the Bush administration," said Duke University's Cox.

A Verdict On Sarbanes-Oxley: Unconstitutional (WSJ)

By Kenneth W. Starr

The Wall Street Journal, December 16, 2006

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act powerfully illustrates the law of unintended consequences. Due to hasty drafting by Congress in the wake of the Enron and WorldCom scandals, Sarbox has cost the U.S. economy over $1 trillion, according to one study published by the AEI-Brookings Center. To add insult to grievous injury, it is unconstitutional.

That last point will be argued next Thursday before Judge James Robertson of the district court for the District of Columbia. The plaintiffs in Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board -- a free-market advocacy organization based in Washington, D.C., and a Nevada accounting firm, Beckstead and Watts, that audits smaller public companies -- challenge the method by which the members of the all-powerful Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB) are appointed; the Board's ability to perform executive branch functions such as regulation of public company activities in the securities markets; and the delegation of legislative powers to an independent organization.

First, plaintiffs claim that Sarbox violates the constitutional requirement that power to enforce federal law be vested in the president or in executive branch officials answerable to the president.

Because the Board exercises important governmental powers, its members are "officers of the United States," who must be appointed in the manner set forth in the "appointments clause" of the Constitution (Article Two, Section Two) -- that is, by the president and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Congress instead drafted the statute to insulate the Board's wide-ranging exercise of executive and administrative powers from presidential oversight or control. By granting to the SEC, rather than the president, power to appoint Board members -- Sarbox violates the appointments clause.

Second, Congress gave the Board disturbingly broad powers with only minimal oversight. The PCAOB has wide-ranging executive and administrative powers. These include setting standards regulating accounting firms and exercising disciplinary power over them. The Board is also immune from any effective control by the president or any head of an executive-branch department -- the chairman of the SEC cannot remove PCAOB members at will.

Third, Sarbox confers impermissible legislative authority on the Board. The PCAOB can finance its own operations; it can levy fees on all public companies and even set its own salaries. But Congress cannot delegate its own legislative power: this is a basic violation of our bedrock system of separation of powers.

Responding to these arguments, the government says that because the Board is under the "broad and pervasive oversight" of the SEC, this cures any constitutional defects. Not so.

The claim of oversight flies in the face of flinty reality. The SEC's control is theoretical, not actual; it does not set PCAOB member salaries and cannot remove members at will. When acting within the broad range of its current discretionary powers, the PCAOB makes executive-branch policy judgments (how strictly to enforce a particular auditing standard, how onerous inspections ought to be, etc.) that are essentially unreviewable by the president and his subordinates. Courts are in no position to second-guess these policy judgments, either. They merely review to see whether a Board decision, or more precisely, an SEC decision to affirm a Board decision, is within the Board's statutory discretion. This very deferential standard of review is completely insufficient to ensure, as the Constitution's separation of powers requires, that the PCAOB is subject to the proper political checks and balances.

On the appointments clause, the government argues that Board members are "inferior officers" of the government operating under SEC oversight. (Everyone agrees that if Board members are principal officers their appointments violate the appointments clause.) There are peculiarities in the government's case. The salary structure of the PCAOB is unprecedented within the executive branch -- Board members are "inferior officers" of the executive branch who just happen to make more than the head of the executive branch?

It would also be very strange for "inferior officers" to have the authority to impose taxes. Higher ranking officials such as the assistant secretaries of the Treasury or the Interior have no such power; can one imagine a Treasury official inventing a new tax or imposing a new fee without explicit authority to do so? That is simply not our system. It is therefore much more logical to understand the Board's creation as an unconstitutional delegation of legislative powers.

In short, the government's theory seems to be: "Why worry? There are no real problems here. If there are, the SEC can take care of them." But our constitutional system is not structured that way. Unelected commissions should not have the power to regulate, tax, and even punish companies and individuals. It is now up to the federal courts to regulate these boundaries. The government has argued for a dismissal on jurisdictional grounds, but Judge Robertson agreed with the plaintiffs that the constitutional issues should be resolved first.

Despite legitimate public outrage over corporate scandals, good intentions provide no immunity from an unconstitutional scheme. In the war on terror, Congress recently responded to the Supreme Court's decision in the Guantanamo case (Hamdan v. Rumsfeld) and resolved the question of military tribunals for suspected terrorists by acting within the proper constitutional framework. All this lawsuit asks is that Congress do the same thing for the PCAOB.

Even the statute's co-author, Rep. Mike Oxley, has conceded that Sarbanes-Oxley was hastily written and enacted. In its rush to "do something" about corporate scandals, Congress overstepped the bounds of its authority. It is time to call Congress back, both to help our economy and reaffirm that our constitutional system imposes clear limits on the government's urgent desire to "do something." Congress must be reminded that the "solution" is at times worse than the problem.

Mr. Starr, dean of Pepperdine University's School of Law and a retired federal appeals court judge, is counsel to the plaintiffs in Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board.

Closer Look At Corporate Pay (AP)

By Marcy Gordon

AP, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Investors are getting access to clearer and more detailed information from public companies on their top executives' pay packages and perks under federal rules that took effect on Friday.

Companies' 2006 annual reports issued early next year will reflect the changes, which were ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission in July in a major overhaul of disclosure rules for executive compensation.

The new requirements include disclosure of the dating of stock option grants to executives. Companies must provide detailed information on how they determine when executives receive option grants and, if they do so, how and why they backdate options. Suspect timing of option grants has turned into corporate America's scandal of the year, with more than 100 companies under investigation by the SEC or the Justice Department, more than $5 billion in profit erased by restatements and 18 CEOs swept out of office.

An academic study completed this fall found that corporate executives gained an average of $600,000 a year each from backdating of stock options between 2000 and 2004. By contrast, shareholders were hurt by an average loss in market value of 8 percent, or $500 million, for each affected company from the negative publicity of being under government investigation, the researchers at the University of Michigan found.

When stock options are backdated, they are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price — fattening profit for options recipients when they sell their shares at higher market prices.

Backdating options can be legal as long as the practice is disclosed properly to investors and approved by the company's board. In some cases, however, the practice can run afoul of federal accounting and tax laws.

For the first time, under the new disclosure rules, companies are required to furnish tables in annual filings showing the total yearly compensation for their chief executive officers, chief financial officers and the next three highest-paid executives. Most of the disclosures, in annual reports and other regulatory filings, must be written in plain English.

The rules were designed to enhance corporate accountability and address an issue that has angered company shareholders and the public: lavish compensation for executives, unrelated to their performance, even as companies stumble and lay off employees.

In the SEC's 72-year history, no other issue has stirred as much interest, with more than 20,000 letters filed during the public comment period that followed the proposal being floated last January, according to agency officials.

The SEC removed from its original proposal, though, a requirement for companies to disclose the pay details of as many as three non-executive employees whose individual compensation exceeds that of any of their top five executives.

Judge's Rebuke Prompts New Rules For Prosecutors (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

It was a ruling that sent shudders through the Justice Department.

Judge Lewis A. Kaplan of the Federal District Court in Manhattan in June issued a scathing criticism of the prosecution's tactics in a criminal case against former tax professionals of the accounting firm KPMG. The government, the judge said, "let its zeal get in the way of its judgment."

For one, the judge cited the prosecutors' pledge earlier in the case that they would examine "under a microscope" whether KPMG was paying the legal fees of the defendants. KPMG ultimately refused to pay the defendants' legal expenses, he wrote "because the government held the proverbial gun to its head."

While the judge's comments were stinging, it was the comments by the federal prosecutors that prompted some serious soul-searching within the Justice Department in Washington. "It's just not necessary" to use that kind of language, a top Justice official told a defense lawyer at the time.

Months later, those private discussions have now produced new guidelines, known as the McNulty memorandum. Under them, a company's decision to pay legal fees will not be held against it, except in extreme circumstances, when prosecutors are weighing whether to indict the company. The new guidelines also raise new hurdles for prosecutors seeking access to confidential legal communications.

A decisive moment that led to the new guidelines came a few days after Thanksgiving, in a conference room in the Justice Department's main building. In a meeting lasting several hours before a fireplace, the deputy attorney general, Paul J. McNulty, discussed the proposed changes with one of his predecessors, George J. Terwilliger III, who was deputy attorney general under the first President Bush.

Mr. Terwilliger, a friend of Mr. McNulty's, had recently had first-hand experience with the guideline criticized in the KPMG case that gave companies under investigation a black mark if they advance legal fees to their employees caught up in the investigation.

The draft passage that Mr. McNulty showed Mr. Terwilliger proposed a slight shift: that prosecutors would have to use several tests to determine whether companies that paid the legal fees were hindering investigators.

In an interview this week, Mr. Terwilliger said he had told Mr. McNulty: "Rather than try to establish a list of all-inclusive criteria about the circumstances where it would be appropriate or not to pay counsel fees, why not have a bottom-line standard saying it's appropriate to do so except in extremely limited circumstances?"

Mr. Terwilliger cited the recent case of Schnitzer Steel Industries, an Oregon scrap steel company that averted a possible indictment over bribes paid to Asian steel concerns and instead reached a deferred-prosecution agreement with the Justice Department in October.

Mr. Terwilliger, who represented Schnitzer Steel, noted that prosecutors did not object to the company's payment of legal fees to employees caught up in the inquiry. He cited an internal Justice document that called the payments "a positive" for the criminal inquiry because employees would speak to Justice investigators only if they had proper legal counsel, paid by the company.

Mr. Terwilliger was one of several former senior Justice officials from past Republican administrations whom Mr. McNulty consulted. Two former attorneys general, Edwin Meese III and Richard L. Thornburgh, both urged a thorough revision of the old guidelines. But Mr. McNulty, himself a former prosecutor in Pennsylvania, said in an interview this week that he considered the advice of Mr. Terwilliger "especially significant."

Mary Beth Buchanan, a Pennsylvania federal prosecutor, said Mr. McNulty "had been listening to the concerns of the corporate counsel bar and defense bar for some time."

Those lawyers had also been telling Mr. McNulty that the old guidelines had made companies less likely to root out fraud internally because executives were afraid to talk to in-house lawyers, for fear of having their communications obtained coercively by prosecutors.

The process of redrafting the guidelines picked up speed after a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on the proposal. After that hearing, Mr. McNulty "realized that there was a perception problem out there" that the old guidelines were abusive, a senior Justice Department official said.

The first draft revision of what would become the McNulty memorandum appeared shortly after that, according to the senior Justice official.

But that was just the beginning; there would be no fewer than 10 drafts before the final memo.

The second sticking point, after the legal fees issues, concerned how to address the problem of prosecutors asking for confidential legal communications, or information protected by attorney-client privilege. One solution suggested creating multiple categories of legal information for which prosecutors could ask companies to waive privilege.

But the decisive view came from the attorney general's advisory committee, an internal Justice department body composed of senior prosecutors around the country. It proposed an unusual solution: set up a two-tiered system separating more-sensitive legal information from less-sensitive legal information, and make it harder for prosecutors to go after the former.

Karin J. Immergut, the Oregon federal prosecutor who heads the committee's white collar crime sub-committee that was reviewing the drafts, said, "The approach set forth is one that the vast majority of prosecutors were already using around the country, but there is additional guidance and additional accountability, to address the concerns."

More wrangling was still to come. Officials in the Justice Department's criminal division and senior federal prosecutors, who "don't want anyone in Washington messing with their toolbox," according to the senior Justice official, argued over whether waiver requests would have to be authorized by the local United States attorney supervising the investigation, by a midlevel official in the main Justice Department, or by Mr. McNulty himself.

Last week, in the days before the final draft was issued, Mr. McNulty continued to consult with Mr. Terwilliger, in one instance spending over an hour with him on the telephone "talking back and forth trying to make up his mind" about who should be required to approve the waiver requests, among other issues, according to the senior Justice official.

The final version, which was announced on Tuesday, gave Mr. McNulty the power to authorize waiver requests.

Democrats' Consumer Crusade (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Incoming Democratic leaders say they intend to bolster privacy rights and a spate of consumer protections in the next Congress. But early signs suggest activists in this arena may want to temper their enthusiasm.

Besides aiming to raise the minimum wage and make health care and college more affordable, Democrats poised to assume key committee chairmanships say they want to strengthen privacy protections, combat identity theft and curb abusive practices in mortgage lending and other financial services.

This represents a big shift for consumer groups, which frequently found themselves on the losing side of legislative battles during a dozen years of mostly Republican control of Capitol Hill. "People are excited about the opportunities," said Ed Mierzwinski, consumer-program director at U.S. PIRG, a federation of advocacy groups.

But he says actually passing legislation, even in a Congress controlled by Democrats, could be difficult. "It takes scandals piled upon scandals to get a consumer bill," he says.

During the past two years, virtually every lawmaker has seized on the issue of privacy protection amid revelations that Social Security numbers and other sensitive data belonging to tens of millions of people were exposed at businesses, schools and government agencies. Bills designed to safeguard data and guard against identity fraud proliferated, but got bogged down in territorial spats among the banking, commerce and judiciary committees.

Democratic leaders said recently that things will be different next year. Massachusetts Rep. Barney Frank, incoming chairman of the House Financial Services committee, is moving to form an identity-theft task force that would iron out differences among committees before competing bills emerge. "We should start working together beforehand," Mr. Frank said in a recent speech. "When each committee does its own thing and then you get to the end, egos have engaged and it's harder to reconcile."

Federal action wouldn't guarantee a big win for consumer groups, though, particularly if a new nationwide law undercuts stronger protections at the state level. For example, most states require businesses to notify consumers when personal information is compromised -- so as to warn people that they may be at risk of identity theft. Similarly, roughly half the states give consumers the right to "freeze" their credit report so potential fraudsters can't open new lines of credit in their name.

Mr. Frank said Congress should give all consumers the right to lock their credit files, and he doesn't want to pre-empt state laws in this area. "That is a shift from the Republican leadership," and would be a victory for consumers, said Travis Plunkett, legislative director at the Consumer Federation of America.

Mr. Frank said that he also would give businesses and institutions some leeway to decide whether breaches are serious enough to warrant consumer notice, and that he would pre-empt state laws on this subject. He said businesses should have to inform consumers only of breaches that pose a risk of sensitive data falling into the wrong hands, and that in fairness companies should be subject to a uniform rule.

Such action would be a big loss for privacy advocates, who abhor the idea of undercutting state laws or allowing a business that failed to prevent a data breach to decide whether to tell people about it.

The urgency of these issues was brought home this week when the University of California at Los Angeles said hackers had infiltrated a database containing the Social Security numbers and other personal data of 800,000 people. Separately, Department of Homeland Security officials arrested several hundred meat-processing plant workers in a raid aimed at breaking a connection between identity theft and illegal immigration.

Aside from the privacy push, Democrats say they would move to enhance consumer protections in the financial-services industry. One goal is to curb "predatory" mortgages, which are often unnecessary second-mortgage loans packed with hidden fees and issued with little regard to the borrower's ability to repay. Mr. Frank shares this priority with others, including Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, the incoming chairman of the Senate Banking committee.

Consumer groups are also urging Congress to improve protections for subprime, or particularly risky, mortgage borrowers. These calls are likely to gather steam as the housing-market slump deepens. A recent report from UBS AG analysts found that, in October, borrowers were at least 60 days delinquent on 3.9% of subprime home loans that had been packaged into mortgage securities this year, nearly twice the rate of a year earlier. With more and more mortgages packaged and sold as securities -- which spreads the risk -- consumer groups could find this priority seconded by Wall Street.

One of the more heated debates is expected to follow a pending Supreme Court decision. The court heard arguments this fall on whether federal banking regulators have gone too far in exempting state-chartered subsidiaries of national banks from state consumer-protection laws. If it rules in favor of regulators, Mr. Frank said, he will "be putting pressure" on them to "recreate consumer protections at the federal level that they've wiped out at the state level."

Still, Mr. Frank has gone out of his way recently to emphasize his bipartisan intentions. He has said he wants to "incentivize" the market to come up with consumer protections, and predicts there will be little difference between Democratic and Republican rule when it comes to regulation of the financial-services industry. Mr. Plunkett of the Consumer Federation of America agreed: "There's not going to be a hard turn to the left."

That means consumer groups may have to get creative, just as they did when they scored a little-noticed goal in September. Avoiding the usual committee track, the Center for Responsible Lending, an advocacy group that targets misleading bank tactics, helped secure passage of a measure designed to curb practices directed at military personnel. The law, which places a 36% cap on interest rates and fees charged on loans to military personnel, was shuffled through the Senate Armed Services committee rather than the usual Banking or Commerce committees.

Advocates say they would like to see usury caps and fee limitations, as well as bans on mandatory arbitration, applied more broadly. Some think they may have an ally in Mr. Dodd, who has pledged to thoroughly examine the impact of credit-card practices and other forms of debt on consumers. But most activists believe that could be tougher sledding. Incremental change, such as new rules on how fees and terms must be disclosed in credit agreements, they say, is a more realistic goal.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Lethal Injection Is On Hold In 2 States (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey, Sonya Geis

MIAMI, Dec. 15 -- Executions by lethal injection were suspended in Florida and ordered revamped in California on Friday, as the chemical method once billed as a more humane way of killing the condemned came under mounting scrutiny over the pain it may cause.

Gov. Jeb Bush (R) ordered the suspension in Florida after a botched execution in which it took 34 minutes and a second injection to kill convicted murderer Angel Nieves Diaz. A state medical examiner said that needles used to carry the poison had passed through the prisoner's veins and delivered the three-chemical mix into the tissues of his arm.

In California, a federal judge ruled that the state must overhaul its lethal-injection procedures, calling its current protocol unconstitutional because it may inflict unacceptable levels of pain.

Judge Jeremy D. Fogel of the U.S. District Court for Northern California ordered the state to revise its procedures and consider eliminating the use of two drugs: pancuronium bromide, which causes paralysis, and potassium chloride, which causes cardiac arrest.

The judge did not order executions halted, though they have been effectively on hold since February while he conducted a review.

The "pervasive lack of professionalism" in the executions, Fogel wrote, "at the least is very disturbing."

More than 30 states, including Virginia and Maryland, use the same three-drug sequence for lethal injections. Groups opposed to the death penalty have had increasing success arguing that the pain the cocktail inflicts is unconstitutional "cruel and unusual punishment."

"This demonstrates that there is no happy and kind and nice way to execute someone," said David Elliot, a spokesman for the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty. "Execution is a messy business."

But in Florida and California, advocates for the death penalty were quick to argue that only the technical specifics of the method are in dispute and that when the procedures are changed, the injections can begin again.

"Essentially what Judge Fogel's order today does is lay out a map for the Department of Corrections to follow in order to have a constitutionally sound lethal-injection protocol," said Nathan Barankin of the California attorney general's office.

Bush appointed a commission to review lethal-injection procedures in Florida "to ensure the method is consistent with the Eighth Amendment and its prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment," the governor said in a statement Friday.

But Bush said he saw no reason to stop using lethal injection. "All the people that are against the death penalty whenever there's a chance will call for suspending the death penalty," he said. "Each and every time that another appeal takes place, a family member of the person who was brutally murdered suffers again. So I think there needs to be sympathy for them as well."

The decisions in California and Florida on Friday come amid rising debate in other states.

In Maryland, a federal judge is considering the constitutionality of lethal injection. A ruling is expected next year. Officials in Missouri and South Dakota have delayed executions while lethal injection is reviewed. Oklahoma altered its procedure so that the prisoner receives more anesthesia before being executed. And in North Carolina, a federal judge ordered that a brain monitor be used to make sure an inmate is unconscious before the final drug is administered.

In June, the U.S. Supreme Court allowed another Florida death-row inmate to challenge that state's lethal-injection procedures through a federal civil rights lawsuit, a ruling considered a procedural victory for opponents of the death penalty.

Richard C. Dieter of the Death Penalty Information Center, a nonprofit group critical of capital punishment, pointed out that although the California ruling does not end the death penalty there, it "may be influential."

"What it may mean is the Supreme Court will have to step in and decide," Dieter said.

Diaz's death took more than twice as long as most executions in Florida, where death generally occurs within 15 minutes. More than 20 minutes after the first injection, Diaz appeared to be mouthing words, clenching his jaw and grimacing. A second dose was administered.

Diaz was executed for murdering the manager of a Miami topless bar in 1979.

The halt to executions in Florida could end as soon as March 1, when the commission assigned to study lethal-injection procedures is expected to file a final report.

In the California case, attorneys for condemned murderer Michael A. Morales had argued that because inmates are paralyzed by the drugs, witnesses cannot be sure the convicts are unconscious when they are executed -- meaning they may be in terrible pain. The court agreed in February and ordered corrections officials to either stop using the two drugs or provide doctors to ensure Morales was unconscious.

Two anesthesiologists agreed to observe, and Morales's execution was underway when, in a last-minute decision, the doctors backed out after an appeals court ruled they would have to step in if anything went wrong.

Since then, Fogel has held extensive hearings on how executions are conducted.

He ultimately found that executioners were not properly trained and made mistakes in administering the drugs and that California's execution chamber is poorly suited to its purpose.

The state's "implementation of lethal injection is broken, but it can be fixed," Fogel wrote.

Ruling Halts State Method Of Execution (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, December 16, 2006

A federal judge in San Jose ruled Friday that California's application of its lethal injection death penalty procedure violates the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

The state's system "is broken, but it can be fixed," U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel said in a 17-page ruling that makes it unlikely that any death sentences will be carried out in California in the near future. The high-profile case had effectively halted executions since February, but Fogel's ruling left the door open for the resumption of executions by lethal injection if the state comes up with a revised procedure the judge finds constitutionally acceptable.

Fogel's ruling came the same day that Florida Gov. Jeb Bush declared a halt to executions there in the aftermath of a botched lethal injection this week.

The two actions were the latest development in what is now the central legal issue in the long-running battle over capital punishment in the United States: whether lethal injections are being administered in a humane, constitutional manner. Challenges to lethal injections have resulted in stays of execution in states around the country, and Friday's developments will probably spur more challenges, legal experts said.

California's current lethal injection procedure, like that in three dozen other states, calls for a three-drug cocktail. The first drug, sodium thiopental, is a fast-acting barbiturate that is supposed to render the condemned inmate unconscious before the second two drugs — pancuronium bromide, which paralyzes the body, and potassium chloride, which causes cardiac arrest — are administered.

Fogel acted in response to a suit filed by lawyers for condemned inmate Michael Morales, who has been on death row for more than 20 years for the brutal slaying of Lodi teenager Terri Winchell. The thrust of Morales' suit is that the state does not properly administer enough sodium thiopental to ensure that the inmate does not feel excessive pain when the potassium chloride is administered.

Fogel, who visited the death chamber in San Quentin and held a four-day hearing in San Jose in September, said the case generated evidence that "is more than adequate to establish a constitutional violation."

His decision was replete with stinging criticisms of state officials for failing to take the necessary steps to correct problems in the procedure — steps the judge urged them to take in February.

"Given that the state is taking a human life, the pervasive lack of professionalism in the implementation" of the lethal injection protocol is "at the very least deeply disturbing," Fogel wrote.

Morales' execution was scheduled for February, but the state postponed it after being unable to meet conditions imposed by the judge, who became concerned that the procedure was not working correctly.

"As this court noted" in its February order, "anomalies in six execution logs raise substantial questions as to whether certain inmates may have been conscious when pancuronium bromide or potassium chloride was injected," Fogel wrote. "These substantial questions remain unanswered."

Fogel emphasized that Dr. Robert C. Singler, the state's medical expert, said that another condemned inmate, Robert Lee Massie, "well may have been awake when he was injected with potassium chloride" during his March 27, 2001, execution.

Singler testified that he could not render a definitive opinion because of the poor quality of the execution logs. He also testified that it would be "unconscionable" to inject a conscious person with the amount of potassium chloride prescribed by the protocol.

The threshold issue in the case, Fogel said, is whether the procedure, as implemented, "provides constitutionally adequate assurance that condemned inmates will be unconscious when they are injected" with the second and third drugs.

He said "the evidence shows that the protocol" and the state's implementation of it "suffer from a number of critical deficiencies."

Among those he cited are:

· Inconsistent and unreliable screening of execution team members. The judge noted that a prison guard led the execution team despite the fact that he was diagnosed with and disabled by post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of his prison experiences, and found working on the execution to be the most stressful responsibility a prison employee could have.

· A lack of meaningful training, supervision and oversight of the execution team. The judge noted that team members "almost uniformly have no knowledge of the nature or properties of the drugs that are used or the risks or potential problems associated with the procedure."

· Inconsistent and unreliable recordkeeping. The judge said there were "no contemporaneous records showing that all of the sodium thiopental in the syringes used for injections actually was injected, and in fact, testimony revealed that in at least several executions it was not."

Fogel also said there was "an extremely troubling absence of reliable documentation as to the disposition of sodium thiopental taken from the prison pharmacy by execution team members." He said that other testimony revealed that the drug, an addictive, controlled substance, was not used in training exercises. Consequently, he said, "these circumstances may warrant an investigation by an appropriate law enforcement agency."

In his ruling Friday, Fogel urged Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "to take this opportunity to address seriously now, rather than later, the significant problems" with the state's lethal injection protocol and its implementation.

"Part of the problem," the judge said, "may be that the prison officials responsible for implementation of the protocol see their legal obligations too narrowly."

He said that former San Quentin Warden Steven Ornoski testified that "he believes a 'successful execution' is simply one where 'the inmate ends up dead at the end of the process.' "

Fogel strongly suggested that the state might want to consider switching to a one-drug procedure, using a heavier dose of a barbiturate such as sodium pentobarbital.

On the particularly thorny issue of whether there must be participation by a doctor, the judge awarded the state a victory.

"Because an execution is not a medical procedure, and its purpose is not to keep the inmate alive but rather to end the inmate's life, the court agrees" with the state that "the Constitution does not necessarily require the attendance and participation of a medical professional," Fogel wrote.

Fogel gave California officials 30 days to tell him whether they intend to review and revise the state's procedure, and, if so, how much additional time they believe they will need to complete the task.

Andrea Lynn Hoch, the governor's legal affairs secretary, said the administration will review state procedures "to make certain the protocol and its implementation are constitutional."

"Judge Fogel's decision is bold and incisive," said Fordham University law professor Deborah Denno, an expert on methods of punishment. "It is the most comprehensive decision in the country to determine that a state's lethal injection protocol, in its current form, is intolerable and unconstitutional under the 8th Amendment."

Morales' attorneys said they were pleased with the decision. "Judge Fogel has ordered the state to do what we have asserted they should do since the beginning of this litigation — undertake a considered, searching review of their procedures," said Ginger Anders, an attorney in Washington, D.C.

The ruling was hailed by groups opposed to capital punishment, including the Campaign to End the Death Penalty, Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, and Death Penalty Focus of California, whose spokeswoman, Stefanie Faucher said: "It is time for California to stop tinkering with the machinery of death and recognize that the death penalty is a failed public policy which drains valuable resources away from programs that actually increase public safety and serve the needs of victims."

Attorney Kent Scheidegger, of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, a pro-capital punishment group in Sacramento, said it was "unfortunate that there will be further delay in this already grossly overdue execution."

He also said California ought to analyze whether lethal injection "was the right way to go in the first place" and perhaps consider bringing back the gas chamber, using carbon monoxide rather than cyanide.

Fogel acknowledged that any legal proceeding about the death penalty is a "powerful magnet," likely to generate impassioned debate about a highly divisive issue. But he cautioned that "this case is not about whether the death penalty makes sense morally or as a matter of policy." Nor, he said, is it about whether lethal injection is constitutional. Rather, it is about the specific way that California implements its procedure, and in that regard, he said, the state clearly fell short.

OCALA, Florida (AP) -- Gov. Jeb Bush suspended executions in Florida after a medical examiner said Friday that prison officials botched the insertion of the needles when a convicted killer was put to death earlier this week.

Separately, a federal judge in California imposed a moratorium on executions in the nation's most populous state, declaring that the state's method of lethal injection runs the risk of violating the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel ruled in San Jose that California's "implementation of lethal injection is broken." But he said: "It can be fixed."

Fogel said the case raised the question of whether a three-drug cocktail administered by the San Quentin State Prison is so painful that it "offends" the Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

Fogel said he was compelled "to answer that question in the affirmative."

California has been under a capital punishment moratorium since February, when Fogel called off the execution of rapist and murderer Michael Morales amid concerns that condemned inmates might suffer excruciating deaths.

Fogel found substantial evidence that the last six men executed at San Quentin might have been conscious and still breathing when lethal drugs were administered.

He ordered anesthesiologists to be on hand, or demanded that a licensed medical professional inject a large, fatal dose of a sedative instead of the additional paralyzing agent and heart-stopping drugs that are normally used. But no medical professional was willing to participate.

In Florida, medical examiner Dr. William Hamilton said Wednesday's execution of Angel Nieves Diaz took 34 minutes -- twice as long as usual -- and required a rare second dose of lethal chemicals because the needles were inserted clear through his veins and into the flesh in his arms. The chemicals are supposed to go into the veins. (Watch officials explain why it took 2 injections and 34 minutes)

Hamilton, who performed the autopsy, refused to say whether he thought Diaz died a painful death.

"I am going to defer answers about pain and suffering until the autopsy is complete," he said. He said the results were preliminary and other tests may take several weeks.

Missing a vein when administering the injections would cause "both psychological and physical discomfort -- probably pretty severe," said Dr. J. Kent Garman, an emeritus professor of anesthesia at the Stanford School of Medicine in California.

"All the drugs would be much slower to affect the body because they're not going into a blood vessel. They're going under the skin. They take a long time to be absorbed by the body," said Garman, said he was ethically opposed to lethal injection.

An inmate would remain conscious for a longer period of time and would likely be aware of increased difficulty breathing and pain caused by angina, the interruption of blood flow to the heart, he said.

Jonathan Groner, associate professor of surgery at Ohio State University, said the injection would cause excruciating pain "like your arms are on fire."

Bush created a commission to examine the state's lethal injection process in light of Diaz's case, and he halted the signing of any more death warrants until the panel completes its final report by March 1.

The governor said he wants to ensure the process does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, as some death penalty foes argued bitterly after Diaz's execution. Florida has 374 people on death row; it has carried out four executions this year.Medical findings contradict prison officials

Diaz, 55, was put to death for murdering the manager of a Miami topless bar during a holdup in 1979.

The medical examiner's findings contradicted the explanation given by prison officials, who said Diaz needed the second dose because liver disease caused him to metabolize the lethal drugs more slowly. Hamilton said that although there were records that Diaz had hepatitis, his liver appeared normal.

Executions in Florida normally take no more than about 15 minutes, with the inmate rendered unconscious and motionless within three to five minutes. But Diaz appeared to be moving 24 minutes after the first injection, grimacing, blinking, licking his lips, blowing and appearing to mouth words.

As a result of the chemicals going into Diaz's arms around the elbow, he had a 12-inch chemical burn on his right arm and an 11-inch chemical burn on his left arm, Hamilton said.

DOJ_NMG_0107452

Florida Corrections Secretary James McDonough said the execution team did not see any swelling of the arms, which would have been an indication that the chemicals were going into tissues and not veins.

Diaz's attorney, Suzanne Myers Keffler, reacted angrily to the findings.

"This is complete negligence on the part of the state," she said. "When he was still moving after the first shot of chemicals, they should have known there was a problem and they shouldn't have continued. This shows a complete disregard for Mr. Diaz. This is disgusting." (Watch Keffer describe Diaz "suffering in pain" -- 2:42)

Earlier, in a court hearing in Ocala, she had won an assurance from the attorney general's office that she could have access to all findings and evidence from the autopsy. She withdrew a request for an independent autopsy.

David Elliot, spokesman for the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, said experts his group had contacted suspected that liver disease was not the explanation for the problem.

"Florida has certainly deservedly earned a reputation for being a state that conducts botched executions, whether its electrocution or lethal injection," Elliot said. "We just think the Florida death penalty system is broken from start to finish."

Florida got rid of the electric chair after two inmates' heads caught fire during executions in the 1990s and another suffered a severe nosebleed in 2000. Lethal injection was portrayed as a more humane and more reliable process.

Twenty people have been executed by injection in Florida since the state switched from the electric chair in 2000.

Lethal injection is the preferred execution method in 37 states.

Florida Governor Suspends The Death Penalty (NYT)

By Adam Liptak, Terry Aguayo

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

Gov. Jeb Bush yesterday suspended all executions in Florida, citing a troubled execution on Wednesday and appointing a commission to consider the humanity and constitutionality of lethal injections.

Hours later, a federal judge ruled that the lethal injection system in California violated the constitutional prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment.

“Today has been the most significant day in the history of the death penalty in America in many years,” said Jamie Fellner, director of United States programs for Human Rights Watch. “These developments show that the current lethal-injection protocols pose an unacceptable risk of cruelty.

“The way states have been killing people for the last 30 years has yielded botched execution after botched execution.”

California has the largest death row in the nation, at about 650. The state has executed 13 people since the United States Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976.

Florida, by contrast, has executed 64 people in the modern era of the death penalty, trailing four states.

The California decision, which followed a four-day evidentiary hearing and a session at the San Quentin prison, was eagerly awaited and probably represents the fullest and most careful consideration yet of whether the way inmates are executed violates the Eight Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

Judge Jeremy Fogel of Federal District Court in San Jose delivered a mixed verdict, writing, “Defendants’ implementation of lethal injection is broken, but it can be fixed.”

The new commission in Florida, which will include doctors, lawyers, scientists and law enforcement officials, will consider many of the same issues, including whether the state protocol satisfies “humanity, constitutional imperative and common sense,” Mr. Bush said in his order.

Deborah W. Denno, an authority on execution at the Fordham University Law School, said Judge Fogel’s decision was “both bold and safe.”

“Judge Fogel’s decision is the most definitive response so far in concluding that a state’s lethal injection protocol, in its current form, is unconstitutional under the Eighth Amendment,” Professor Denno said.

Even as Judge Fogel issued a withering critique of the way California executes condemned inmates, he invited the state to submit a revised protocol to remedy the shortcomings. Similarly, Mr. Bush suggested that executions in Florida might resume after his panel gives its final report in March.

Judge Fogel found that prison execution teams had been poorly screened and had included people disciplined for smuggling drugs and with post-traumatic stress disorder. Moreover, the team members are poorly trained and supervised, he said.

Record keeping is spotty, the judge found, and the chemicals used are sometimes improperly prepared. The death chamber, he added, is badly lighted and overcrowded.

“Defendants’ actions and failures to act have resulted in an undue and unnecessary risk of an Eighth Amendment violation,” Judge Fogel wrote. “This is intolerable under the Constitution.”

DOJ_NMG_0107453

Judge Fogel also noted concerns about the chemicals that California, Florida and 35 other states use. The protocols vary slightly, but almost all call for a series of three chemicals. The first is a barbiturate to render the inmate unconscious. The second is a paralyzing agent that makes the inmate unable to speak, move or breathe. The third is potassium chloride, which stops the heart.

Both sides in California agreed that it would be unconstitutional to inject a conscious person with either or both of the second two chemicals. The paralyzing agent would leave the inmate conscious while he suffocated, and potassium chloride is extremely painful.

The two sides also agreed that if the first drug was effective, using the others did not violate the constitution.

Judge Fogel suggested a way out. Were inmates executed in the same way that animals were euthanized, solely by an anesthetic, that would, he wrote, "eliminate any constitutional concerns, subject only to the implementation of adequate, verifiable procedures to ensure that the inmate actually receives a fatal dose of the anesthetic."

Kent Scheidegger, the legal director of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, which supports the death penalty, said the decision was in that sense a welcome one.

"It's unfortunate that we have another delay," Mr. Scheidegger said. "But it does appear that there is at least one path to a constitutional procedure."

Florida started its moratorium two days after Angel N. Diaz's execution appeared to go awry. Dr. William Hamilton, medical examiner in Alachua County, Fla., said yesterday that the needle with the lethal chemicals that should have gone directly into Mr. Diaz's veins punctured the veins before entering soft tissue. It took a second dose and 34 minutes for him to die.

Gov. Jeb Bush suspended all executions in Florida after a medical examiner said yesterday that prison officials botched the insertion of the needles when a convicted killer was put to death earlier this week.

Separately, a federal judge in California extended a moratorium on executions in the state, declaring that its method of lethal injection runs the risk of violating the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

In Florida, medical examiner Dr. William Hamilton said Wednesday's execution of Angel Nieves Diaz took 34 minutes — twice as long as usual — and required a rare second dose of lethal chemicals because the needles were inserted clear through his veins and into the flesh in his arms. The chemicals are supposed to go into the veins.

Dr. Hamilton, who performed the autopsy, refused to say whether he thought Diaz died a painful death.

"I am going to defer answers about pain and suffering until the autopsy is complete," he said, adding that the results were preliminary and other tests might take several weeks.

Diaz, 55, was put to death for murdering the manager of a Miami topless bar during a holdup in 1979.

Mr. Bush created a commission to examine the state's lethal-injection process in light of Diaz's case, and he halted the signing of any more death warrants until the panel completes its final report by March 1.

The governor said he wants to ensure the process does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, as some death penalty foes argued after Diaz's execution. Florida has 374 persons on death row; it has carried out four executions this year.

Gov.-elect Charlie Crist planned to continue the moratorium when he takes office in January, spokeswoman Vivian Myrtetus said.

Meanwhile, U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel ruled in San Jose that California's "implementation of lethal injection is broken, but it can be fixed."

Judge Fogel said the lawsuit brought by convicted murderer and rapist Michael Morales raised the question of whether a three-drug cocktail administered by the San Quentin State Prison is so painful that it "offends" the Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

The judge said he was compelled "to answer that question in the affirmative."

California has been under a capital punishment moratorium since February, when Judge Fogel called off Morales' execution amid concerns that condemned inmates might suffer excruciating deaths.

Morales, 47, of Stockton, raped and fatally beat a 17-year-old Lodi girl 25 years ago.

Judge Fogel found substantial evidence that the last six men executed at San Quentin might have been conscious when lethal drugs were administered.

He ordered anesthesiologists to be on hand, or demanded that a licensed medical professional inject a large, fatal dose of a sedative instead of the additional paralyzing agent and heart-stopping drugs that are normally used. But no medical professional was willing to participate.

Attorneys for Morales said in a lawsuit that he might appear unconscious after being injected with a sedative, but internally he would suffer excruciating pain, "burning veins and heart failure," once the paralyzing and the death drugs were administered.

In Florida, the medical examiner's findings yesterday contradicted the explanation given by prison officials, who said Diaz needed the second dose because liver disease caused him to metabolize the lethal drugs more slowly. Dr. Hamilton said that although there were records that Diaz had hepatitis, his liver appeared normal.

Executions in Florida normally take no more than about 15 minutes, with the inmate rendered unconscious and motionless within three to five minutes. But Diaz appeared to be moving 24 minutes after the first injection, grimacing, blinking, licking his lips, blowing and appearing to mouth words.

As a result of the chemicals going into Diaz's arms around the elbow, he had an 12-inch chemical burn on his right arm and an 11-inch chemical burn on his left arm, Dr. Hamilton said.

Florida Corrections Secretary James McDonough said the execution team did not see any swelling of the arms, which would have been an indication that the chemicals were going into tissues and not veins.

Diaz's attorney, Suzanne Myers Keffler, reacted angrily to the findings.

"This is complete negligence on the part of the state," she said. "When he was still moving after the first shot of chemicals, they should have known there was a problem and they shouldn't have continued. This shows a complete disregard for Mr. Diaz. This is disgusting."

David Elliot, spokesman for the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, said specialists his group contacted had suspected that liver disease was not the explanation for the problem.

"Florida has certainly deservedly earned a reputation for being a state that conducts botched executions, whether it's electrocution or lethal injection," Mr. Elliot said. "We just think the Florida death penalty system is broken from start to finish."

The U.S. Supreme Court has upheld executions — by hanging, firing squad, electric chair and gas chamber — despite the pain they might cause, but has left unsettled the issue of whether the pain is unconstitutionally excessive.

Judge Decries State's Lethal Injections, Seeks Change (SFC)

By Bob Egelko

San Francisco Chronicle, December 16, 2006

Lethal injections in California are conducted so haphazardly, by poorly trained staff in chaotic conditions, that they could cause slow and agonizing death, a federal judge said Friday in threatening to declare the state's method of capital punishment unconstitutional.

But U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel, who put all executions in California on hold earlier this year, said the problems could be corrected. He gave state officials 30 days to decide whether they will revise lethal-injection procedures and to say how long they would need. Officials said they would take steps to comply.

Fogel's ruling prolongs the stay of execution he issued in February for Michael Morales of Stockton, who was convicted of raping and fatally beating 17-year-old Terri Winchell near Lodi in 1981. That stay and a moratorium on other executions will remain in effect well into 2007 while officials try to make changes to satisfy the judge.

The lethal-injection procedures used at San Quentin State Prison since 1996 pose "an undue and unnecessary risk of an Eighth Amendment violation," Fogel said, referring to the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

Fogel said he would declare the state's lethal-injection system unconstitutional if it is not changed. But he stressed that he was condemning neither capital punishment nor lethal injection itself, which is the exclusive or preferred method of execution in all of the 38 death-penalty states except Nebraska, which uses the electric chair.

"The use of lethal injection in executions represents an evolution from earlier methods such as hanging, electrocution and lethal gas that now are viewed by most jurisdictions as unduly harsh," Fogel said. He observed that, when properly administered, lethal injection "results in a death that is far kinder than that suffered by the victims of capital crimes."

The state's "implementation of lethal injection is broken, but it can be fixed," Fogel said.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's office indicated that the state would try to do so.

"As the ruling provides, the administration will review the lethal injection protocol to make certain the protocol and its implementation are constitutional," Schwarzenegger's legal affairs secretary, Andrea Hoch, said in a statement.

Fogel's ruling could have national ramifications at a time when other states are facing challenges to their lethal injection procedures.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush suspended death warrants in his state Friday at least until March 1 while a state commission reviews what went wrong with a lethal injection this week. Prison staffers failed to insert needles properly into the veins of condemned murderer Angel Nieves Diaz, who was later given a second dose of lethal chemicals and took 34 minutes to die.

DOJ_NMG_0107455

A federal judge in Missouri ordered a halt to executions there in October unless the state improves monitoring and supervision of its procedures; state officials have appealed the ruling. A Kentucky judge ruled last month that the state had not adopted its execution procedures properly.

Fogel's ruling followed four days of testimony by execution witnesses and medical experts in his San Jose court in September, the first such hearing in the nation. The judge also visited San Quentin in March and inspected the execution chamber and apparatus.

California and virtually every other state with lethal injections use a sequence of three drugs: the sedative sodium pentothal, to cause unconsciousness; the paralytic pancuronium bromide, to halt breathing; and potassium chloride, to stop the heart.

Fogel said records in seven of California's lethal injection executions indicated that the prisoners might have been conscious, despite the initial dose of sodium pentothal, when the other two drugs were injected.

Medical experts told the judge that pancuronium bromide, in a conscious person, would cause a smothering sensation while leaving the prisoner unable to cry out or move, and potassium chloride would cause excruciating, burning pain.

Fogel said that "the systematic flaws in the implementation of the procedure make it impossible to determine with any degree of certainty" whether executed inmates were unconscious just before death, or whether the state's anesthesia procedures would guarantee that inmates in future executions would not suffer.

Fogel initially ordered the state to have a doctor present to monitor Morales' level of consciousness during his scheduled execution in February, and he issued his stay after officials were unable to find any physicians willing to participate.

But the judge said Friday that a doctor did not have to be present because other methods are available to monitor consciousness. That was an important conclusion because professional associations have decreed that any participation by doctors in executions is unethical.

After Fogel's February order, California prison officials changed their procedures to include a continuous flow of sodium pentothal in one of the prisoner's arms to keep him unconscious while the second and third drugs are injected in the other arm.

In Friday's ruling, Fogel said the three-drug sequence, when properly administered, would provide for "a constitutionally adequate level of anesthesia" and that executing an inmate with a lethal dose of sodium pentothal also would be constitutional.

But he said the state's current procedures suffer from "a number of critical deficiencies."

Members of the execution team are not properly screened, he said. Fogel noted that one former execution team leader once had been disciplined for smuggling illegal drugs into the prison, and another leader previously had been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder.

Execution team members "almost uniformly have no knowledge" about the drugs they are injecting or the problems that might arise, the judge said. He said team members' "admitted failure to follow the simple directions provided by the manufacturer" of sodium pentothal made it difficult to determine whether prisoners were properly anesthetized.

Dim lighting, overcrowded conditions and poorly designed facilities also interfere with monitoring of the execution, Fogel said. He said execution team members can't hear any sounds from the sealed execution chamber and can't see the inmate well enough to determine whether he is conscious.

All those flaws "appear to be correctable," the judge said.

Fogel was appointed to the federal bench by President Bill Clinton in 1998 after 17 years as a Santa Clara County judge. He is generally regarded as liberal in philosophy but moderate in his judicial approach.

Friday's ruling was "very cautious, very restrained, very much in keeping with Fogel's style," said Santa Clara University Law Professor Gerald Uelmen. He said the state is likely to find a solution much more quickly with the leeway provided in Friday's ruling than if Fogel had simply declared the procedures unconstitutional and invited an appeal.

Bill Hing, a UC Davis law professor, said Fogel's ruling was bound to be noticed nationwide.

"If it's going to be done, he's insisting on a method that is more efficient," Hing said. "I believe the states are going to recognize that they've got to figure out a better way to do this."

Stefanie Foucher, program director of the anti-capital punishment group Death Penalty Focus in San Francisco, said Fogel's ruling was an important but incomplete statement.

"The judge admitted that implementation of lethal injection is broken," she said. "We would take that even farther and say the entire death penalty system in California is broken. We don't believe it is making the public any safer."

Barbara Christian, the mother of Winchell, Morales' victim, hopes the state complies with Fogel's order so Morales can be executed as soon as possible, said Gloria Allred, a lawyer for Christian.

"It's been a terrible ordeal for 26 years," Allred said. "That's longer than Terri lived on the face of this earth."

Florida Suspends Executions After Trouble Injecting Inmate (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0107456

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, December 16, 2006

MIAMI — Florida Gov. Jeb Bush on Friday suspended executions until at least March while investigators examine why it took more than half an hour for a lethal injection to kill a convicted murderer.

Angel Nieves Diaz, 55, appeared to grimace in pain and struggle for breath during the Wednesday night execution until a second dose of the fatal drugs was administered, according to witnesses.

The execution at Florida State Prison in Starke took 34 minutes, three times longer than usual. That probably was because the injection was made into soft tissue on the prisoner's arm, missing a vein that would have carried the killing agents more swiftly to his vital organs.

Death penalty critics said the execution, which they described as "botched," was clear evidence that the lethal-injection process constituted cruel and unusual punishment.

Diaz, a Puerto Rican convicted of killing the manager of a topless bar in 1979, had challenged the constitutionality of lethal injection in his last legal appeal, which was not taken up by the U.S. Supreme Court.

In his eight years as governor, Bush has signed 39 death warrants; 21 executions have been conducted on his watch. He has denied all death-row appeals for clemency or a commuted sentence to life imprisonment.

Gov. Anibal Acevedo Vila of Puerto Rico, which abolished capital punishment in 1929, had appealed to Bush to convert Diaz's sentence.

Bush said he would not sign death warrants or allow executions until a probe of the Diaz case is complete. He asked for a report from investigators by March 1.

Bush leaves office in two weeks, but his successor, Charlie Crist, campaigned on promises of continuity with the popular, two-term governor's policies and values.

Suspension of one of the country's most active execution chambers was announced after preliminary autopsy results showed the first chemical injection had missed the vein.

In a conference call with journalists, Medical Examiner William Hamilton declined to say whether Diaz suffered intense pain as a result of the misapplied first dose. He confirmed, however, that the convict's body had a 12-inch chemical burn on the right arm and an 11-inch burn on the left arm.

The first drug of the series is an anesthetic and the second induces paralysis. The third causes cardiac arrest. Media representatives who witnessed the execution gave detailed accounts of the prisoner writhing, grimacing and struggling for breath for 20 minutes.

Mark Elliott of Floridians for Alternatives to the Death Penalty said said the Diaz case showed the need for a moratorium on executions and a thorough review of the state's criminal justice system, which he said was "broken from top to bottom."

Florida has 375 inmates on death row. Three juveniles were removed last year after the Supreme Court ruled that execution of minors was unconstitutional.

Florida has executed 64 convicts since the death penalty was reinstated in 1979, initially by electric chair.

The state switched from electrocution to lethal injection in 2000 after two incidents in the '90s in which flames burst from prisoners' heads in a chair dubbed by executioners as "Old Sparky."

Florida Governor Halts Executions (BBC)

BBC.com, December 16, 2006

Florida Governor Jeb Bush has halted executions in the US state after an inmate took twice as long to die by lethal injection.

Mr Bush said he needed to be sure that the method of death did not constitute "cruel and unusual punishment".

The move came after a man convicted of murder, Angel Diaz, took 34 minutes to die and was given a second lethal dose.

In California, a judge has ruled death by lethal injection violates a state ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

The judge ruled California's "implementation of lethal injection is broken", but said "it can be fixed".

Lethal injection is the preferred method of execution in 37 US states.

Mr Bush has appointed a panel to look into the practice and evaluate whether it breaches the state's ban as an unnecessarily cruel mode of death, as argued by opponents of the death penalty.

He has said no more death warrants will be signed until the commission completes its final report in March.

The move came after the drawn-out death by lethal injection of Puerto Rican-born Diaz on Wednesday.

Diaz was sentenced to death for the 1979 murder of a Miami strip club manager.

Witnesses said his death took more than twice the usual time - 34 minutes rather than the usual 15.

DOJ_NMG_0107457

He needed a second dose of the lethal chemicals as the needles were injected straight through his veins and into the flesh of his arms.

Following the autopsy, the medical examiner concluded the injections had been wrongly administered.

He was found to have large chemical burns on both arms and his lawyer reported that the 55-year-old continued to move and mouth words more than 20 minutes after the initial dose.

Inmates are supposed to be rendered unconscious by the chemicals within three to five minutes.

Anti-death penalty activists say lethal injections - introduced in Florida and other states as a replacement for the electric chair and other methods of execution - are just as cruel and should not be considered a more humane substitute.

But the BBC's Emilio San Pedro, in Miami, says that it is too soon to interpret the decisions as a sign that support for the death penalty is waning in the US.

Executions, he says, continue to be seen as the best deterrent of violent crime.

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

The corrections secretary said the state would create a commission to review sentencing guidelines, a potential crucial step in Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's efforts to relieve prison crowding. Changes could give judges and parole officers greater discretion and lead to some offenders being released sooner than under current law, the secretary, James E. Tilton, told The Associated Press. The proposal comes five days after a federal judge gave Mr. Schwarzenegger a June deadline to ease crowding in the state prison system, the nation's largest, where more than 173,000 inmates live in space designed for fewer than 100,000. Failure to do so could lead the federal courts to order remedies that include early release of inmates.

Gonzales Seeks Place For "A Child's Dreams" (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 16, 2006

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday said communities poisoned by drugs, gangs, gun crime and violence are no place for "a child's dreams to flourish," and that the Justice Department is determined to help prevent America's youth from joining gangs.

Speaking at the annual Project Safe Neighborhood conference in Boston, Mr. Gonzales said efforts continue to bring together law-enforcement and community leaders to discuss effective programs, identify gaps in services, and develop working partnership to prevent gangs from claiming new members.

"My personal experience has been that the United States is a place where a child can dream big dreams ... and fulfill them," he said. "I believe deeply that this can be true for all Americans, all of this great nation's children, but not when their neighborhoods and their lives are limited by fear and violence.

"That's why we work so hard ... to make the streets of our communities safer, every day," he said.

Mr. Gonzales noted that law enforcement is "not a spectator sport," but added that the same can be said of community-service work. He said it was important for both sides to work together to address what he described as "the scourge of gangs and gang violence" in America's neighborhoods.

He said it would require an integrated, comprehensive approach that includes both law-enforcement and the prevention efforts uniquely offered by community-service groups.

"Increasing prevention in your neighborhood can come from something as simple as meeting the community leader or volunteer sitting next to you in this room today," he said. "Each conversation at a summit like this has the potential for shared ideas and new, creative approaches to reducing violent crime and protecting the future of our children."

Mr. Gonzales said the increased responsibilities for law enforcement since September 11 are one of the reasons law-enforcement officials need partners in community service more than ever. He said their goals are the ultimate complement to law enforcement because they seek to make neighborhoods safer by preventing criminal activity so that arrests and prosecutions are not needed.

"To the community servants here today, I also offer thanks. You'd like to keep kids from joining gangs and living the 'thug life' altogether and that is my idea of an outstanding solution," he said.

"Kids in tough situations join gangs to find companionship and status -- false promises of a lifestyle that in reality brings crime, violence, jail time and even death," he said. "The violence of gangs then spills over into the community, making it less safe for everyone."

Project Safe Neighborhoods is a nationwide commitment to reduce gun crime in America by networking existing local programs that target gun crime and providing these programs with additional tools necessary to be successful.

The Bush administration has committed more than $1.5 billion to the effort since the program's inception in 2001. The funding is used to hire new federal and state prosecutors, support investigators, provide training, distribute gun-lock safety kits, deter juvenile gun crime, and develop and promote community outreach efforts as well as to support other gun-violence-reduction strategies.

AG: Attack Gang Violence With Innovation, As Well As Funding (LOWSUN)

By Rita Savard

Lowell (MA) Sun, December 16, 2006

BOSTON -- A rise in gang violence and shootings is shattering the peace in communities nationwide.

Promising more funding for anti-gang programs, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said law enforcement and community leaders can serve as the "shot heard around the world" by partnering to halt youth violence.

"We need to mine new ideas," Gonzales told hundreds of law enforcers gathered yesterday at the Boston Convention Center for the Second Annual Anti-Gang Summit. "Violent crime has gone up in Massachusetts and no single group can bring it down alone."

Law enforcement has had to keep a sharp eye turned toward terrorist activity in a post 9/11 world, Gonzales said. Because police are stretching resources farther than ever, more people must join in the effort to deter youth from choosing a life of crime.

Crime-fighting partnerships involving the whole community are key, Gonzales said.

"New problems and trends always seem to be around the next corner... cooperation puts us on solid footing," he said.

In Lowell, incidents of gang-related violence have increased this year over last, according to Lt. Mark Buckley, commander of the Lowell Police Department's Criminal Bureau.

In 2005, 54 aggravated assaults with firearms were reported in Lowell, up 14 from 2004, the most current data available from police records.

But state aid received this year to fund anti-gang programs has helped Lowell beef up resources and establish a multifaceted plan to curb gang violence in the city, Buckley said.

Sharon Hanson, director of research and planning for the Lowell Police Department, shared initiatives under way in Lowell at yesterday's conference.

Lowell was awarded $820,000 from the Charles Shannon Community Safety Initiative grant for prevention programs this year. The grant money has enabled police to create a formal support system for teens, said Hanson.

"Police presence has become much more visible in gang hot-spot neighborhoods," said Hanson. "Kids are being kept busy. We've been able to create more opportunities and more jobs for the city's youth."

Since August, Lowell has installed a city advisory board to reduce gang violence, revitalized and created new recreation programs and focused on a truancy prevention program.

A new program at Lowell High School, which allows students to buy back some of their truant time by regularly attending classes, has brought 71 students back to school in October and November, Hanson said.

Increasing programs at the city's Recreation Department has pulled in roughly 300 teens, and provided jobs to an additional 59, Hanson added.

Researchers from the Harvard Kennedy School of Government have been keeping tabs on Lowell's performance measurements.

"We're not only doing these things but we're getting feedback with real numbers and real information to see how we're doing," Hanson said.

Applauding police for their efforts, Gonzales said the federal government realizes the need to pump more money into anti-violence programs.

"An environment poisoned by drugs and gang violence is no place for a child's dreams to flourish," Gonzales said. "We face a tough challenge ahead. But a network of law enforcement and community is stronger than violence."

U.S. Attorney General: Hub's Violent Crime Grave Concern (BOSH)

Boston Herald, December 16, 2006

The blood spilled on Boston's streets this year drew the attention of the nation's top prosecutor yesterday as he attended a conference on gang violence at a time when the city hopes a fractured gang truce can stop a street war from erupting.

"I am concerned that, despite the diligence of the men and women in this room, preliminary crime reports in Boston for the first six months of this year show an increase in violent crime," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Nonfatal shootings are up 10 percent this year, while fatal shootings are up 13 percent. With 71 murders on the year, Boston is approaching last year's 10-year record homicide total of 75.

Gonzales, who was in town to speak at the annual Project Safe Neighborhood Conference at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center, said the feds have put street violence under a microscope, not just in Boston, but across the country.

"To help cities like Boston - and any city or state facing a violent crime challenge - Justice Department officals have been traveling the country, meeting with state and local law enforcement in areas that have violent crime increases and those that have experienced decreases so we can better understand why in each case," he said.

In Boston, a cease-fire between long-feuding gangbangers from H-Block and Heath Street was strained when H-Block peacemaker Jahmol Norfleet, 20, was murdered.

Fed Presecutors Get First Convictions On Economic Espionage (FRESBEE)

By Jordan Robertson

Fresno Bee, December 15, 2006

Federal prosecutors scored their first-ever convictions for economic espionage to benefit a foreign nation when two Silicon Valley engineers pleaded guilty to stealing trade secrets and trying to smuggle them to China.

Fei Ye, 40, a U.S. citizen from China, and Ming Zhong, 39, a permanent resident of the U.S. from China entered their pleas Thursday in San Jose federal court to two counts each as part of a deal with prosecutors. Both would have faced 10 counts each if they went to trial in January.

Ye and Zhong were accused of stealing confidential microchip blueprints and other trade secrets from four technology companies - NEC Electronics Corp., Sun Microsystems Inc., Transmeta Corp. and Trident Microsystems Inc. - and planning to start a microprocessor company with the financial backing of various Chinese government agencies.

The case highlights the threat to U.S. businesses from thieves looking to sell hard-won intellectual property overseas, said U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan.

Few cases allege intent to benefit a foreign government - the most serious crime under the Economic Espionage Act of 1996 - because it's difficult to prove, but he said U.S. companies are frequently targeted by overseas concerns.

"Silicon Valley understands full well the threat they are faced with here," he told The Associated Press. "It's not only a threat to the economic value of the products being produced, but in some cases, it's a threat to our national security and military infrastructure."

On the same day federal prosecutors secured the convictions, a Chinese engineer was indicted for allegedly stealing trade secrets from a Silicon Valley company that made military training software and trying to sell them to Asian governments.

Xiaodong Sheldon Meng, 42, a Chinese national with Canadian citizenship, was indicted on 36 felony counts, including the rare charge of economic espionage to benefit a foreign government and various violations of military technology export laws.

Prosecutors say Meng stole the code for software made by his former employer, Quantum3D Inc., that's used to train military fighter pilots, and tried to sell it to the Royal Thai Air Force, the Royal Malaysian Air Force and a company with ties to China's military.

Under U.S. law, anyone attempting to sell such information overseas must first obtain a license from the State Department and is subject to strict regulations. Meng never applied for such a license.

His lawyer, Angela Hansen, called the charges "baseless" and said in a statement the government has "misinterpreted innocent acts."

No foreign government or agent were named as conspirator in either case, and prosecutors declined to discuss whether any foreign officials or agents knew about the alleged schemes.

In economic espionage cases, the law does not require proof of complicity by a foreign government, and investigators often don't know the extent of foreign involvement.

Ye and Zhong, who remain free on bail following their pleas Thursday, are scheduled to be sentenced April 23. Each face a maximum of 30 years in prison.

The pair were arrested in 2001 at San Francisco International Airport, attempting to board a flight to China. According to the indictment, their luggage was crammed with thousands of pages of documents stolen from their former employers, including schematic drawings of computer chips under development, internal instructions for the design and layout of circuits and components and other confidential information.

Documents seized from their homes included a corporate charter and a fundraising application touting the project's ability to raise China's stature in the field of integrated circuit design, the indictment said.

Other documents showed a panel of Chinese government officials had reviewed the company's business plan, deemed it feasible and encouraged agencies to provide financial support, it said.

A business partner who tipped off the FBI told investigators the startup, called Supervision Inc., had received $2 million in funding from two Chinese cities, Hangzhou and Guangzhou, to develop the new microprocessor, according to an affidavit.

James Pooley, an intellectual property litigator and adjunct law professor at the University of California, Berkeley, said the conviction was a much-needed victory for the Justice Department.

"You're finding people who aren't just trying to take something opportunistically from their employer. They're going places, planning to take trade secrets, and combining secrets from many different places," Pooley said. "This shows the problem is real and it's big."

The only other case to allege economic espionage to benefit a foreign government involved two researchers indicted in Ohio in 2001 for allegedly stealing genetic materials used for Alzheimer's disease research and funneling it to a Japanese government-funded corporation.

But the case fizzled after Japan refused to extradite one defendant, Takashi Okamoto, because a Japanese judge ruled he had not violated U.S. laws. The other defendant, Hiroaki Serizawa, pleaded guilty in the U.S. to a much lesser charge of making false statements to investigators.

Nanny And Senator's Grandchild Flee Masked Intruders In Silver Spring Home (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

Masked intruders forced their way into the Silver Spring home of a U.S. senator's daughter yesterday morning, startling a nanny who ran outside with the lawmaker's 2-year-old granddaughter and left his youngest grandson behind.

A Montgomery County police SWAT team later found the baby safe in his crib.

Police think the incident was a burglary gone awry because the intruders apparently didn't realize the house was occupied.

The burglars approached the red-brick house on the 2400 block of Hayden Drive in Forest Glen about 9:30 a.m., police said. After hearing suspicious noises outside, the 42-year-old nanny opened the door.

"When they burst in, the nanny grabbed the little girl and left the child in the crib," police spokeswoman Cpl. Sonia Pruitt said.

The 1-year-old baby, Jimmy, is the youngest grandson of Sen. Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M.

The nanny ran to a neighbor's house to call police, who initially feared the incident could turn into a hostage situation. Domenici's daughter, Helen, called her father shortly after being notified of the situation. Neither she nor her husband was home during the incident.

"The senator was deeply concerned," said Steve Bell, Domenici's chief of staff.

Police, who would not comment on whether anything was taken from the house, think the burglars fled through the back door before authorities arrived. They remained at large last night.

Shortly after the incident, Reyna Escobar, who lives two houses away, noticed that the nanny's van, which was parked outside the house, had its side door open. Escobar called the nanny to alert her.

"She was crying," said Escobar, 36. "All she told me is some men had broken in. She said she couldn't talk to me."

An emergency response team, which includes SWAT officers, was dispatched to the quiet, hilly street about 30 minutes after the men entered the house.

"The concern was that the suspects could still be inside the home with the 1-year-old," police spokeswoman Lucille Baur said. "The nanny believed that the suspects could have been armed."

The nanny was so shocked by the incident that she was unable to tell detectives conclusively how many burglars she saw and whether they carried weapons, police said.

After authorities determined that the baby was safe, his parents, the nanny, the baby and his sister, Andie, were taken to a nearby church. An officer with the U.S. Capitol police was also sent to the scene after the senator's office notified them of the situation, Bell said.

Late yesterday, the senator released a statement saying he and his wife Nancy were "relieved and thankful that no one was hurt during this frightening incident at my daughter's home this morning. I am grateful for the quick action by the Montgomery County Police to secure the house and ensure my grandchildren's safety."

Helen Domenici, the homeowner, and twin sister Paula are the youngest of the senator's eight children, according to a biography on the lawmaker's Web site. Reached at home yesterday afternoon, Helen Domenici declined to comment.

The nanny is an El Salvadoran immigrant who has been employed by the couple for about three years, Escobar said. The nanny walked away from a reporter yesterday after a police employee told her that she didn't have to talk to the media.

Escobar and other neighbors said they feel that Forest Glen is no longer the kind of community in which people don't always bother locking their doors.

"I'm scared. I have children, too," she said yesterday. "I'm afraid I could be next. I'm keeping my door locked."

Four homes in the vicinity were burglarized last month, police said. The last of those crimes, which occurred Nov. 28, led to the arrest of a teenager from the District. Police said he was a suspect in all four burglaries.

Capt. Betsy Davis, who heads the Silver Spring police station, was on her way to an undetermined death call when she heard about the incident and headed to Hayden.

"I'm not happy," she said yesterday outside the house. "I've got a neighborhood in a panic."

After the TV news trucks drove away from the house, the owners, the children and the nanny returned.

Davis greeted the nanny warmly when the two met at the front door. "You did a good job," Davis said. "You did the right thing."

INCREASINGLY, candidates for state attorney general nationwide have been campaigning on promises to crack down on online sexual predators, and understandably so. Youth and children are particularly vulnerable in Internet chat rooms and social networking sites, where the cloak of anonymity and a naive presumption that cyberspace is populated by kindred spirits can lead to damaging encounters and sexual exploitation. That is the impetus behind a proposal by Virginia's attorney general, Robert F. McDonnell (R), to require convicted sex offenders to register their e-mail addresses, instant-messaging handles and other online identities so they can be blocked from preying on youth online. Mr. McDonnell's proposal is anchored in a legitimate concern; unfortunately, it rests upon some dubious assumptions both about sex offenders and the likelihood of effective enforcement.

The Virginia proposal tracks a federal bill dealing with the same theme offered this month by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.). The idea, which other states may adopt, is to provide social networking sites the means necessary to screen known sex offenders. Already, MySpace.com has announced it would use Virginia's e-mail registry to stop convicted sex offenders from using the venue.

About a fifth of MySpace.com's users are under 18. But apart from anecdotal accounts, there is no evidence -- no studies, no statistics, nothing but inference -- to show that many of the loathsome predators who have victimized children and young people online are convicted sex offenders. Moreover, if a convicted child molester or rapist were intent on preying on unsuspecting innocents online, it would be easy to evade the proposed law by creating a new e-mail identity. Once a sexual predator decides that he is willing to risk prosecution and imprisonment for his crime, he is unlikely to balk over failing to register an e-mail address.

Every state has enacted a law requiring convicted sex offenders to register their whereabouts with authorities and in many cases prohibiting them from taking certain jobs (as coaches for youth teams, for instance) or from living close to schools. Mr. McDonnell argues that it is only logical to add cyber-addresses to the information that offenders must furnish to the authorities. Perhaps. But there is little reason to think that move will go very far beyond symbolism.

Discovery Of Hit List Led To Wave Of O.C. Arrests (LAT)

By H.G Reza, Times Staff Writer

Investigator says 5 police officers, prosecutor are targets of racist group with ties to prison gangs.

This week's arrests of 57 people allegedly tied to a white supremacist gang were sparked when authorities learned of a hit list with the names of an Orange County prosecutor and five police officers, an investigator said Friday.

Anaheim Police Lt. K. Switzer said authorities learned of the list last month. He said the probe began when another Orange County police department learned that one of its officers had been targeted by Public Enemy Number 1, a street gang involved in identity theft, credit card fraud and methamphetamine sales. The group has ties to the racist Aryan Brotherhood and Nazi Low Riders prison gangs.

Switzer said investigators were trying to determine why those six people were targeted and if it was a gang edict or the work of a single gang member.

"It's not uncommon to hear that gangs are upset with the law enforcement community, but to hear specific names of officers who are threatened is unique," Switzer said. "That crosses the line and gets our attention."

He said one of those targeted was a gang prosecutor from the Orange County district attorney's office but declined to name the individual. District attorney spokeswoman Susan Kang Schroeder declined to comment.

Switzer said the list included the name of an officer who supposedly worked in Anaheim. However, he said, no one by that name worked for the department. "We were still concerned," Switzer said. "It seems they had the wrong name, but we don't know why they targeted our department," he said.

He also declined to name the other departments whose officers were on the list.

The investigation began about a month ago, Switzer said, and 10 arrests were made before Thursday's sweep. More arrests are expected, he said.

Public Enemy Number 1, also known as PEN1, "is rapidly gaining prominence due to [the gang's] violent nature and attacks on police officers," according to the California Department of Justice's 2004 report on organized crime in the state. The report said the group has about 200 members in California and is "one of the most powerful and fastest-growing gangs inside and outside prison."

A law enforcement source who requested anonymity said PEN1 was especially dangerous because members had obtained personal information about judges, prosecutors and police officers. The source said someone affiliated with the gang stole personal data while working at a company that had access to such records.

The gang started in Long Beach in the 1980s, and its membership grew rapidly, particularly in Huntington Beach and southern Orange County, according to the Anti-Defamation League, which tracks racist groups. The league said Public Enemy Number 1 leads a coalition of white supremacist groups called the Southern California Skinhead Alliance.

The Thursday sweep involved about 300 officers from about 25 agencies, including the FBI and U.S. Marshals Service. Switzer said authorities raided about 75 locations throughout Southern California.

The arrests were peaceful, and officers seized two handguns, a shotgun, a rifle and small amounts of drugs, he said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Mary Cheney's Pregnancy Is Just Fine, Bush Tells Magazine (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15 — Mary Cheney's baby will have two mommies, and that is just fine with President Bush.

When People magazine asked him what he thought of the news that Vice President Dick Cheney's daughter, who is a lesbian, was pregnant with a child whom she will raise with her longtime partner, Heather Poe, Mr. Bush said: "I think Mary is going to be a loving soul to her child. And I'm happy for her."

Mary Cheney and Ms. Poe are not married, though they have said that, for all purposes, they consider themselves to be.

People released parts of the interview on Friday, and the quotation about Ms. Cheney's baby prompted a new round of questions about the president's past statements against same-sex marriage and, more particularly, child rearing by gay couples.

For instance, in an interview with The New York Times in 2005, Mr. Bush said in response to a question about gay adoption: "The ideal in society is to raise children with a man and a woman. Private adoption firms can make whatever choice they choose to do."

He added, "I believe children can receive love from gay couples, but the ideal is — and studies have shown that the ideal is where a child is raised in a married family with a man and a woman."

During his regular press briefing, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said Mr. Bush still believed that children should ideally be raised by a man and a woman as parents. But, Mr. Snow said, "he believes that Mary Cheney's child will, in fact, have loving parents."

Asked if Mr. Bush believed a child raised by parents of the same sex would be at a disadvantage, Mr. Snow replied, "He does not make comments on that, and nor will I."

Mary Cheney, 37, has said that she considered quitting the Bush-Cheney re-election campaign in 2004 when the president supported a proposed constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage. She is now an executive at Time Warner's AOL unit.

Mr. Bush is also quoted by People as saying, "There's no doubt in my mind a woman could do the job" of president.

The magazine quotes the first lady, Laura Bush, as saying that she believed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice could be a good candidate but was not running, "probably because she is single, her parents are no longer living, she's an only child."

"You need a very supportive family and supportive friends to have this job," Mrs. Bush said.

Also in the interview, Mr. Bush acknowledged that he sometimes had to take "sleep aids" when traveling abroad, though "I must tell you, I'm sleeping a lot better than people would assume."

George & Laura Bush: The PEOPLE Interview (PEOPLE)

People, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107463

The President and First Lady talk about the war, the future and their marriage. Plus: President Bush answers your questions.

The war, the elections, the GOP scandals: During these difficult times, the President and First Lady talked to PEOPLE about remaining focused on what they hold dear – family, country and one another.

By many measures – the progress on the war, the elections, poll results – it's been a rough year. Do you feel that way? What's your take on it?

THE PRESIDENT: I think it's been a very difficult year in Iraq – for our troops, for the families of the troops, for the Iraqi people. And it's been difficult for the American people, because success in Iraq has been slower coming than any of us would like. And so the task at hand now is to come up with a new way forward. I think most Americans fully understand the importance of success; they're wondering whether we have a plan to succeed. It's my job to listen to a lot of opinions and come up with a strategy that says we have a plan.

Did you think progress would be further along at this point?

THE PRESIDENT: I did. The reason it has been slower is because of the sectarian violence that was caused by outside forces. Now the task is to empower the Maliki government so that they can stop the violence to help them achieve the stability that 12 million Iraqis wanted when they went to the polls (in December 2005). There have been some remarkable achievements, but it is a very tough time now in Iraq.

Nearly 3,300 U.S. servicemen and women have been killed in the Iraq and Afghanistan operations – more than the number of Americans killed on September 11. Is democracy in Iraq worth the death toll?

THE PRESIDENT: If I didn't think removing the Taliban from Afghanistan and helping this young democracy in Iraq after we removed Saddam Hussein were worth it, I wouldn't have our troops there. Success in Afghanistan and Iraq, in Lebanon and elsewhere in the Middle East, is vital to the security of your children and your grandchildren. This is a long-term ideological struggle to protect future generations of Americans.

This year, we invited readers on our Web site to ask you questions. Here's one:

Nina Frazier of New Braunfels, Texas, asks: If you believe in the war, why didn't you encourage your own daughters to fight for your country? Or did you?

THE PRESIDENT: I believe Americans can contribute to the security and well-being of our country in a variety of ways. That's why we have a volunteer army. What we say to young people is that if you want to serve your country you can do so in the military, or you can do so by teaching children in inner-city Washington, D.C., like one of our daughters did. Or you can help form education programs in New York City, like our (other) daughter. There are all kinds of ways to serve.

Nancy Pelosi shattered Congress's glass ceiling by becoming the first female Speaker of the House. Do you think there's anything a woman would do differently with the Presidency?

THE PRESIDENT: I think it depends on the individual, but there's no doubt in my mind a woman could do the job.

Mrs. Bush: I agree. But it isn't easy to live here. Dr. (Condoleezza) Rice, who I think would be a really good candidate, is not interested. Probably because she is single, her parents are no longer living, she's an only child. You need a very supportive family and supportive friends to have this job.

The White House family had some happy news this week: Mary Cheney, the Vice President's daughter, is pregnant.

THE PRESIDENT: The Vice President took me aside and gave me the good news. He and his wife, Lynne, are very happy for Mary.

You said in 2005 that ideally "a child is raised in a married family with a man and a woman." Knowing Mary and her partner, Heather, do you still think that?

THE PRESIDENT: I think Mary is going to be a loving soul to her child. And I'm happy for her.

Many readers asked how you handle stress.

THE PRESIDENT: I pray daily. I exercise nearly daily, and I've got a loving wife who provides a comfortable, warm place for me to come home to.

Mrs. Bush, how do you feel when you hear some of what's said about your husband? Are there moments that sting?

Mrs. Bush: Sure, yes. I don't like that. But we've been involved (in politics) for years.

Is it worse today than in the past?

Mrs. Bush: When you go to the Lincoln Library in Springfield, Ill., and see what political cartoons and pamphlets said about President Lincoln, you see that it's not worse. People are the same no matter what generation.

A lot of readers asked how you shut off the day's events. Do you ever take sleep aids?

THE PRESIDENT: Generally not. But occasionally when I travel, I'm expected to get on an airplane and fly eight hours and pop out and be fresh and diplomatic and on message. If I'm having trouble sleeping, I'll take a sleep aid. But I must tell you, I'm sleeping a lot better than people would assume.

Do you ever need anything more than a cup of coffee to stay sharp?

THE PRESIDENT: I have a couple of cups in the morning, and drink a lot of water. Hydrating helps. There are ways to maintain your health, and one is exercise. I believe prayer is very important; others don't, but I do. I don't drink alcohol. I can remember when I used to drink, I had trouble sleeping at night.

Favorite book of the year?

THE PRESIDENT: Team of Rivals, about Abe Lincoln, by Doris Kearns Goodwin.

Nichole Grimm of Waynesboro, Va., asks: After being married for almost 30 years, what are the little ways you keep surprising each other to keep your marriage alive?

THE PRESIDENT: I hope mine is humor, that I'm able to joke and laugh. Laughter is an important part of a healthy lifestyle. This is a town that's not laughing a lot lately.

Mrs. Bush: We've done the same thing since we first got married. We wake up in the morning and drink coffee and read the newspapers. We like to go to bed early. Those quiet times that we're together at the end of the day give us the most comfort with each other.

Angela Roy wrote from an APO address in Europe: What are the craziest things you ever gave each other for Christmas?

Mrs. Bush: I think George would say those sweaters that I give him every single year – which I'm not giving him this year. The best gift he ever gave me was when I opened a present under the tree and there was a little porcelain library. It was the library at SMU, my university. (It represented) a beautiful garden and walkway that leads into the library there. He had given it as a gift to my university. That was, by far, the most moving gift he ever gave me.

Are your daughters coming home for Christmas?

Mrs. Bush: They are. Jenna is working with an international organization in Central and South America about education policy. And Barbara is working for a museum in the education department.

Rena Dillard of Nashville asks: Do you have a favorite Christmas memory of them as little children?

Mrs. Bush: I love to tell the girls this story. They would always help me decorate the tree, and then we'd have hot chocolate. Once when they were really little, I said, "Sit under the tree" – and it makes me want to weep – "and I'll go make the hot chocolate." (The First Lady's eyes fill with tears.) And I came back and they were so literal. They were squished under the branches, sitting way back by the trunk of the tree waiting for their hot chocolate. I'll never forget those precious little babies under the tree.

Suzanne Young of Des Moines asks: What are your plans for contributing to society after the end of your presidency?

THE PRESIDENT: Tell Suzanne that I'll be thinking about that after my presidency. I'll be active. There's a lot of really good initiatives we started here, such as battling HIV/AIDS on the continent of Africa, or dealing with malaria, or Laura's literacy initiatives, and the Freedom Agenda. I've got so much on my mind, and this job is so exciting that it's really hard to settle down and plan the next 10 years of our life.

Bush Happy About Mary Cheney's Pregnancy (AP)

President Bush says he is happy for Mary Cheney, the openly gay daughter of Vice President Dick Cheney, who revealed earlier this month that she is pregnant.

"I think Mary is going to be a loving soul to her child," Bush said in an interview with People magazine. "And I'm happy for her."

Bush was asked about Mary Cheney's pregnancy in light of his previous statements that a child ideally should be raised by in a family headed by a married father and mother.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said on Friday that Bush has not changed his mind. "But he also believes that every human life is sacred and that every child who comes into this world deserves love," Snow said. "And he believes that Mary Cheney's child will, in fact, have loving parents."

Asked if Bush believes that children who are raised by gay and lesbian parents are at a disadvantage, Snow said, "He does not make comments on that and nor will I." Mary Cheney, 37, and her partner of 15 years, Heather Poe, 45, are expecting a baby in late spring.

A number of conservative groups have expressed dismay at Cheney's pregnancy.

Bush Sticks To His Views On Gays Becoming Parents (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

DOJ_NMG_0107465

WASHINGTON — Although he recently expressed confidence that Mary Cheney will make a loving parent, President Bush continues to believe it is best that a child is raised by a man and woman married to each other, the president's spokesman said Friday.

The pregnancy of Vice President Dick Cheney's younger daughter, a lesbian, has reignited public discussion on same-sex couples becoming parents.

Some social conservatives, who support Bush and the vice president on most issues, learned of Mary Cheney's pregnancy with dismay, saying it undermined efforts to emphasize the primacy of the traditional family unit.

Commenting on the controversy, Bush last week told People magazine, "I think Mary is going to be a loving soul to her child. And I'm happy for her."

Pressed on whether his remark contradicted views he previously expressed that being raised by same-sex couples was not ideal for a child, he avoided a direct response.

"Mary Cheney is going to make a fine mom, and she's going to love this child a lot," he said.

In 2005, Bush said in an interview that he thought it best for a child to be raised by a man and woman married to each other. He does not favor same-sex marriage.

"I believe children can receive love from gay couples, but the ideal is — and studies have shown that the ideal is — where a child is raised in a married family with a man and a woman," he told the New York Times.

On Friday, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow was asked whether the president stood by this belief.

"Yes, he does," Snow replied.

"But he also believes that every human life is sacred and that every child who comes into this world deserves love," Snow said. "And he believes that Mary Cheney's child will in fact have loving parents."

Snow said Bush had not addressed whether he thought children raised by gays were at a disadvantage.

In the People interview, Bush said that he found out about Mary Cheney's pregnancy when the vice president "took me aside and gave me the good news."

Bush added that the vice president and his wife, Lynne, "are very happy for Mary."

The president did not mention Mary Cheney's partner of 15 years, Heather Poe.

Since the Bush administration took office in 2001, Mary Cheney has played a low-key but growing role in its political operation.

In 2004, she held a senior staff position in the Bush reelection campaign, and regularly traveled with her father aboard Air Force Two.

She is to give birth in the late spring.

Cheney's Lesbian Daughter Will Be A "Loving Mother": Bush (AFP)

AFP, December 15, 2006

President George W. Bush, a staunch defender of traditional values, believes vice-president Dick Cheney's lesbian daughter will be a "loving mother."

In an interview with celebrity magazine People, Bush said he was delighted to hear Mary Cheney was expecting a child with long-time partner Heather Poe.

"The Vice President took me aside and gave me the good news. He and his wife, Lynne, are very happy for Mary," Bush told the magazine.

Last year Bush said he believed that ideally "a child is raised in a married family with a man and a woman."

Asked if he still believed that, given that he knew Mary Cheney and her partner, he told People: "I think Mary is going to be a loving soul to her child. And I'm happy for her."

In May, Mary Cheney was critical of Bush's support for a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage.

However she said she had no doubt that "Bush was the absolute best person to be leading us at this time in our country's history."

In New Jersey, Gay Couples Ponder Nuances Of Measure To Allow Civil Unions (NYT)

By Kareem Fahim

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

HOBOKEN, N.J. Dec. 15 — Away from the loud political arguments over the New Jersey Legislature's vote to establish civil unions for same-sex couples, gays and lesbians across the state have begun to grapple with the practicalities: What verb to use? Get unified?

After drinks at a bar here Thursday night, hours after the vote, Rosanna Durruthy, 44, said she and her partner would soon start planning the ceremony they had talked about for years. “This is great,” said Ms. Durruthy, a Hoboken resident who has lived with her partner for nine years. “Will we have the major event where we get the villa in Tuscany? We’re still discussing it.” (She favors the Amalfi coast.)

Ms. Durruthy celebrated the news amid laughter and a long embrace with her old friend Bill Carter, 37, who lives in Texas with his partner. Mr. Carter was happy for his friend and said he considered the law a collective leap forward, but added of his home state: “There are no rights there; sodomy just came off the books.”

New Jersey is the third state to give approval to civil unions; Massachusetts permits gay couples to marry but only if they live in the state. Since Vermont began allowing civil unions in 2000, between 250 and 400 New Jersey couples have gotten hitched there (along with about 200 New York couples a year). Connecticut’s civil union laws took effect in October 2005.

The 2000 Census found about 16,000 same-sex couples living together in New Jersey, though the Urban Institute, a research organization, says the true count is as much as 50 percent higher; nearly one-third of them are raising children.

In interviews with more than a dozen gays and lesbians over the past three days, many talked about following through on long deferred plans now that the law has been passed. Other couples welcomed the broader rights but said little would change, saying that their commitments did not need a government sanction. There was approval from single people as well, even if some had not followed the debate as closely as their friends who share children, homes or bank accounts.

The legislation does not spell out procedures for obtaining civil unions, but advocates for same-sex marriage and state officials said the process was likely to mirror that for marriage. In New Jersey, couples apply for a marriage license in the municipality where the bride lives, unless the bride lives out of state; such rules would most likely have to be tweaked.

After a 72-hour waiting period, set aside to make certain a couple wants to get married, a municipal registrar issues a marriage license. Weddings in New Jersey can be performed by mayors, many judges, village presidents and ministers.

Eric Kabel, who works for a nursing agency and lives in Rahway, said that he and his partner signed up for a domestic partnership in New Jersey the first day that a law passed in 2004 went into effect.

“Neither of us were real activists,” he said. “But we wanted them to see the number of people who signed up as partners.”

When the civil union law takes effect — 60 days after the governor’s expected signature — the couple will head to City Hall, Mr. Kabel said, adding, “I don’t care if the city clerk does it.”

But while they are eager to claim the rights and benefits provided by the new law, Mr. Kabel lamented that a heterosexual couple who met “five minutes ago” can get a marriage license, while he and his partner of 16 years cannot.

Steve Mandeville and Victor Aluise, partners of 16 years who share a house in Ocean Grove, exchanged wedding bands years ago, in Sedona, Ariz.

“We were in a beautiful place, it was a beautiful day,” Mr. Mandeville recalled. “It doesn’t matter what you want to call it. If it will keep the heterosexual people happy, let’s just call it a union. Isn’t that what a marriage is anyhow?”

Mr. Aluise said the two had not yet decided if they would have another big ceremony, but they would wait until April 25 — the anniversary of their domestic partnership registration — to register for their union. “I’m elated, and I’m proud to be a New Jerseyan now,” he said.

Though advocates for civil rights for gay people vowed to keep pushing for same-sex marriage, Alan Fox, the manager of the bar in Hoboken where Mr. Carter and Ms. Durruthy had a drink, the Cage, said he had no desire for gays to win the right to marry.

Marriage, Mr. Fox said, had been for his parents (who eventually divorced). If he married, “it would be offensive to my people like my mother,” Mr. Fox said.

Jan Moore, 70, hailed the new law as good for young people. “They won’t be made to feel like second-class citizens, people who have to walk around and hide who they are or what they are,” she said in a telephone interview from her home in Ocean Grove.

Ms. Moore’s partner, a 77-year-old woman who refused to give her name, gave voice to the fears felt by an earlier generation. “I was in New York when the cops used to raid bars,” she said. “You had to show papers. They’d say, ‘Does your mother know who you are?’ ”

She also said she had no interest in marriage. “I’m an old Italian,” she said. She said when she was growing up “it was always a man and a woman.”

Ms. Moore, a great-grandmother, said she and her partner have been together for 36 years.

“We’ve climbed a mountain,” Ms. Moore said. “I didn’t think I would see this in my lifetime.”

Town Is Sued Over System Used In Voting (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0107467

By Barbara Whitaker

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

PORT CHESTER, N.Y., Dec. 15 — The United States Justice Department filed a lawsuit on Friday against this Westchester County village, charging that its at-large voting system illegally diminishes Hispanic influence.

The suit, which contends that the system violates the Voting Rights Act, seeks an injunction that could scuttle Board of Trustees elections in March.

"The right to vote is the bedrock of our government," Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney for the Southern District of New York, said in a statement. "The at-large system of electing Port Chester's Board of Trustees dilutes the votes of Port Chester's minority citizens and undermines democracy."

Mayor Gerald L. Logan criticized the government's lawsuit as "unfortunate and heavy-handed."

"We are extremely disappointed that the government chose divisive litigation instead of direct communication," he said. "There appears to be no interest in working cooperatively with Port Chester."

The Justice Department notified officials in April that it intended to file a lawsuit if they did not take steps to set up a district-based voting system. The department provided three separate plans to break the village into voting districts. On Dec. 4, the village board voted to notify the department that it did not believe the current system violated the act, setting the stage for a court battle.

According to the lawsuit, the village's at-large system — in which all residents vote for each member of the board of trustees — allows for white-bloc voting that prevents Hispanic voters from electing their preferred candidates. The government noted that more than 46 percent of the village's population and 21.9 percent of its voting-age citizens are Hispanic. Still, no Hispanic person has been elected to public office in the village.

The United States attorney's office also cited instances of what it said was voting polarized by race and ethnicity, as well as a history of anti-Hispanic discrimination in New York State, Westchester County and the village.

The court filing was supported by affidavits from residents and former candidates for either the board of trustees or the school board who are Hispanic or African-American and who identified what they said were instances of racial or ethnic appeals to undermine their candidacies. They also cited cases in which they said support in a smaller community was canceled out by white voting in other areas.

Anthony Piscionere, who is representing the village, said that officials were open to making changes to assure all ethnic groups and races were represented in elections. But, he said, three experts hired to review the Justice Department's data found it did not support the contention that the village violated the Voting Rights Act.

In addition, he said, districting the 2.4-square-mile village would be costly and have long-term consequences.

"If the evidence doesn't support the action, would you do it?" he said.

He said a Voters Rights Commission had been formed to increase voter participation. Mayor Logan noted that while according to the 2000 Census there were more than 3,000 Latinos of voting age in Port Chester, only 2,600 people voted in the last election and the winning candidate received 1,659 votes.

"It is apparent to all who know our village that we face apathy and not discrimination," he said.

But according to statements of former Hispanic and African-American candidates filed with the government's lawsuit, a problem does exist.

Cesar Ruiz, who ran unsuccessfully for trustee in March 2001, said he felt it was impossible for a Hispanic or African-American candidate to be elected under the current system. He recalled a supporter who told him: "I like you, you're a good guy. I've known you for years. But the Democrats are telling me not to vote for you because you are Hispanic."

Graciela Heymann, executive director of the Westchester Hispanic Coalition, a service and advocacy group that has an office in Port Chester, said it was difficult to say who was right in the case because of a lack of data.

However, she said, there was no doubt that there needed to be greater Latino representation in the village. Public hearings on the districting issue have highlighted tensions between longtime residents and Latinos who have recently moved there.

"I really feel that Port Chester is like a tale of two cities with people living separate lives," she said.

Feds Sue Village Over Hispanic Voting (AP)

By Jim Fitzgerald, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 16, 2006

The federal government sued a suburban New York village Friday, alleging that its at-large method of electing trustees is unfair to Hispanics and violates the Voting Rights Act.

The government requested that Port Chester — or a judge, if necessary — devise a system that would include a Hispanic district.

DOJ_NMG_0107468

"Ethnically and racially polarized voting patterns prevail" in Port Chester's local elections, according to a statement from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other Justice Department officials.

Mayor Gerald Logan blasted the lawsuit, calling it "unfortunate and heavy-handed" and noting that Port Chester has used at-large elections since 1868.

"We cannot and will not stand idly by and allow the federal government to upset and divide our village," he said.

The village is about 25 miles from New York City and is governed by a mayor and six trustees. Port Chester, with a population of about 28,000, is 43 percent Hispanic, according to the 2000 Census. The citizen voting-age population was 22 percent Hispanic, but no Hispanic has ever been elected as a trustee.

In court papers, the government said Hispanic candidates have been defeated in the past by "white bloc voting."

The next election is set for March 2007, and the Justice Department is asking for an injunction against it unless there is a new system in place.

At a court session Friday afternoon, however, Judge Stephen Robinson suggested there may not be enough time to reach a "thoughtful" decision and stop that election. He scheduled hearings for Feb. 12.

Last April, the Justice Department advised Port Chester that its system violated the Voting Rights Act and threatened a lawsuit. The trustees voted unanimously this month that the system does not violate the law.

Feds Sue State Over Juvenile Site (OKLA)

By Josh Rabe

Oklahoman, December 16, 2006

TULSA — The U.S. Justice Department on Friday filed a complaint against the state, challenging the conditions at a Sand Springs juvenile detention center

Federal prosecutors believe the state hasn't corrected serious violations found in a two-year investigation at the L.E. Rader Center, said Cynthia Magnuson, spokeswoman for the Justice Department.

She said violations included inappropriate sexual relationships, violence and abuse of psychotropic medications.

The U.S. attorney general's office filed the lawsuit Friday against the state, Gov. Brad Henry, the director and chairman of the Office of Juvenile Affairs and the superintendent of the juvenile facility.

The complaint accuses the state and juvenile justice officials of failing to protect federally protected civil rights of about 215 teens at the center.

"These allegations are very serious, and we were unable to resolve this," Magnuson said. "It just came to a point where we had to file suit."

'Not cooperative'

The Justice Department threatened legal action in a June 2005 letter Assistant Attorney General R. Alexander Acosta sent Henry.

"The facility was not cooperative and wouldn't let us conduct the sort of investigative work we usually would do," Magnuson said.

Since the letter was issued, state juvenile affairs officials have been reluctant to correct those problems, she said.

In a written statement released Friday, Gene Christian, executive director of the state Office of Juvenile Affairs, said his office anticipated legal action and looks forward to a final resolution to the situation.

Christian said he could not comment specifically on the case because it is pending.

Henry's spokesman, Paul Sund, had a similar response.

State Attorney General Drew Edmondson's office was reviewing the complaint Friday and couldn't yet address specific allegations, said Charlie Price, a spokesman.

Most cases of prison civil rights abuse are resolved out of court through consent orders in which an agency agrees to outside oversight for a certain time, Magnuson said. In rare instances, the Justice Department has sought court orders to close facilities.

ANTITRUST:

Airlines And Antitrust (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 16, 2006

For airline passengers, those half-empty flights on which you can spread out and take a couple of seats are a godsend. But for the airlines, they are misery. Those Ancient Mariner flights help to explain the sudden urge to merge in the airline industry.

United and Continental proposed a merger this week, even as US Airways's managers are trying to convince Delta's creditors to sell Delta to them rather than let it emerge from bankruptcy as an independent airline. More of this may be in the offing. Meanwhile, in Washington, Democrats are already sounding the political alarm about airline consolidation.

Senator Frank Lautenberg wants to be sure that any deals are "good for the flying public." His counterpart in the House, Minnesota's James Oberstar, is even more emphatic that the Justice Department should block all airline mergers. "I don't think there's any benefit from mergers except for the benefit of stockholders and airline officials," Mr. Oberstar averred this week.

We'd have thought a competitive and healthy airline industry is in everyone's interest. Mr. Oberstar's deepest concerns are for the unions who elect him, and unions tend to gripe about mergers for fear of losing jobs. But Delta's pilots are now experiencing what can happen when the alternative to merger becomes bankruptcy. The pilots' pension fund is being tossed over to the federal government, which means a sizable haircut for the pilots' lucrative pensions. Airline employees aren't immune to the industry's woes or good fortune.

And speaking of bankruptcy as an alternative, let's recall the last time the Justice Department took Mr. Oberstar's antitrust advice -- in 2001, when it rejected the proposed merger of United and US Airways. Both airlines later ended up in bankruptcy court and seeking taxpayer aid.

Still, Mr. Oberstar has identified a genuine political problem for the industry. Consolidations only make sense if they allow the merging airlines to take out marginal capacity, as US Airways has been explaining. But in the real world, "marginal capacity" translates to those half-filled flights to often small destinations.

Customers like those flights. And the politicians who represent the cities where those flights land hate to see them cut or reduced. The trouble for the industry is that all the big players are trapped in a prisoner's dilemma -- but one in which, by the rules of antitrust enforcement, they aren't allowed even to attempt to cooperate with each other. This leaves them with a choice between killing their own marginal flights -- and letting their competitors reap the benefit -- or limping along with unprofitable networks.

US Airways's provocative answer is to merge with Delta, cut marginal or overlapping capacity, make sure the extra planes don't keep flying the unfriendly domestic skies, and make money with a more compact network. The model is the US Airways merger with America West, in which US Airways was bought out of bankruptcy, allowing for contract terminations that would have been harder to shake off outside bankruptcy court. It figures it can repeat the trick with Delta.

By US Airways's account, this is even better than killing off one of the big carriers through a Chapter 7 liquidation, because in that case the remaining legacy carriers might buy up the planes and routes the departing carrier left behind. In that sort of auction of assets, the same old prisoner's dilemma rules apply. The routes may not be great, but buying them up is better than letting your competitors get them, so everyone goes at it.

Critics of mergers complain that the combined giants will proceed to monopolize certain routes. But an undeniable fact of modern airline life is that the barriers to entry are low and capital is plentiful. The planes can be leased, rather than purchased outright, and the startups lack the legacy and union costs of the Americans and Continentals.

This helps explain why low-cost carriers now account for 35% of the market, up from 10% not very long ago. A combined US Airways-Delta might try to monopolize a route, but it would soon face competition on that route from a JetBlue or AirTran or some startup we haven't seen yet. In this environment, capacity reduction and the elimination of marginal routes has to be part of any story that leads to a less self-destructive industry in the future.

An airline industry shakeout may mean more people on some flights, but it doesn't have to mean more "crowding." JetBlue just announced that it was increasing the leg room on its Airbus 320s. Not coincidentally, JetBlue is also growing and is (generally) profitable. Perhaps Mr. Oberstar ought to take another look at his list of beneficiaries in a more consolidated, more profitable airline business.

Airlines, Now Healthy, Getting Frisky (NYT)

By Mark A. Stein

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

HOW well have the commercial airlines rebounded from their near-death brushes with bankruptcy in the first half of the decade? Consider this: flights are packed, fares are rising and profits have reappeared despite stubbornly high fuel costs. The best may be to come, as some of the biggest airlines flirt with mergers that could permit them to cut costs and raise fares even further.

Federal regulators, meanwhile, eased up on some of the rules and prosecutorial tools after the collapses of Enron and WorldCom touched off a series of corporate scandals involving accounting fraud, insider trading, backdated stock option grants and other malfeasance.

THE BAGGAGE CAROUSEL The week began with news that another major airline was about to be acquired and ended with the announcement of just such an offer, but the two deals were related only in that they illustrated the industry's budding revival.

Qantas, the Australian airline, was the one that agreed to be acquired, accepting an $8.7 billion offer from a consortium led by Macquarie Bank and the Texas Pacific Group. Earlier in the week, Continental Airlines confirmed it was being courted by United, its much larger rival.

Both deals follow US Airways' offer last month to buy Delta Air Lines for $8 billion. Delta's board is considering that offer as it tries to emerge from bankruptcy court protection.

If one big domestic merger goes through, other airlines will feel pressure to pair off, too, or risk winding up at a competitive disadvantage because they have higher costs or smaller route networks. While such consolidation may bolster airlines' bottom lines, reduced competition would probably also result in more-crowded flights and higher fares, at least in the short term.

Delta, which opposes US Airways' bid, will file a plan next week outlining how it intends to operate as an independent airline once out of bankruptcy court protection.

EASING THE RULES Federal regulators and prosecutors moved to narrow or roll back some rules and investigative methods adopted after Enron and WorldCom imploded in multibillion-dollar accounting frauds, starting a wave of corporate scandals that are still unfolding.

The Justice Department acted first, imposing new limits on prosecutors in white-collar corruption cases. They now must seek approval from senior officials before asking companies to waive their attorney-client privilege, and they must disregard if a company has hired lawyers for potential witnesses when deciding whether to charge the company.

A day later, the Securities and Exchange Commission moved to relax an auditing provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 for smaller companies. In the law, Congress left it to the S.E.C. to decide precisely how thoroughly auditors must review the financial controls companies employ to detect fraud in their accounts.

The United States Chamber of Commerce and other business groups that have been critical of the S.E.C. rules and the Justice Department's approach may still try to persuade Congress to further reduce regulations and enforcement.

HOLDING STEADY The Federal Reserve left its benchmark interest rate steady, holding firm to its position that a slowing economy will subdue inflation in the months ahead but warning in a statement that "some inflation risks remain."

The possibility that inflation will not slow as expected has worried Fed board members, particularly Jeffrey M. Lacker of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, who has dissented each time since the central bank stopped raising rates in August.

While the Fed's Open Market Committee indicated in its statement that another rate increase could soon be needed to hold price increases down, it also acknowledged that "recent indicators have been mixed" and it could not rule out the possibility that economic growth and inflation could slow enough to warrant a rate cut next spring.

One barometer of inflation, the Labor Department's producer price index, will be updated Tuesday with figures from November.

BIDDING WAR Rival steel makers from India and Brazil opened a bidding war for the British-Dutch producer Corus, accelerating a worldwide consolidation of steel companies amid sharply higher costs for raw materials and energy.

Tata Steel of India began the scrap by offering $9.2 billion in cash for Corus, which itself was created by the 1999 merger of British Steel and Royal Hoogovens of the Netherlands. Within hours of Tata's bid, however, the Brazilian company, Companhia Siderúrgica Nacional, offered $9.6 billion.

Both bidders have access to cheap iron ore, a crucial matter in a global market where ore prices have risen in consecutive years. Tata also has the advantage of India's booming appetite for steel among road builders, land developers and automakers.

If either bid succeeds, the deal would be the second largest in 2006, trailing only Mittal Steel's $38.3 billion takeover of the Spanish-French-Luxembourgian steel maker Arcelor last summer.

UNHAPPY ANNIVERSARY On the eve of a high-level visit by American officials, the Bush administration accused China of failing to honor promises to open its economy to foreign competition and crack down on piracy of foreign goods.

The criticism came in a report to Congress by Susan C. Schwab, the United States trade representative. The analysis, which praised China in some areas, was required by American law on the fifth anniversary of China's joining the World Trade Organization.

The United States may seek arbitration from the World Trade Organization if it cannot resolve its disputes with China.

GOLDEN GOLDMAN The investment bank Goldman Sachs said its profit soared 93 percent in its fiscal fourth quarter, meaning it earned nearly as much in 2006 as it had in the previous two years combined — both of which were also record years.

Driven by a record year in mergers and acquisitions, a robust stock market rally and rapid growth in credit markets — which are now much bigger than stock markets — Goldman posted a record annual profit of $9.5 billion on record revenue of $37.7 billion.

Soaring profit means soaring bonuses. Investment bankers who generated a lot of business can expect $20 million to $25 million each, while top traders can take home up to $50 million, according to executives at other leading banks.

Democrat Senator Issues Warning About Airline Mergers (DOW)

By Corey Boles

Dow Jones Newswires, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--A senior Democrat senator Friday expressed concern about the impact on competition from potential consolidation in the U.S. airline industry.

Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg (D-NJ) said he is concerned that renewed speculation the industry is about to embark upon another round of takeover activity could leave consumers shortchanged.

"What matters to me is to see if this proposal is good for the flying public, if it makes air travel more convenient, less expensive and with higher quality service," Lautenberg said in a statement Friday.

Last month, Delta Air Lines Inc. (DALRQ) rejected an unsolicited $8 billion approach from U.S. Airways Group Inc. (LCC), saying the company was on track to emerge from bankruptcy protection in early 2007 on its own.

Airline shares then moved up sharply on Wednesday with the AMEX airline index increasing 3% on word of private discussions between the chief executives of UAL Corp. (UAUA), parent of United Airlines, and Continental Airlines Inc. (CAL) about a possible tie-up.

Also Wednesday, shares in regional carrier MidWest Air Group Inc. (MEH) shot up 22% - commensurate with the amount of a hostile takeover offer from AirTran Holdings Inc. (AAI).

Analysts have long predicted that the industry needs to go through a wave of consolidation in order to cut costs and duplication of services. The sector was hard hit by the steep drop in the numbers of people flying in the wake of 9/11. Airlines also struggled to swallow the spike in oil prices earlier in the year which led to a dramatic rise in their costs.

Once news of U.S. Airway's approach for Delta was made public, the Department of Justice quickly made it clear its antitrust unit would investigate any potential transactions in the sector.

Lautenberg said that, in addition to the concerns he had about ensuring sufficient competition in the sector, he also wanted to seek reassurances that, were there to be a deal, there would be assurances given about protecting employees' jobs at the two airlines.

"I also want to know more about plans for employees who have worked at Delta and U.S. Airways for many years, and employees who are near their retirement. What happens to them," his statement said.

Lautenberg said that were actual consolidation in the industry to materialize, he "would ask serious and thoughtful questions in the Senate Commerce Committee about this proposal. Too much is on the line here to give it a rubber stamp."

He said he wouldn't hesitate from holding oversight committee meetings into airline consolidation.

Lautenberg sits on the aviation subcommittee and could possibly become its chairman once the party takes control of Congress in January. A spokesman for Lautenberg's office would only say that the subcommittee chairman roles won't be decided until January.

Staff members for other Democrat lawmakers said they share Lautenberg's concerns but are waiting to see how any consolidation plays out before they commit to staging oversight hearings.

Milwaukee Business Journal, December 16, 2006

Merck & Co. said Thursday that the federal regulatory antitrust waiting period for its $1.1 billion deal to buy Sirna Therapeutics Inc. expired.

The two companies broke news of the deal on Oct. 30, when Merck (NYSE: MRK) said it would pay $13 a share in cash for San Francisco-based Sirna (NASDAQ: RNAI).

The end of the required waiting period satisfies one condition for the deal to be completed. Sirna's stockholders have yet to vote on the deal -- that's set for Dec. 28 in San Francisco's Grand Hyatt Hotel.

Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based Merck is a giant drug company with 61,500 workers.

Sirna seeks treatments for conditions like age-related macular degeneration, asthma and hepatitis C using RNA-interference technology. It has about 70 workers.

Hearst Buys Copley's LA Newsapers; To Sell To MediaNews (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0107472

TORRANCE, Calif. (AP)--Copley Press Inc. said Friday it sold the Daily Breeze and three weekly newspapers to Hearst Corp. in a deal that will eventually transfer ownership of the Los Angeles-area paper to Denver-based MediaNews Group Inc.

MediaNews, which also owns the Daily News of Los Angeles and other area papers, will run the Breeze while a sale of the papers from Hearst is pending, MediaNews said Friday.

Financial details weren't disclosed. But in court documents filed earlier this month, the purchase price was estimated at $25 million for a deal that includes the Palos Verdes Peninsula News, The Beach Reporter and More San Pedro.

"We are delighted to acquire these fine newspapers and expand our reach in the exciting media market of Los Angeles," said Dean Singleton, chief executive of MediaNews. "The Daily Breeze and its sister weekly newspapers are a wonderful addition to the Los Angeles Newspaper Group."

The Breeze, which has a paid circulation market share of about 3.5% in the Los Angeles area, has an average daily circulation of 70,076 and 284 employees.

Copley also is selling the building that houses the Breeze. MediaNews plans to keep the paper in its current location under a short-term lease with Copley.

The purchase of the Daily Breeze will give MediaNews a stronger foothold in the Los Angeles area. The company's newspapers cover many Southern California suburbs, and its largest holding, the Daily News of Los Angeles, competes against the Los Angeles Times.

Singleton has used a similar approach around the San Francisco Bay area, where he runs the Oakland Tribune and other suburban newspapers that vie for readership against the San Francisco Chronicle.

Copley, parent company of the San Diego Union-Tribune, said in June it wanted to sell its Los Angeles Newspapers, citing competitive pressures in the market.

The complex deal involving New York-based Hearst and MediaNews Group was documented in court filings earlier this month as part of a federal antitrust case targeting their plans to consolidate some business operations of their Bay Area newspapers.

A San Francisco investor is trying to block the consolidation, claiming such cooperation violates antitrust laws.

In the filing in San Francisco, the media companies disclosed plans for Hearst to purchase the Daily Breeze from Copley and then sell it to MediaNews along with two other publications, the Monterey County (Calif.) Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press.

The Daily Breeze is one of 20 newspapers published by Copley, which is based in San Diego.

Copley is the sixth-largest private family owned newspaper group in the U.S. and is the 19th largest newspaper group in the country. Copley also said earlier this year it was exploring the possible sale of its seven newspapers in Ohio and Illinois but intends to retain the Union-Tribune.

The company also operates Copley News Service, which provides news, commentary and features from bureaus in Washington, D.C., Los Angeles, Chicago and Mexico City, as well as in Sacramento and the state capitals of Ohio and Illinois.

The news service shared a Pulitzer Prize in April with the Union-Tribune for exposing the bribery scandal that brought down then-U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

The company that became The Copley Press was started in 1905 in Illinois by Col. Ira C. Copley. He expanded to California in 1928. Helen Copley ran the company from 1973 until her retirement in 2001 and her son, David C. Copley, succeeded her.

Founded by political activist and retired pharmacist S.D. "Doc" Barkley, the Torrance paper began as a weekly in 1894 known as The Breeze. It covered several Los Angeles beach communities before it became part of the Copley family holdings in the late 1920s.

Hoping to reduce the time and expense involved in the merger review process, the Justice Department's antitrust division on Friday announced changes to its five-year-old guidelines for vetting corporate transactions. Many of the changes focus on the "second request," in which regulators, after launching a preliminary investigation into a deal's competitive effects, extend the waiting period and ask the parties for more information. Among the new provisions is an option that allows companies to limit the scope of the documents they must produce in a second request, the Justice Department said.

Second request have become less common in recent years, according to figures published in a document accompanying Friday's announcement. In the fiscal years 2000 and 2001, before the antitrust division took up its 2001 Merger Review Process Initiative, about 40 percent of preliminary investigations led to second requests. In 2002 and 2003, that percentage fell below 29 percent. In 2004 and 2005, it stood at 24 percent.

Merger reviews have also gotten shorter. Since the 2001 initiative was announced, the average length of time from the opening of a preliminary investigation to the early termination or closing of the investigation has fallen from about 93 days to 57 days, the Justice Department said.

DOJ Announces Reforms To Antitrust Review Policy (WSJ)

By Corey Boles

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--The Department of Justice on Friday announced measures to reduce the cost and duration of merger investigations carried out by its antitrust unit.

The voluntary amendments come as part of wider series of measures aimed at reducing the burden on companies going through the merger approval process.

The new option would place limits on the extensiveness of DOJ requests for further information from merging companies. Only certain central files and a targeted list of 30 employees, deemed central to the business, would be searched by the DOJ during a takeover investigation.

In a statement, the DOJ said the new option would be available to most parties whose M&A activities are subject to review by the antitrust division.

In order to qualify, companies must agree to provide requested information to the DOJ early in the merger process, agree to an investigation schedule set by the department and also to a sufficient period for the division to conduct post-complaint discovery.

"Efficient merger enforcement - reaching the right answers as quickly as possible with the least burdens necessary - is one of our top priorities," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the antitrust unit.

Other changes announced Friday would see a shorter default period for reviews from the current three-four years to a new two year period and limitations on when the DOJ can request additional information from companies.

A review of merger policy guidelines began in 2001 aimed at helping the division identify legal, factual and economic issues regarding proposed merger more quickly.

The DOJ said that since reforms began, the average investigation now lasts around 57 days compared to 93 days previously.

DeKalb Raid Ends In Gunfire ATF Agents Shot While Serving 'Firearms-related' Warrant (AJC)

By Mae Gentry, Mike Morris, The Atlanta Journal-constitution.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 16, 2006

Two agents with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives were shot early Friday while serving a warrant at a DeKalb County apartment complex, police said.

One agent was struck in the knee and the other in the lower abdomen. Both men were treated at a local hospital and released.

The shooting occurred before dawn at the Pinewood apartment complex near Panola Road in Lithonia, DeKalb police dispatchers said.

ATF spokesman Marc Jackson said the agents, whose names have not been released, were serving a federal search warrant for "firearms-related offenses."

"They knocked and announced their presence," Jackson said. After they entered the apartment, he said, "they were met with gunfire from within the residence."

Jackson said he did not know whether agents returned fire. After the shooting, other agents talked the suspects out of the apartment.

Jeffrey Pearce, ATF assistant special agent in charge, said two men and a woman were taken to the DeKalb County Jail, where the woman was released. The suspects were not wounded, he said.

Monte Edward, 22, who came to the apartment complex after the shooting, said his cousin lived in the unit raided by authorities and that he had once lived there.

Edward said he received a phone call from a neighbor saying, "Someone's kicking in your door." He said the neighbor screamed and told him, "Somebody's shooting."

Edward said his cousin, 23-year-old Chardriguez Durden, was in the apartment with a woman and a man.

DOJ_NMG_0107474

Durden of Stone Mountain has been charged with six counts of aggravated assault on a police officer and violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act, according to a news release from DeKalb police. Paul Thompson Jr., 19, of Covington has been charged with violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act, the release said.

Federal charges are pending.

Durden's father, Charles Durden, 47, of Snellville came to the scene as federal agents were removing bags from the apartment. It was unclear what was in the bags.

"I just don't get it," the father said. "You come, kick in somebody's door at 4 o'clock in the morning and what do you expect? This area has had a lot of burglaries and home invasions."

Chardriguez Durden's attorney, Tony Mathis, said the apartment had been burglarized twice before and that his client was afraid.

"He fired from his bedroom through the door," Mathis said. "When he heard them say 'police,' he put the weapon down and laid on the ground.

"All of them were afraid. They thought someone was breaking into the house."

Mathis said Chardriguez Durden was concerned about the wounded agents. The attorney also said the weapon the agents wanted was not in the apartment.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigrants' Families Figuring Out What To Do After Federal Raids (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

Immigrant families scrambled yesterday to find detained relatives, arrange care for children of deported parents and recover from the loss of work as a result of raids this week by immigration authorities at meat-packing plants in six states.

The raids, part of a federal operation against identity theft, had stunning effects on the surrounding towns, residents said. In all, 1,282 legal and illegal immigrants were arrested, and in most cases the plants, all operated by Swift & Company of Greeley, Colo., were the largest employer around.

"Many people are still very frightened," Mayor Luis Aguilar of Cactus, Tex., said.

In Cactus, 275 employees were arrested.

In Worthington, Minn., with 230 arrests, residents said dozens of immigrants had gone into hiding.

"I've never seen anything like it, the sadness, the emptiness, the fear," a schoolteacher, Barbara Kremer, said. Ms. Kremer said she had provided shelter in her house since the raid for 24 immigrants who were afraid to return to their homes.

The raids, by Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents, netted dozens of immigrants who were legal residents but did not have their papers with them at work. Others arrested were illegal who have to leave the country or face deportation.

Many have children or spouses who are legal residents or Americans, and they have to decide whether the families will stay here or return to their home countries.

Veronica Rodriguez Perez, 20, an American who is works on a production line at the Swift beef-processing plant in Greeley, Colo., said she had not been able to talk with her husband, a Guatemalan, since he was arrested on Tuesday. Mrs. Perez said immigration agents separated during the raid from her husband, Roberto Pérez García.

"They made him and myself seem like criminals," she said. "He tried to give me a kiss on the forehead, but they would not let us talk to each other."

Mr. Pérez worked in the slaughterhouse side of the plant, she said. They have an 11-month-old son who was born in Colorado. Mr. Pérez, who was in the United States illegally, had not applied for residency because of the legal costs, she said.

Many of the arrested immigrants were taken to Camp Dodge in Johnston, Iowa, a National Guard base. Others were bussed to an immigration detention center in Atlanta for deportation proceedings.

The chief executive officer of Swift, Sam Rovit, said that production was slightly slowed at the plants, but that the losses in replacing the workers could be in the millions.

Swift executives said they had sought to work with immigration officials to pre-empt the raids. In March, the immigration agency subpoenaed the work documents of every Swift employee. After reviewing the papers, the agency retained them for many employees, including 665 at a plant in Marshalltown, Iowa, on suspicion that they were fake or stolen, Donald F. Wiseman, the Swift general counsel, said.

Swift began to interview its employees. About 400 left the company after the interviews, with many acknowledging that their documents were not legal, Mr. Wiseman said. He added that the immigration agency later ordered the company to stop the interviews.

On Nov. 28, Swift sought an injunction against the raids in Federal court in Amarillo, Tex. Judge Mary Lou Robinson denied the request.

Mr. Rovit said Swift, third largest meatpacker in the nation, paid good wages by industry standards, twice the minimum wage, with health benefits. With tight profit margins, he added, Swift would be hard-pressed to replace the workers for work, which is demanding and has historically attracted immigrants, including immigrants without proper documents.

"Nobody wants to have illegal immigrants," Mr. Rovit said.

He said a continued crackdown would bring "a shrinking in the industry, because there is not enough labor to go around."

Prosecutors in several states began filing criminal charges against accused suppliers of the illegal documents. In Salt Lake City, officials unsealed a complaint against Veronica Carrillo, a Mexican immigrant accused of selling real United States birth certificates to Swift employees.

Rift Over Illegal Immigration Leads To Talk Of Secession (NYT)

By Paul Vitello

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

FARMINGVILLE, N.Y., Dec. 14 — Assuming a new name has often been part of the immigration experience. Now this Long Island hamlet, bruised for a decade by its reputation as a place where illegal immigrant day laborers crowd into rooming houses, is considering a name change of its own.

Farmingville, or at least the more affluent half of it, where few if any of the new immigrants live, would have itself be known instead as the village of Oak Hills.

Some people here acknowledge this is a kind of white flight by incorporation — a maneuver pioneered 20 years ago when an enclave within the increasingly Hispanic community of Central Islip, in Suffolk County, broke off to become the village of Islandia.

But many of the homeowners here who have signed a secession petition in recent days say that they are not leaving Farmingville — Farmingville has left them.

Now known as an illegal immigrants' haven, the community has been the scene of frequent demonstrations by residents, and by groups that come periodically to taunt the day laborers. On CNN, Lou Dobbs marks Farmingville with pushpins regularly on the map of his continuing crusade against illegal immigration.

And then there is the movie. A documentary based on a 2000 attack in which two men beat two Mexican day laborers almost to death evinced a complex portrait of the community but left the overriding impression that Farmingville is a place without pity. The film, which won a Sundance Film Festival prize, is titled simply — and many here think unfairly — "Farmingville."

"It seems like every time something is said about Farmingville, it's a negative rather than a positive," said Del DeMarino, 63, a resident since 1972 who is the chief organizer of the Committee for an Incorporated Village. "It's just not possible to change that now."

Demographers say the majority of immigrants are now settling in suburbia, where frustration with perceived federal inaction against illegal newcomers has led to a variety of ad-hoc local initiatives. In Suffolk County, for example, there have been crackdowns on overcrowded rooming houses in Farmingville and other areas, and laws passed against employment of illegal immigrants, neither of which has had much effect.

Unable to build fences like the 700-mile one proposed for the Mexican border, a handful of unincorporated communities like Farmingville are seizing on self-rule as a tool of self-preservation — or, as some see it, self-segregation.

"We know what they're talking about when they say they want to separate from 'Farmingville' — they mean the Mexicans," said William White, a local resident who opposes the name change.

Mr. DeMarino, a salesman for a shipping company and a Republican active in local politics, said immigration was not his only motivation.

There are fingers of other ZIP codes and hamlets that lie across parts of Farmingville, and the new village would incorporate them, he said, "giving us one identity." There is also a state road improvement project about to begin, and an incorporated village may be able to wield more influence over it than an unincorporated area.

But as he steered his Jeep through streets of widely spaced homes, elaborately decorated for Christmas, on the wealthier side of Farmingville that would become Oak Hills, Mr. DeMarino acknowledged that it was mainly the "stigma thing."

"See that house?" he said, pointing to a two-story colonial-style home with a broad lawn. "That house has been on the market for eight months. He dropped the price three times. Nice house. But if you are trying to sell a house in Farmingville, you have a problem."

Asked if that might have more to do with the slowing real estate market, Mr. DeMarino said Farmingville's notoriety compounded the problem.

Hard by the Long Island Expressway, Farmingville is an unincorporated area in the Town of Brookhaven. According to the 2000 census, 8 percent of its 16,000 residents were Hispanic, up from 3 percent in 1990.

In what passes for downtown, a stretch of broad boulevard dividing the east and west sides of Farmingville, the storefronts feature an unusual number of Laundromats within a few short blocks (three), money-order vendors specializing in international transfers and inexpensive, footlocker-size luggage (two), and window advertisements in Spanish (innumerable).

Miriam Valenciano, who owns a small house behind the downtown district, was skeptical when told about the proposed name change. "You mean we'll have an upper-class Farmingville and a lower-class Farmingville," she said. "That's what it sounds like to me. I think it's a little derogatory."

Inside a variety store, a man who gave his name only as John bought large stacks of tickets from a New York State Lottery machine. "What about the taxes?" he said when asked about the Oak Hills proposal. "They start a new village, there's new taxes, right? I don't want nothing to do with it."

Advocates of the plan say residents of the new village would have to pay only a minimal amount in new taxes to cover clerical costs. Services like garbage collection, road maintenance and snow removal would probably be handled through a contract with the township, and are unlikely to significantly change most residents' tax bills.

Exact boundaries have not been determined, but the proposed village of Oak Hills — named for the oak trees that thrive in the sandy soil of this part of the island — would be a tract of land in the western half of Farmingville where homes sell for about $500,000 and up, according to local real estate agents. It would exclude houses in the eastern half that are generally valued about $100,000 less.

Many of those cheaper houses on the east side have been converted, often illegally, into makeshift apartments for the men who get picked up in trucks for construction and landscaping jobs each morning.

"I've got nothing against those people, they work hard, but I think we have a right to protect our property values," said Joseph Alfini, 53, a retired electrician who lives in the core of the proposed village. "The landlords who rent these rooms out, they cannot afford to buy houses over here. If we have our own building department, we can keep it that way."

The Rev. Alan Ramirez, a vigorous defender of the day laborers, said of the movement: "They don't need to change their name. What they need to change is their attitude of hostility toward their neighbors."

State law requires any new village to have a minimum of 500 inhabitants and a contiguous area of not more than five square miles; Oak Hills would probably have about 3,000 residents. Once petitions are signed by 20 percent of the registered voters within the proposed boundaries, a majority vote in an election referendum would establish the new village.

Farmingville's secessionists began collecting petitions last month and hope to hold an election early in the new year.

Mr. DeMarino, the leader of the campaign, was interviewed at his home the other day while a crew of three Spanish-speaking women cleaned his house. A member of the town Republican committee, he has run twice unsuccessfully for councilman in the Town of Brookhaven.

Asked whether he might like to be mayor of Oak Hills someday, Mr. DeMarino smiled and said, "I cannot entertain that notion at this time."

Last-Minute Lawmaking By Hastert, Reid (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

In the wee hours of the morning Dec. 7, Senate negotiators rejected a Medicare measure pushed by outgoing House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) that would have meant big revenues for an insurance company in Hastert's home state. But a day later, the $100 million proposal was alive and well, paired with a plan for a major Nevada land swap backed by Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), the incoming Senate majority leader.

The leaders' dealmaking went on behind the scenes during the final, frenetic hours of the 109th Congress. Hastert's provision, which would give certain Medicare beneficiaries additional time to change their health-care coverage, and Reid's plan, which involves more than 900 square miles of federal land, were included in a massive tax and trade measure approved by Congress shortly before its final adjournment early last Saturday morning.

Both provisions have been criticized as potentially harmful to public interests. Land-use activists complained this week that Reid's provision would sell too much of the federal land to private developers and that it circumvents land-disposal procedures. Several senior senators objected to Hastert's provision on the floor of the Senate, saying it favored one type of Medicare plan over others. Representatives of Aon Corp., an insurance company based in Hastert's home state, lobbied for the provision.

The Hastert measure "creates an unlevel playing field," said Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), the incoming chairman of the Finance Committee. Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), the outgoing chairman of the tax-writing committee, added: "I am also disappointed in the process that led to the provision being included in the bill."

Baucus, Grassley and incoming Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said they will probably attempt to strike the Medicare provision when the new Congress convenes next year.

The Hastert and Reid provisions were parts of an amendment quietly inserted in the $50 billion, 10-year tax and trade bill on a procedural vote. The huge bill was treated by lawmakers as the last legislative train out of town. Other provisions slipped in at the last minute included a $1 billion expansion of health savings accounts, a Republican-backed program that allows tax-free savings for health care, and 520 tariff suspensions worth tens of millions of dollars to U.S. corporations.

The last-minute deal involving Hastert and Reid apparently began with a phone call on the afternoon of Dec. 7 from Reid to House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), according to a senior Democratic Senate aide familiar with the private negotiations.

Reid asked why his land provision had not been included in the tax and trade bill. Thomas brought up the subject of Hastert's amendment and said it was his intention to add it to the bill in tandem with Reid's measure, according to the senior aide. Several people familiar with the talks -- both Democrats and Republicans -- suggested that one provision was exchanged for the other, but spokesmen for Reid and Hastert said they do not believe there was a trade.

The Hastert provision would allow certain Medicare beneficiaries -- those who receive physician and hospital benefits through the original Medicare program -- to switch their health coverage after the open-enrollment period for Medicare closes at the end of March. The provision also limits the type of plan that they can choose as an alternative: those that do not offer prescription drug coverage.

Representatives of Aon Corp. lobbied Congress for the policy. According to a listing on the Web site of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, Aon's Sterling Life Insurance Co. subsidiary is one of fewer than two dozen companies, most of them smaller, regional firms, that offer private fee-for-service plans without drug coverage -- the type of plan that the provision would benefit most.

Most organizations offer plans that combine Medicare physician, hospital and prescription drug benefits. The groups that would be aided by the provision, such as Sterling, concentrate on offering private health plans under Medicare that allow beneficiaries to get drug coverage through a different organization. The measure's cost would result from the additional Medicare patients who switch to such programs, which cost the government more money.

A Hastert spokesman said the speaker pressed for the provision to expand enrollment in Medicare plans overall. Aon officials repeatedly declined to comment.

Reid's provision would designate 900 square miles of Nevada as wilderness and would allow 70 square miles to possibly be sold to private investors. It is one of several proposals by Reid that would make large stretches of federal land in Nevada a combination of wilderness and private development. Proceeds of the land sales would go to assist local governments. Reid's Republican colleague from Nevada, Sen. John Ensign, co-sponsored the provision.

Some environmental groups approve of the land provision; one is the Campaign for America's Wilderness, which likes the way it expands wilderness designations. Other groups, such as the Seattle-based Western Lands Project, decry the loss of land to developers and the loss of revenue for the government.

"He's selling off federal land that belongs to all of us and keeping the money in Nevada," said Janine Blaeloch, director of the Western Lands Project.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Reid, defended the provision as a way to protect wilderness areas, improve water conservation and enhance fire-prevention efforts. "The bill was the subject of numerous negotiations with stakeholders and will protect more than 500,000 acres of wild and sensitive public land as wilderness," Manley said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Incoming Chairmen Ready To Investigate (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0107478

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

Incoming Democratic committee chairmen say they will hold a series of hearings and investigations early next year to build the case for their call for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq and for possible action against defense contractors found to have wasted billions in federal funds.

The emerging plans to grill administration officials on the conduct of the war are part of a pledge for more aggressive congressional oversight on issues such as prewar intelligence, prisoner treatment at Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo Bay, and the government's use of warrantless wiretaps.

Among the most eager incoming chairmen is Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), a lawyer with a professor's demeanor and a prosecutor's doggedness. As head of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Levin, 72, will be his party's point man on the Iraq war and on the Democrats' call to begin withdrawing troops in the coming months.

Levin said he also plans inquiries into "documentation of waste and fraud and abuse in the contracting areas" of the military. Aggressive oversight "is not just a budget issue," he said, but at some point "becomes a significant moral issue." In the House, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), another leading advocate of a phased withdrawal, has vowed to use his Appropriations subcommittee chairmanship to investigate the Iraq war, holding "two hearings a day for the first three or four months . . . to find out exactly what happened and who's been responsible for these mistakes."

In committee after committee next month, the gavel will be handed by Bush allies to ardent Democrats deeply frustrated by what they see as the GOP-led Congress's refusal to conduct meaningful oversight and to hold the executive branch accountable.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said he will use his Judiciary Committee perch to conduct "real oversight" of the FBI and the Justice Department and to delve into "the abuse of billions of taxpayers' dollars sent as development aid to Iraq."

"I am not prepared to accept answers like 'I can't talk about it,' " Leahy said in a recent speech at Georgetown University's law school.

Levin, a sharp critic of the administration's use of prewar intelligence, will have new, substantial powers to press the White House for information and for a new direction in Iraq.

In a recent interview in his Senate office, Levin said the Senate Armed Services Committee's first priority will be to seek ways to stabilize Iraq and gradually disengage the United States from the war. But the committee will also hold retrospective hearings, he said, to determine whether administration officials manipulated intelligence before the war and whether the post-invasion provisional government abused its contracting powers and wasted huge sums of money.

"There is a responsibility from a lessons-learned perspective and an accountability perspective to fill in the blanks," said Levin, who voted against authorizing the war in 2002. "And there have been a number of blanks." Some lower-level military personnel have been held accountable for matters such as detainee mistreatment, he said, "but almost none in the intelligence community."

Having Levin replace John W. Warner (R-Va.) as chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee will "hugely" change oversight, said Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), a longtime colleague. Rockefeller, incoming chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, also plans more aggressive hearings.

"Oversight doesn't have to be a hostile process," Rockefeller said. But he said he and Levin are determined to overcome the administration's long-standing refusal to hand over documents concerning the White House contention in 2002 and 2003 that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. "The public must understand that you can't do that," Rockefeller said.

Warner is not considered an administration apologist, but the committee's posture is certain to be more combative as soon as Levin assumes the chairmanship, colleagues and analysts said.

Levin "takes issues of oversight and hearings and authorization very seriously, and he guards very carefully the prerogatives of Congress," said Kurt Campbell, a former Pentagon official now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Levin will quiz military commanders on their advice about Iraq, Campbell said, and he will dig deeply into allegations of mismanagement and favoritism in the granting of contracts and plum jobs after the fall of Hussein.

"I think the Republicans will bristle at some of the things he wants to do," Campbell said, "because this really gets to the question of whether the previous Congress dropped the ball."

Levin plans to use his new powers in his long-running dispute with the Bush administration over the conduct of Douglas J. Feith, former undersecretary of defense for policy. Levin says Feith exaggerated the relationship between Hussein's government and al-Qaeda when the Bush administration was trying to build public support for the Iraq invasion.

The administration's repeated refusal to give Levin 58 documents related to Feith's activities is about to be tested. "We're entitled to those documents," Levin said. "If necessary, I intend to subpoena those documents."

Levin's House counterpart, incoming Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), also plans Iraq-related hearings. "His big priorities are support for our troops and their families; readiness, especially in the Army and Marine Corps; oversight; and Afghanistan, which he feels is the forgotten war," said his spokeswoman, Loren Dealy. "His concerns have been the lack of oversight in general. He feels it has not been adequate."

Levin said Iraq's future is his top priority. The situation "has got to be solved by the Iraqis politically," he said. "There is no military solution to it."

He said the 2003 invasion obligated the United States to help post-Hussein Iraq get back on its feet. "We have carried out that obligation," Levin said. "We've been there three years plus. We've given them the opportunity."

Levin said he plans later hearings on the abuses of Iraqi detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison and the treatment of terrorism suspects at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and elsewhere.

Under Warner, the committee showed some interest in those topics, Levin said, "but the subpoenas haven't gone out, obviously. We may have to issue subpoenas in that area as well."

Johnson Improving (SFAL)

By Faith Bremner

Sioux Falls Argus Leader, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Tim Johnson continued to make progress Friday in his recovery from a brain hemorrhage and surgery two days earlier.

The South Dakota Democrat was in critical but stable condition in the intensive care unit at George Washington University Hospital, according to his staff and doctors late Friday.

"Considering his initial presentation, his progress is encouraging," said Dr. Anthony Caputy, one of three neurosurgeons who operated on the senator Wednesday night to relieve pressure on the brain.

"He is now stabilized and continues to show signs of responsiveness to the medical staff and the family," Caputy said in the statement.

Patients with brain hemorrhages, such as the one Johnson had, typically experience post-operative brain swelling, Caputy said.

"Much like a bruise, it takes time to heal," Caputy said.

Doctors are monitoring the senator's progress with CT scans, the most recent of which was done Friday morning. That scan showed that the pressure on his brain is now normal and that there is no further bleeding, the statement said.

To prevent the risk of blood clots going to his lungs, doctors placed a special filter in a major vein Thursday night in a procedure done at his bedside. Johnson will stay in the hospital until his overall condition improves. He probably will undergo physical therapy because of weakness on his right side, the medical team said.Held his wife's hand

Johnson's wife, Barbara, said her husband was responding to her voice and following directions and that he had reached for her hand and held it. Johnson has also opened his eyes.

Johnson, a two-term Democrat, was diagnosed with congenital arteriovenous malformation (AVM), a condition that occurs when a tangle of blood vessels in the brain bypasses normal brain tissue and directly diverts blood from the arteries to the veins.

Over time, the veins can enlarge and bleed into the brain. Johnson probably was born with the condition.

His illness triggered a rash of speculation in the news media about what would happen to the Senate if Johnson were not able to serve.

The Senate is divided 51-49 in favor of the Democrats. If Johnson were to resign or die, and South Dakota's Republican governor were to appoint a Republican replacement, control of the Senate could shift to the GOP.

For the first time since Johnson was taken to the hospital Wednesday afternoon with stroke-like symptoms, his family and staff got some sleep Thursday night, said Julianne Fisher, a spokeswoman for Johnson.

South Dakotans also watched Johnson's progress closely this week.

Dan Christopherson, the mayor of Vermillion and a friend of Johnson's, said it was a shock to hear of Johnson's illness because he always appeared to be the picture of good health.

Chamberlain Lawyer Leonard Andera has known Johnson since the senator was a young man in Vermillion, and he said people in Chamberlain who know of his relationship with Johnson have asked him for updates.

"There's a lot of talk about the critical condition, but I just say, anytime they mess around with your brain, it's going to be critical for the first several hours, no matter how successful things are," Andera said.

Christopherson said: "I think if anyone can pull through this, it'd be Tim. He's a tough character."

Surgery "Considered A Success," Senator's Office Says (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

Wednesday's operation to stop bleeding in Sen. Tim Johnson's brain was "considered a success," his office said yesterday, although the few details released about his condition suggested he was not fully conscious two days after the procedure.

The statement quoted Anthony Caputy, one of the surgeons who performed the emergency surgery on Johnson (D-S.D.), as saying: "Considering his initial presentation, his progress is encouraging. He is now stabilized and continues to show signs of responsiveness to the medical staff and the family."

Johnson, 59, briefly became incoherent on Wednesday. He was rushed to George Washington University Hospital and diagnosed with an arteriovenous malformation, an unstable tangle of blood vessels in his brain. The malformation bled Wednesday night, and surgeons operated to stop the hemorrhage and remove a large clot that was pressing on his brain.

The pressure inside Johnson's brain is now normal and he has not bled further, the statement said. It noted that after events like his, the brain is often swollen.

"Much like a bruise, it takes time to heal," Caputy is quoted as saying.

Johnson's physicians also put a filter-like device in his inferior vena cava, the largest vein the body, which carries blood back to the heart from the legs, abdomen and chest. It will catch any clots that may form in his leg or pelvic veins and that could dislodge and travel to his lungs -- a potentially fatal event.

Such clots can form when a person is immobile for a long time. Normally, physicians give such patients the anticoagulant heparin to prevent clots. With Johnson's recent bleeding, however, that would be too risky.

Senator Showing Weakness After Surgery (NYT)

By Kate Zernike, Lawrence K. Altman

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15 — Senator Tim Johnson of South Dakota was showing weakness on his right side on Friday after surgery to relieve bleeding in his brain, his office said, and will remain in the hospital until the swelling in his brain goes down.

“The surgery was considered a success,” the office said in a statement.

Surgeons removed the blood during a procedure late Wednesday and stabilized the bleeding, the statement said, relieving the pressure on the brain.

Mr. Johnson, 59, remains in the intensive care unit at George Washington University Hospital in critical but stable condition.

“Considering his initial presentation, his progress is encouraging,” Dr. Anthony Caputy, the chairman of the hospital’s department of neurosurgery, said in the statement, adding that Mr. Johnson continues to show “signs of responsiveness” to hospital staff and his family.

Mr. Johnson, a Democrat, began to stutter Wednesday while on a conference call with reporters, then walked back to his office, aides said. After being examined by the Capitol physician, he was admitted to George Washington University Hospital with what his office called “the symptoms of a stroke.”

His illness raised the possibility that the Democrats might lose the 51-to-49 majority they are expecting to assume in the Senate that convenes in early January.

Doctors said the bleeding was caused by a rare tangling of the blood vessels in the brain, known as a congenital arteriovenous malformation. It affects about 300,000 Americans, but only in about one in 10 cases is there bleeding. About half of those with bleeding end up with almost imperceptible damage, doctors say, and about 10 percent to 20 percent suffer damage so severe they cannot function as they did before the bleeding.

Mr. Johnson’s doctors said the post-operative swelling of his brain was normal. They had done a CT scan of the brain Friday morning, they said, and it showed no further bleeding, but they said they would continue to monitor this for several days.

Mr. Johnson, who is right-handed, experienced significant weakness on the right side of his body from the stroke and will need long-term physical therapy to regain the function of his arm and leg, his office said.

Even if his condition improves rapidly, he may need such therapy to help regain the ability to walk, write, dress and get in and out of a car.

The right-sided weakness most likely indicates that the bleeding occurred in the left side of Mr. Johnson’s brain, doctors not connected with his case said.

Mr. Johnson's initial symptom from the stroke was apparently the speech difficulty he experienced while talking with reporters on Wednesday. Mr. Johnson is sedated, as is standard in care for his type of illness. If the speech difficulty continues after the sedation is lightened, Mr. Johnson may need speech rehabilitation, the statement indicated.

Mr. Johnson may also need further brain surgery because while the surgeons removed the blood that leaked from the malformation, they did not repair the malformation, according to the statement.

Senator Is Showing Signs Of Recovery (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson, whose emergency brain surgery this week raised the prospect of a shift in power in the Senate, showed signs of recovery Friday, his office said.

Considering the seriousness of the medical problem found in Johnson's brain, "his progress is encouraging," Dr. Anthony Caputy said in a statement released by the lawmaker's staff.

Caputy was a member of the team that operated on the 59-year-old South Dakotan on Wednesday night.

Johnson was experiencing post-surgery swelling in his brain, but that was considered routine. "Much like a bruise, it takes time to heal," Caputy said.

With Democrats having captured a 51-49 majority in the Senate that convenes in January, Johnson's condition has riveted Washington's political community.

Should Johnson die or resign from office, South Dakota's Republican governor has the authority to replace him. If he chose a Republican as a replacement, the Senate would be knotted at 50-50. Vice President Dick Cheney, the Senate's presiding officer, would break the tie, returning the chamber to Republican control. But news of Johnson's increasing alertness substantially quelled such speculation.

After becoming disoriented Wednesday, Johnson was rushed to George Washington University Hospital, where doctors performed emergency surgery to relieve bleeding in his head stemming from the congenital defect arteriovenous malformation.

AVM, as the condition is called, can lead to speech problems, paralysis or, in rare cases, death.

A CT scan performed on Johnson early Friday showed "that the pressure has been relieved from his brain, and there is no further bleeding," Dr. Vivek Deshmukh, the lead surgeon, said in the statement from the senator's office. "Currently, his brain pressures are normal," Deshmukh said.

Johnson's office has not disclosed the precise location of the tangle of arteries and veins that caused the bleeding, a critical factor in determining what kind of long-term effects he may suffer.

Johnson was complaining of weakness on his right side when he arrived at the hospital. Doctors said they anticipated that physical therapy would be part of his recovery process.

Democrats Arrive At The Heart Of The Matter (NYT)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

Washington

The Democrats are positioned to make a down payment to the voters who gave them majority control of the House and the Senate. Their ability to pay in full is another question.

House Democrats, more than their Senate colleagues, can set certain partisan markers: a minimum-wage hike, ethics reform, reduced student loan interest rates and changes in labor law, which will make union organizing less difficult.

As the majority, Democratic leaders and committee chairs can focus public attention on job, pension and health care security issues; publicize evidence of decreased mobility on the economic ladder; and spotlight the growing vulnerability of middle-income families to sharp and sudden downward financial swings.

The threat to the middle class is real. "I won by almost 13 points, with almost no newspaper endorsements, against an incumbent who had given out $1 billion in projects," says Sherrod Brown, a new senator for Ohio. "It was because of the strength of our message about the middle class."

So much for the down payment. After that, the going for the Democrats gets tougher. They will encounter two roadblocks: Republican chokeholds on federal spending, meant to "starve the beast" by radically depleting coffers, and intense internal Democratic policy conflicts.

Democrats on the House Budget and Appropriations Committees released a report early this month, titled The Republican Legacy, which describes the spending restrictions confronting them. The 110th Congress "will face a fiscal challenge of historic proportions. The cost of the Iraq war, coupled with the growing price tag of tax cuts passed over the previous six years, have left the nation deeper in debt than ever." (Since 2002, Congress has appropriated $379 billion for the Iraq war.)

One solution, raising taxes, is widely seen as a third rail for Democrats. "We are not talking about that now," said a spokesman for the incoming speaker, Nancy Pelosi.

The intraparty conflict pits its business and labor wings against each other on policies dealing with the international marketplace. Should lawmakers encourage the flow of cheap goods from China to stock the shelves of Wal-Mart, benefiting American shoppers, many of whom are low income? Or should policy be designed to protect American jobs and wages by raising trade barriers?

This split is profound. Barney Frank — echoing a large swath of his party — contends that this nation's "enormous economic power" could be used to stem the hemorrhage of services and production overseas. Trade agreements could be made contingent upon rules requiring that China and other countries abide by environmental and labor standards. "People greatly exaggerate the value of a cheap T-shirt," Frank says, upholding the position of organized labor and dismissing the argument that such goals are unattainable and unenforceable.

A leading Democratic proponent of free trade, who does not want to publicly engage the topic yet, has a counterargument, that China is moving full speed ahead, that "you cannot put labor provisions into a trade agreement with China. They'll walk away." That globalization is inexorable. That "we are either going to be inside the net or outside the net." That America needs to deal with dislocation effects and negative distribution consequences. He points out that Midwestern law firms are outsourcing research to India, that the U.S. needs a better education system, that Korea has a national broadband infrastructure, that Shanghai and Beijing airports are more modern than J.F.K., that key military agencies no longer support basic research.

He argues that chemical plants need security and that America needs universal health coverage. "There's a lot we can do to make it better," he says, like locating businesses in the U.S. in clusters around universities, and locating production closer to centers of "intellectual ferment." He is firm on one point: "We need to get back on track fiscally. We have to have higher revenue. Business is not supporting taxes. They rail against government spending. We don't have the means to pay for what we need."

This conflict goes to the heart of Democratic struggles to develop a credible economic policy. The Democrats have a two-year window in which to confront their internal schisms and to present a stronger face to the electorate in 2008.

Violence Builds Between Palestinian Factions (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, December 16, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 15 -- Rival Palestinian factions exchanged gunfire Friday in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, leaving more than 30 people wounded, as leaders from both parties warned of an escalation that could push the territories toward a deeper conflict.

The secular Fatah and Islamic Hamas movements, each with an armed wing, have been engaged in a political struggle for much of the year, but the latest unrest has been more brazen and regular than previous confrontations.

The day began with leaders of the governing Hamas movement accusing an influential Fatah lawmaker, Mohammed Dahlan, of orchestrating an outbreak of shooting at a border crossing the previous evening as Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh's convoy passed. The gunfire killed Haniyeh's bodyguard and wounded his son and a political adviser, among others.

"We joined this movement in order to be martyrs, not ministers," Haniyeh told tens of thousands of Hamas supporters gathered in Gaza City's Yarmouk Stadium for a rally celebrating the radical Islamic movement's 19th anniversary. "The Palestinian government will not remain with its hands tied in light of what happened."

Hours earlier, Hamas spokesman Ismail Radwan told reporters in Gaza that Dahlan "bears direct responsibility for the assassination attempt" against Haniyeh, who had been returning from an overseas trip cut short because of rising partisan violence in the territories.

The accusation came at the end of a week of partisan reprisals in Gaza, set off by the fatal shooting Monday of a Fatah-affiliated intelligence officer's three young sons. Fatah officials accused Hamas of carrying out the shooting. Hamas officials denied any involvement.

Leaders of the two parties have been negotiating for months to form a new power-sharing government acceptable to foreign donors, who cut off economic aid to the Palestinian Authority following Hamas's victory in January legislative elections.

Hamas has refused to recognize Israel's right to exist -- a key condition for the restoration of aid -- and is classified as a terrorist organization by the United States, the European Union and Israel.

The unity-government talks have recently broken down. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, a Fatah leader, signaled last week that he may call new general elections in hopes of resolving the crisis. He is scheduled to give a national address Saturday outlining his plans. The Hamas cabinet announced Friday that it would boycott the speech.

Hamas officials have said they will not accept new elections less than a year into their four-year term, and it is unclear whether Abbas has the legal authority to call for the vote. But Abbas has been reluctant to fire Haniyeh, which he has the power to do, for fear of exacerbating partisan tensions.

Fatah officials reacted angrily to Radwan's accusation, which preceded gunfights in Gaza City and in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Dahlan headed the Preventive Security Service in the 1990s during a crackdown on Hamas activists in the Gaza Strip. He is a powerful figure in Gaza and has many followers in the security services.

In an interview with the satellite channel al-Arabiya, Dahlan, who is also an Abbas confidant, said the accusations "are not worth answering."

Early Friday, Hamas activists rallied in the streets of Gaza for demonstrations marking the anniversary celebration. A Hamas-dominated security force had deployed across the city.

But gunfire broke out around the marchers, possibly from Fatah loyalists in the area. The shooting lasted several minutes, witnesses said, but there were no reports of casualties.

Around the same time, members of the Fatah-controlled security services in Ramallah moved against a Hamas anniversary march with clubs and shields, witnesses there said. Gunfire broke out soon after. Hospital officials said more than 30 people were wounded, most if not all of them from Hamas.

"What we are seeing is the beginning of an ugly civil war," Fatah lawmaker Saeb Erekat told reporters in Ramallah. He said Fatah would hold Hamas responsible for any attempt to harm Dahlan.

Palestinian Factional Strife Escalates Into Gunfights Between Fatah And Hamas (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, December 16, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 15 — The Palestinians seemed to edge toward open civil conflict on Friday as Hamas, the faction that controls the government, accused its rival, Fatah, of trying to assassinate the prime minister. Gunmen from the two factions clashed in the streets, wounding at least 30 men.

Fatah denied that it had tried to kill the prime minister, Ismail Haniya. But the accusation and shooting raised the stakes in the bitter confrontation between Fatah, the faction that is led by the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and controls branches of the security forces, and Hamas, the radical Islamic group in charge of most of the government.

“What a war, Mahmoud Abbas, you are launching, first against God and then against Hamas,” a Hamas leader, Khalil al-Hayya, told tens of thousands of Hamas supporters at a rally at a sports stadium in Gaza City.

Hamas staged rallies in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank to mark the 19th anniversary of its founding. The injuries occurred outside a mosque in Ramallah, in the West Bank.

In recent years Palestinian factions have periodically battled one another, but they have always stopped short of all-out confrontation. The violence and the heated oratory in recent days, though, have increased talk about such a confrontation, or even the possibility of a Palestinian civil war.

The clashes on Friday came on the eve of an important speech by Mr. Abbas, who was expected on Saturday to spell out his plan for ending months of political deadlock. Hamas said it would boycott the speech, to be delivered in Ramallah.

Friday’s events were an extension of a strange episode on Thursday, when Israel demanded the closing of the border between Egypt and the Gaza Strip to stop Mr. Haniya from returning to Gaza with tens of millions of dollars in cash after a tour of the Middle East.

Hamas officials have been secretly taking suitcases of cash into Gaza because Israel, the United States and the European Union have cut off the flow of money to the Palestinian government since Hamas came to power, saying it is a terrorist group.

On Friday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in an interview with [a news organization] that she planned to request tens of millions of dollars from Congress to help Mr. Abbas’s security forces.

The border standoff, which lasted seven hours, quickly turned into an internal Palestinian battle. Hamas gunmen stormed the Rafah border terminal in southern Gaza to support Mr. Haniya, who was stranded on the Egyptian side. The Hamas gunmen first clashed with the Palestinian security forces, who are loyal to Mr. Abbas. Later they battled Egyptian security forces on the other side of the frontier.

Mr. Haniya was eventually allowed to enter Gaza after leaving the money with Hamas officials who stayed behind in Egypt. As Mr. Haniya was leaving the border area in the back of a pickup truck, his convoy came under fire. In the truck, one bodyguard was killed and one of Mr. Haniya's sons and one of his political advisers were wounded.

At a news conference in Gaza City, Hamas alleged that Muhammad Dahlan, a powerful Fatah member of parliament and a former security chief in Gaza, was behind the shooting. "Muhammad Dahlan bears the direct responsibility for the assassination attempt which targeted the prime minister," said Ismail Radwan, a Hamas spokesman.

Mr. Dahlan already had an extremely tense relationship with Hamas. He was responsible for crackdowns against the group when he was in charge of the preventive security force in Gaza in the 1990s. Mr. Dahlan is from Gaza, the Hamas stronghold, but now spends much of his time in the West Bank.

He rejected the charge. "Hamas's allegations are simply a means of masking its failures towards the Palestinian people," Mr. Dahlan said. "The Hamas government is fully responsible for yesterday's events."

In Gaza City, Hamas gunmen waged a brief battle with security forces aligned with Fatah near Mr. Dahlan's home. No injuries were reported.

In his speech at the Hamas rally in Gaza City, Mr. Haniya described the shooting a day earlier. "When my convoy started moving there was fire from all over," he said. "The youths formed a human shield around me. Then this martyr fell directly next to me," a reference to his slain bodyguard.

Mr. Haniya said his government had the names of those involved, but he did not divulge them, and did not blame Fatah or any other group by name. "We are going to give these names to the minister of interior and we are going to implement the law," Mr. Haniya said.

In his remarks, Mr. Haniya said Hamas's achievements since its founding in 1987 included two uprisings against Israel and the withdrawal of Israeli soldiers and settlers from the Gaza Strip.

While he also noted Hamas's political successes in winning parliamentary elections and heading the government, he suggested that those were less important. "We have joined this movement to become martyrs and not ministers," he said, referring to the willingness of many Hamas members to die for their cause.

Friday's violence centered on Ramallah, where Hamas supporters tried to march to the city center following midday prayers at one of the main mosques. Security force members aligned with Fatah used batons to beat and push back demonstrators.

The security forces also fired into the air, and later into the crowd, according to witnesses. Hamas supporters threw stones and bottles. Several of the wounded suffered gunshot wounds.

The Hamas-Fatah tensions, and other internal Palestinian disputes, have been growing worse for months, and this week appeared to mark a new low, with several deadly shootings.

In an attack that outraged Palestinians, unidentified gunmen shot to death three brothers, ages 3 to 9, as they were being driven to school on Monday. The boys were the sons of a Fatah member, Baha Balousha, who holds a senior post in the security forces.

Mr. Abbas, meanwhile, faces the difficult task of trying to resolve the political standoff at a time of almost daily internal violence. After months of negotiations between Hamas and Fatah on a national unity government, he said recently that the talks had reached a dead end.

Aides to Mr. Abbas say the president has been considering a range of options. The Palestinian Basic Law, which effectively serves as a constitution, does not say exactly how such a political crisis may be resolved. One possibility, according to aides, is that Mr. Abbas could call a referendum on whether the Palestinians should hold new presidential and parliamentary elections.

The president has the power to dismiss the current Hamas government, but a new government would need approval by the parliament, which is dominated by Hamas. Mr. Abbas might call for new parliamentary elections, but Hamas says he does not have the power to do so.

Mr. Hayya, the Hamas leader who spoke at the Gaza City rally, said his faction would not accept a referendum or new elections. Hamas won parliamentary elections in January, and the parliament is supposed to sit for four years.

Hamas, Fatah Intensify Clashes (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, December 16, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Armed clashes intensified between rival Palestinian factions yesterday as Hamas accused Fatah fighters loyal to President Mahmoud Abbas of fomenting civil war and trying to assassinate Hamas Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh at a Gaza border station Thursday night.

DOJ_NMG_0107485

The latest violence threatened to undermine months of talks on a unity government between the Islamist Hamas party and Mr. Abbas' once-dominant Fatah to end a deadly power struggle within the Palestinian territories.

Security officers and Fatah militia men fired into a crowd of demonstrators carrying green Hamas banners through central Ramallah yesterday, wounding at least 31.

"What a war, Mahmoud Abbas, you are launching, first against God, and then against Hamas," said Hamas' parliamentary faction leader Khalil al-Hayya before a crowd of 100,000 Hamas supporters gathered at a Gaza rally.

Earlier in the day, Hamas spokesman Ismail Radwan accused Fatah strongman Mohammed Dahlan of attempting to assassinate Mr. Haniyeh as he returned to the Gaza Strip from a fundraising trip abroad. Fatah spokesmen denied the charges.

The spike in tensions came just a day before Mr. Abbas is scheduled to deliver a major speech that's expected to rebuke the Hamas-led Cabinet and raise the possibility of new elections.

"The Hamas movement bears full responsibility for any injury to a Palestinian citizen, Dahlan or others," said Saeb Erekat, a Palestinian negotiator who is an aide to Mr. Abbas.

The Hamas prime minister was delayed on the Egyptian side of the Rafah crossing point Thursday. Israel had shut the border to block Mr. Haniyeh from carrying tens of millions of dollars into the Gaza Strip. After about seven hours, Mr. Haniyeh was allowed to cross the border, but was forced to leave the money behind in Egypt.

On the Palestinian side of the border, Hamas gunmen forced their way past Mr. Abbas' presidential guard, which maintains security at the crossing, and shot up security cameras and computers in the terminal.

Once Mr. Haniyeh had emerged on the Palestinian side of the border terminal, his entourage came under a hail of gunfire that killed a bodyguard and wounded his son and his chief political adviser, Ahmed Yousef.

Addressing the Gaza rally of supporters yesterday, Mr. Haniyeh said the takeover of the border crossing by Hamas gunmen "signals the beginning of the rebellion to protect our honor and sovereignty. Foreign elements are deciding who comes in and who goes out." The prime minister added that Hamas joined the government to become "martyrs," not Cabinet ministers.

A U.S.-brokered agreement on the Rafah border station gives both Israel and monitors from the European Union the right to close the crossing on a temporary basis. But officers from Mr. Abbas' presidential guard are responsible for security -- a fact noted by Hamas officials who accused Fatah of an assassination attempt.

The clashes were just the latest developments in a week of Hamas-Fatah turmoil.

On Monday, three children under the age of 9 were killed in Gaza City in an apparent assassination attempt on their father, a Fatah loyalist and a top officer in the Palestinian military intelligence service. Two days later, a leader of Hamas' military wing was assassinated outside a court building in the southern Gaza town of Khan Younis.

Since coming to power in parliamentary elections in March, the Hamas government, which refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist, has faced a U.S.-backed international aid boycott that has left the government nearly bankrupt.

Mr. Haniyeh was just returning from a two-week trip abroad during which he got pledges of $250 million from Iran. Hamas' reign has been accompanied by steadily increasing chaos, especially in Gaza.

The prospect of Hamas breaking the boycott and strengthening its military wing is a cause for concern in Israel, the United States and allies in the region.

Tensions Rise Among Palestinians (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, December 16, 2006

JERUSALEM — Hamas officials Friday accused the rival Fatah party of trying to assassinate Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh during a burst of gunfire a night earlier, as fresh clashes injured more than 30 people in the West Bank and raised worries on both sides of a slide toward wider violence.

Amid rising tensions, the ruling Hamas movement deployed members of a special security force around a Gaza stadium as tens of thousands of supporters gathered to mark the anniversary of the radical Islamist group's founding in 1987. Before the event, rival gunmen in Gaza briefly exchanged gunfire but no one was hurt.

In the West Bank city of Ramallah, Palestinian riot police, armed with rifles and clubs, fired into the air and clashed with Hamas demonstrators who marched through downtown. The incident, during which at least 12 people were shot and others were beaten, followed a string of flare-ups this week that prompted both sides to warn of civil war.

The clashes and the accusations of an assassination attempt aimed at Haniyeh raised tensions as Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is scheduled to make a speech today about the worsening political deadlock.

But it remains unclear how Abbas, who belongs to Fatah, plans to resolve the impasse. Early elections, as urged by some in Fatah, would be seen by the elected Hamas government as tantamount to a coup attempt and could ignite worse violence.

In remarks to Hamas supporters Friday, Haniyeh appealed for unity among the Palestinian factions.

Hamas' allegations against Fatah marked a new level in the bitter war of words between the two groups, which have been locked in a struggle for power since Hamas won parliamentary elections in January.

Some Hamas officials charged that Mohammed Dahlan, a Fatah lawmaker and former security chief who holds sway over thousands of armed officers in Gaza, was to blame when Haniyeh's convoy was fired upon Thursday as the prime minister returned from Egypt. Dahlan oversees the Palestinian end of the U.S.-brokered agreement last year that sought to improve the flow of people and goods through Gaza's border crossings.

Ismail Radwan, a Hamas spokesman, called the shooting "an attempt at assassination" orchestrated by Dahlan.

Dahlan, who is considered close to Abbas and seen by some as a possible future Palestinian leader, denied the accusations and blamed Hamas for the disorder at the border crossing.

"Hamas' allegations are simply a means of masking its failures toward the Palestinian people," Dahlan said in a statement.

A bodyguard was killed and Haniyeh's son and a top political advisor were slightly injured during the incident.

Dozens of Palestinian militants stormed the border terminal and opened fire after Israel closed the crossing to block Haniyeh from returning with suitcases that held $35 million. The money was donations to the Palestinians that Israeli officials said was destined for use in terrorism. The Palestinian leader later was allowed to enter Gaza without the money, which was left in Egypt.

Abbas' Presidential Guard, which is responsible for security at the border crossing, denied targeting Haniyeh. The scene at the border terminal was described as pandemonium, with militants firing weapons and smashing windows, computers and other equipment.

Saeb Erekat, an Abbas aide and chief Palestinian negotiator, said that the allegations against Dahlan amounted to a death threat. Abbas on Friday ordered an investigation of the incident.

Abbas' aides have been saying for more than two weeks that he would address the fraying political situation. Erekat said Abbas would proceed despite tensions heightened by recent violence, including the fatal shootings in Gaza this week of three boys, all younger than 10, who were the sons of a Fatah intelligence official.

Abbas has said his attempts to reach agreement with Hamas on a power-sharing arrangement have hit a dead end. Aides said last week he was leaning toward calling early elections for parliament and the presidency.

But Hamas says Abbas lacks authority to call new elections for parliament, where it holds a majority of seats and therefore could veto a replacement government should Abbas sack the Hamas Cabinet. Hamas leaders say they would vigorously resist new elections.

Going to early elections would represent an act of desperation and a huge gamble for Abbas, who is viewed almost universally as a weak leader and vulnerable to being toppled by Hamas at the polls. A loss would leave Israel and the West with no one on the Palestinian side with whom to do business, because they consider Hamas a terrorist group and refuse to deal with it.

Abbas might well settle for a less-drastic step, such as urging new talks on a unity government while threatening elections if they fail. Or he could ask voters to decide whether to hold early elections.

Months of factional negotiations proved fruitless, mainly because of Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by past agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

Hamas is under pressure to meet those three conditions to end the months-old embargo on aid from the West. The aid cutoff, along with Israel's decision to withhold about $50 million monthly in tax revenue and customs duties, has been a blow to the Palestinian economy and left the government unable to fully pay its 165,000 employees.

Hamas Says Abbas Seeks War (FT)

By Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, December 16, 2006

Security forces loyal to President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah fired on a Hamas rally in the West Bank on Friday and firefights erupted between the rivals in Gaza, pushing the Palestinians closer to civil war.

“What a war Mahmoud Abbas you are launching, first against God, and then against Hamas,” senior Hamas leader Khalil al-Hayya told a Gaza City rally of 100,000 Hamas supporters, who fired their guns in the air and chanted “God is Greatest”.

At least 32 Hamas supporters in the West Bank city of Ramallah were wounded by gunfire from Abbas’s forces, hospital officials said. Several were in critical condition.

On Thursday Israel prevented Ismail Haniyeh, the Palestinian prime minister, from returning to Gaza in order to stop him bringing in cash possibly donated by Iran.

Reports said Mr Haniyeh, from the Hamas movement, was carrying $35m (€26.5m, £17.8m) in cash, believed to be part of the $350m he raised during a regional tour that took in Iran, Syria and Qatar. He was later allowed entry, but without the cash.

However, anger spilt over into violence following the order to close the Rafah terminal on the Gaza-Egypt border, given by Amir Peretz, Israeli defence minister.

The closure prompted about 2,000 Hamas supporters to storm the terminal where they had a gun battle with guards. Others used explosives to blow a gap in the concrete wall dividing Gaza and Egypt.

Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas legislator, said the closure "could lead the region to an explosion and the Zionist enemy and its allies will bear the responsibility for the consequences".

The European Union monitoring team at Rafah said its 16 staff were evacuated and safe.

Hamas members have carried about $80m in cash into Gaza since March, when the west imposed an aid boycott aimed at bringing down the Islamic movement but which has increased poverty across the occupied territories.

The clashes at Rafah came as Hamas supporters threatened to defy any call for new elections that Fatah's Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian Authority president, may make in a speech tomorrow.

Months of negotiations between Fatah and Hamas for a national unity government have foundered, along with hopes for an easing of the western boycott. But Hamas and independent analysts say Mr Abbas has no legal authority to call early elections.

Mr Haniyeh cut short his trip abroad to deal with the internal turmoil. Hamas to-day plans to celebrate the 19th anniversary of its foundation with marches and demonstrations in Gaza.

There were clashes in Gaza and the West Bank this week after Fatah blamed Hamas for the shooting dead on Monday of three young boys who were the sons of an intelligence official loyal to Mr Abbas.

Hamas, Fatah Clash In Deepening Violence (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 16, 2006

Gunmen allied with Hamas and Fatah clashed at a West Bank mosque and in Gaza Strip streets on Friday, as violence spread to areas of the Palestinian territories normally untouched by factional strife.

Hamas accused a Fatah leader of orchestrating the previous day's attack on Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh — and a Hamas politician appeared to call for the Fatah strongman's assassination. Leaders of both groups have warned that the violence threatens to degenerate into civil war.

The clashes in Gaza City and the West Bank town of Ramallah marred celebrations Friday marking the 19th anniversary of Hamas' founding. However, the Islamic militant group pushed ahead with its rallies, and about 70,000 loyalists gathered at a stadium in Gaza City, cheering wildly, sobbing and firing in the air when Haniyeh arrived flanked by more than 50 armed bodyguards.

"We joined this movement to become martyrs, not ministers," Haniyeh declared in a fiery speech, referring to Hamas loyalists' willingness to die for the Islamic cause.

He then left for an emergency session of the Hamas-led Cabinet, called to discuss the escalating unrest.

The fighting Friday in the normally peaceful city of Ramallah began when Hamas supporters tried to march toward the town center, where Fatah-allied police had deployed to prevent a planned Hamas celebration.

Police formed a cordon around a Hamas mosque to prevent those inside from marching, then beat them with clubs and fired their rifles in the air when the activists tried to leave. The marchers fought back, throwing stones and bottles at the police, some of whom fired into the crowd.

Thirty-two people were wounded by stones and gunfire, hospital officials said.

In Gaza City, masked Hamas gunmen waged battle with Fatah-allied police near a security post.

The showdown, a block from the home of Mohammed Dahlan, broke out shortly after Hamas accused the Fatah strongman of orchestrating the attack on Haniyeh on Thursday at the Gaza-Egypt border terminal.

The latest round of fighting erupted Monday with a drive-by shooting that killed the three young sons of a Fatah security official and continued Wednesday with the gangland-style execution of a Hamas judge.

On Thursday, Haniyeh rushed home from a trip abroad to try to quell the violence.

But Israel ordered the Rafah crossing closed to keep Haniyeh from bringing in an estimated $35 million he had collected abroad to help alleviate the Palestinian financial crisis. Israeli officials said Haniyeh could return to Gaza without the money, which it said was to be used for terror attacks. Maria Telleria, spokeswoman for European monitors at the crossing, said Haniyeh left the funds in Egypt.

Israeli Deputy Defense Minister Ephraim Sneh told Israel's Army Radio that government officials made the right decision not to let Haniyeh bring the money into Gaza, adding that if Haniyeh had been killed, "I wouldn't put up a mourning tent."

While Haniyeh was delayed at the crossing, angry Hamas militants stormed the border terminal and fought with security forces stationed there who are loyal to President Mahmoud Abbas, Fatah's leader.

When Haniyeh finally crossed, unidentified men began firing toward him. One of his bodyguards was killed and his son and 26 others were wounded.

At the bodyguard's funeral, Khalil al-Hayeh, head of the Hamas bloc in parliament, told mourners that Dahlan was trying to instigate a coup against the government and appeared to call for his assassination.

Al-Hayeh exhorted the crowd to "get us the plotters of the coup."

"We will, we will," the crowd replied.

Dahlan said the allegations were an attempt by Hamas leaders "to mask their sweeping failure to manage Palestinian political and social life."

Various other Hamas officials accused Palestinian collaborators with Israel, Abbas and the U.S. of involvement in the shooting.

The violence came amid a political deadlock between Abbas and the Hamas-led Cabinet and parliament following failed efforts to form a unity government. Abbas hoped such a government would end crippling international economic sanctions imposed on the Palestinian Authority after Hamas won January elections.

Hamas, responsible for dozens of deadly suicide bombings in Israel, is listed as a terror group by the U.S. and European Union.

Abbas, a relative moderate, was to address the Palestinians on Saturday on his plans for ending the impasse and was expected to threaten early elections. A call for new elections, which Hamas says is illegal, would likely further inflame the situation.

US To Beef Up Lebanese Army Amid Crisis (AFP)

AFP, December 16, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Washington was considering a financial package to beef up the military of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, who has expressed fears of an attempted Syrian-backed coup.

"We are still working out the details of what we can do to support the army," Rice said in an interview published in The Washington Post Friday.

In addition, she said, the Bush administration needed to have consultations with Congress over the package.

"But we have wanted very much to support the reform of the Lebanese armed forces, the reequipping of the Lebanese armed forces," Rice said as supporters of the Syrian-backed Shiite militant group Hezbollah and its Christian allies continued mass demonstrations in Beirut against Siniora's Western-backed government.

Syria was the powerbroker in Lebanon for nearly three decades. It was forced to withdraw its troops from Lebanon last year amid a public outcry over the murder of former premier Rafiq Hariri, widely blamed on Syria, a charge Damascus denies.

Lebanon's pro-Syrian political opposition now wants to bring down Siniora's government over demands for greater power sharing, seen by the government as a ploy to reassert Syrian influence in the country.

The United States and European Union have warned Iran and Syria against meddling in the affairs of their neighbors.

"It's not just the package that we would put forward, but it's also the package that I think others are prepared to, including the mainstream Arab states are prepared to contribute to," Rice said.

"Because ultimately that's one of the most important things that you can do is to strengthen the Lebanese armed forces probably not to replace the United Nations forces for some time, but to be more capable themselves of defending the country and providing a stable platform," she said.

She said she could not give details of the aid package.

The United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) is deployed near the border with Israel, tasked with backing up the Lebanese army under a UN accord which ended hostilities between Israel and Hezbollah on August 14.

Cubans Freed After Second Keys Landing

By LAURA WIDES-MUNOZ

Associated Press Writer

MIAMI_A group of Cuban refugees was released Saturday, a day after landing, some for the second time in a year, at a derelict bridge in the Florida Keys that authorities initially said wasn't U.S. soil.

Among them was 14-year-old Osniel Hernandez, who headed to the home of his mother, Mariela Conesa, in the Miami suburb of Hialeah. They hadn't seen each other since she boarded a homemade raft in 1998.

"I feel happy, very happy because I finally get to be with my mother," a shy Osniel said Saturday after spending the morning at his mother's apartment in the Miami suburb of Hialeah.

The boy, his father and 14 other Cuban immigrants arrived in the Florida Keys early Friday in a makeshift boat.

In January, the boy and his father, Marino Hernandez, were among 15 immigrants who were sent back to Cuba because U.S. officials said the abandoned bridge they'd reached didn't count as American soil.

Under the U.S. government's wet-foot, dry-foot policy, Cuban immigrants picked up at sea are sent back to the island, while those who touch U.S\l "l". soil are generally allowed to stay.

Conesa and other relatives sued, and a federal judge ruled against the Department of Homeland Security's decision. Officials agreed to provide the group visas, but by then Osniel and the others were back home and the Cuban government said it wouldn't allow them to leave for four more years.

Among the group to return was Tomas Perdomo, 43, a Cuban dissident with the Independent Movement for an Alternative Option. He said he'd tried to explain to U.S. authorities about his political activities in January, but his efforts were in vain.

Conesa said never imagined it would take so long to be reunited with her son.

In 1998, Conesa and Hernandez had separated amicably and she'd planned to take Osniel _ then 6 years old _ with her on the raft she and a dozen others had built, but at the last minute the organizers said no children would be allowed on the voyage.

"I cried all the way from my house to the beach," Conesa recently recalled. "I didn't want to go. I didn't want to leave my son."

Conesa recalled the night last January when Osniel reached the abandoned Old Seven Mile Bridge and spoke to her by cell phone.

"He got on the phone and said, 'Don't cry, Mama. I'm OK.' That's when I realized he had grown up."

After that call, she waited until dawn to drive to the bridge, but by then the group had been picked up by the Coast Guard.

Immigrants sue government to get green cards faster: Immigration: Overload of requests for employment visas after 9/11 causes massive delays

Judy Gibbs Robinson

The Daily Oklahoman

Desperation drove Chao Li to sue the U.S. government this fall.

For more than two years, the Chinese doctor had been waiting to become a legal permanent resident of the United States. Until he got his green card, he could not apply for grants -- vital to his career as a researcher at the University of Oklahoma Health Sciences Center. Changing jobs was out of the question under terms of his employment-based visa.

Every time Li called to check on the delay, U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services officials said they were waiting for an FBI name check.

"I was so desperate. I had no idea what to do," Li said.

The Internet provided the answer. On Web sites run by and for immigrants, Li learned how to file a lawsuit that might expedite his application. He downloaded a form, and in the space above the word "defendant," he carefully printed "Michael Chertoff," secretary of the U.S. Department of Homeland Security.

Li filed the suit Sept. 29. A month later, he had his green card.

Faced with long waits caused by a backlog of applications, more and more immigrants are following Li's path, using the courts to nudge U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, a unit of Homeland Security, to process stalled requests. In U.S. District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma alone, at least 30 cases against Chertoff were filed in 2006, including Li's, court records show.

Such lawsuits seek what is called a "writ of mandamus" -- a court order requiring a government\l "l" agency or official to perform a duty, in this case, to process an application. The order does not require a favorable outcome for the immigrant -- only that he gets an answer one way or the other.

T. Douglas Stump, a national board member for the American Immigration Lawyers Association, has filed 18 such cases in Oklahoma, mostly for highly skilled medical researchers.

"Every case to date has resulted in action: Either they've been granted green cards or naturalization," Stump said.

Background checks

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services are blamed for delays in processing immigration applications. But local immigration lawyers say the fault usually is with the FBI, which conducts security checks on every would-be immigrant to weed out criminals, drug traffickers and people with links to terrorism.

The requirement, introduced after Sept. 11, 2001, nearly doubled the number of names immigration officials submitted annually and created a huge backlog at the FBI.

"The sudden need for data overloaded the system years ago. We're still dealing with the result," Stump said.

In May, immigration officials reported 235,802 FBI name checks pending. Sixty-five percent of those had been pending for 90 days or more, and 35 percent had been pending for a year or more, the report said.

The initial check takes about two weeks, and 80 percent of cases are cleared in that time, according to immigration service documents. Most others are resolved within six months. But in less than 1 percent of cases, it takes the agency six months or longer to determine whether the immigration applicant is a threat to the country, the agency says.

"Unfortunately, if you're in that 1 percent ... odds are it could be two to three years," Stump said.

The wait is more than an inconvenience for foreign medical researchers such as Li. Researchers often depend on grants from the National Science Foundation and other entities that award money only to citizens or legal permanent residents.

"It's not like these foreign nationals are just eager-beaver to go to court. They have a compelling need to seek the relief," Stump said.

'There is a shortage'

While the United States must take care deciding who gets into the country, delays approving top-flight researchers could be against the country's best interests, said Stephen M. Prescott, president of the Oklahoma Medical Research Foundation, where 44 percent of 143 top-level researchers are here on visas.

Could the foundation get by without foreign nationals?

"Absolutely not," Prescott said. "The fact is our education system has not produced a sufficient amount of laboratory technicians, scientists and engineers."

While foreign-born individuals make up about 8 percent of the U.S. population, they make up 23 percent of the doctorate-level scientists and engineers, according to a National Science Foundation report.

The OU Health Sciences Center, where Li works, could not provide exact numbers but has "several dozen" foreign-born researchers and doctors, said Dewayne Andrews, vice president for health affairs and executive dean of the OU College of Medicine.

Andrews described the foreign-born researchers as dedicated and hard-working scientists whose presence enhances OU's scientific work while adding an international flavor to the campus.

"Can we function without them? Yes. But there is a shortage of individuals in this country to work in certain areas," Andrews said.

So far, the United States has enough prestige to attract foreign researchers despite the hassles some face getting visas. But as other countries roll out the welcome mat, that could change, Prescott said.

"If we don't get them someone else will," he said.

That 'unlucky guy'

Li does not know why the FBI name check stalled his application, but the delay left him frustrated and depressed.

"I needed this green card. I wanted to apply grant. I want to have better job. A visa have so many restrictions," said Li, who speaks English as a second language.

He came to Oklahoma on a student dependent visa in 2000. The Oklahoma Medical Research Foundation sponsored him for a temporary worker's visa that allowed him to stay for up to six years.

In 2003, Li moved from the foundation to the OU Health Sciences Center, which agreed to sponsor him for legal permanent residency.

When that application was approved in April 2004, Li filed another form to get his green card and began to settle down. Twenty-nine months elapsed before Li turned to the courts.Now that he has his green card, Li said he understands the need for background checks.

"I understand. I just don't want to be that unlucky guy," Li said.

Shiite Muslin couple settles suit with NIOSH

MORGANTOWN, W.Va._A Muslim couple has settled its lawsuit against the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health.

Terms of the settlement were not released.

Attorneys for Aliakbar and Shahla Afshari and the U.S. Department of Justice declined to say anything other than that the case had been settled.

No settlement agreement has yet been filed with the U.S. District Court in Clarksburg, either.

In the lawsuit filed in December 2004, the Afsharis said they were illegally fired in May 2004 from their jobs at NIOSH's Morgantown facility because of their religious beliefs and national origin. The Afsharis are Shiite Muslims and natives of Iran.

They were fired after failing a secret background investigation of employees from countries considered a threat to the United States, even though they passed previous background checks when they were hired.

Aliakbar Afshari studied the health effects of welding and asphalt fumes, and hand and arm vibrations.

Shahla Afshari worked in a laboratory that researched sensitivity to chemicals in the workplace, such as allergic reactions to latex gloves.

Commentary: The Bush Administration Wins a Round on Military Commissions, But the District Court Ruling May Have a Silver Lining for Detainees

By MICHAEL C. DORF

Last summer, the Supreme Court of the United States handed Salim Ahmed Hamdan--who stands accused of serving as the driver and bodyguard of Osama Bin Laden--a stunning victory. The President, the Court said in Hamdan's case, acted in violation of federal law in authorizing the trial of Guantanamo Bay detainees by military commission.

Last week, U.S. District Judge James Robertson took Hamdan's victory away. Or, to be more precise, Judge Robertson ruled that Congress had acted within constitutional limits when it enacted the Military Commissions Act (MCA) of 2006, and that the MCA had taken Hamdan's victory away. Should Judge

Robertson's decision be upheld on appeal, the way will be cleared for trials of Guantanamo Bay detainees by military commission.

Hamdan's latest setback may suggest that his Supreme Court victory last June was in vain. As I explain below, however, Judge Robertson's opinion contains at least two important limits on executive detention. First, it makes clear that the courts have a say in deciding whether Congress is constitutionally entitled to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. Second, it implies that detainees who are not given adequate military hearings retain a constitutional right to file for habeas corpus relief.

The District Court Ruling in a Nutshell

Judge Robertson's opinion itself provides a useful summary of the ruling. The case, he wrote, presented three questions:

> (1) As a matter of statutory interpretation and construction, did Congress actually succeed in removing our statutory habeas jurisdiction over the detainee habeas cases? (2) If so, is the Military Commissions Act a constitutionally valid "suspension" of the writ of habeas corpus within the meaning of the Suspension Clause, U.S. Const. art. I § 9 cl. 2? (3) If not, and if a "constitutional" writ of habeas corpus survives the Military Commissions Act, does Hamdan have a right to seek such a writ?

"The answers to these questions," Judge Robertson concluded, "are 'yes' to number (1) and 'no' to numbers (2) and (3)."

In other words, the court found that: (1) the MCA eliminated habeas corpus for alien enemy combatant detainees; (2) in doing so, the MCA cannot be constitutionally justified pursuant to the emergency power of Congress to suspend the writ of habeas corpus; but (3) the MCA's elimination of this category of habeas jurisdiction is nonetheless constitutionally valid. Let us examine these conclusions in turn.

Application of the MCA to Pending Cases

Column continues below ↓

The Detainee Treatment Act (DTA) of 2005 eliminated habeas review for Guantanamo Bay detainees, but the Act's language did not make perfectly clear whether it applied to cases that had already been filed in the federal courts at the time it went into effect. The majority in the Supreme Court's Hamdan case said that the DTA did not apply to previously-filed cases, and thus allowed Hamdan's case, as well as the cases of just about every other Guantanamo Bay detainee, to go forward, despite the DTA.

Congress responded by making the MCA applicable "to all cases, without exception, pending on or after the date of the enactment of [the MCA] which relate to any aspect of the detention, transfer, treatment, trial, or conditions of detention of an alien detained by the United States since September 11, 2001." However, Hamdan's lawyers argued that because this language did not specifically refer to "habeas" cases, it only eliminated jurisdiction for other kinds of cases.

Judge Robertson found that "all" means "all," including habeas cases. Many of us civil libertarians don't particularly like that result--both because of the importance of the role habeas petitions play in checking executive power, and because changing the law for pending cases violates the spirit, though not the letter, of the principle that legislatures should not interfere with cases once they are in the courts. (In this latter regard, the retroactive nature of the MCA bears an uncomfortable resemblance to the extraordinary legislation Congress enacted to benefit the relatives of Terri Schiavo who sought to continue her medical treatment.)

But those are reasons why the application of the MCA to pending cases is unwise or even unconstitutional. The statute's actual words leave very little doubt that Congress in fact intended the jurisdiction-stripping provision to apply to pending cases.

Suspension of the Writ?

Given that the MCA eliminates habeas for people like Hamdan, the question becomes whether that elimination is constitutional. One way in which it might be valid is pursuant to the power of Congress to suspend habeas corpus in response to "rebellion or invasion." But, Judge Robertson said, no rebellion or invasion existed when Congress enacted the MCA.

That is an interesting conclusion for at least three reasons. First, Judge Robertson did not need to address the suspension question at all--but nevertheless chose to do so. As noted above and explained more fully below, Judge Robertson concluded that Hamdan had no right to habeas, even if the writ were not validly suspended. His entire discussion of the power of Congress to suspend the writ was thus not necessary to the case. It was arguably what lawyers call "dicta."

Second, in finding that no rebellion or invasion existed, Judge Robertson implicitly rejected an argument the Administration has sometimes advanced--namely, that it is solely for Congress, rather than the courts, to determine whether the constitutional predicates for suspension exist. Congress might, after all, have thought that the conflict in Afghanistan was simply part of the armed response to the attacks of September 11, 2001, which could be deemed an "invasion."

That argument is, to be sure, weak on the merits. Congress has the power to suspend the writ in cases of invasion, where, in the words of the Constitution, "the public safety may require it." But no exigency now prevents the civilian courts from functioning.

Nonetheless, some argue, Congress alone gets to decide whether the factual predicate for a suspension exists. They say that the issue is, in lawyers' jargon, a "political question" that the courts are not qualified to answer. Judge Robertson had so little regard for this argument that he did not even address it. The closest he came to considering it was in his conclusion that Congress itself apparently did not think it was suspending the writ, because it made no findings that a rebellion or invasion warranting suspension existed.

That, in turn, brings us to the third interesting feature of Judge Robertson's suspension ruling. In finding that Congress did not purport to suspend habeas, the judge tacitly resolved another important question: whether a valid suspension of the writ requires Congress to state expressly that it is suspending habeas.

In general, the courts do not require Congress to specify what power or powers it is invoking when it passes legislation. However, because suspension of the writ of habeas corpus is such a serious measure, some civil libertarians, including Hamdan's lawyers, have argued that Congress should not be presumed to exercise that power unless it expressly so states. Judge Robertson appears to have accepted this argument.

Do Aliens Outside the United States Have a Constitutional Right to Habeas?

Even if the writ has not been suspended, however, the residual right to habeas corpus does not protect all persons in all places. In particular, the Supreme Court's 1950 decision in Johnson v. Eisentrager held that an enemy combatant who has never been in the United States, and who is held outside the territory of the United States, has no right to file a habeas corpus petition in a U.S. court.

Complicating matters further, in the 2004 case of Rasul v. Bush, the Supreme Court held that the statutory portion of the Eisentrager decision had been superseded. The Justices accordingly found that, as a matter of statutory interpretation, Guantanamo Bay detainees could file habeas corpus petitions. Of course, the MCA amends the very statute in question, making clear that Guantanamo Bay (and other enemy combatant) aliens cannot file habeas petitions. Accordingly, the third question Judge Robertson had to address was whether Hamdan's case now falls within Eisentrager's constitutional rule that aliens outside the U.S. lack habeas rights.

There are reasons to think it does not. The Court in Rasul based its ultimate holding on statutory interpretation, but in the course of its analysis, the Court also suggested that there are important constitutional differences between the prisoners in Eisentrager and the Guantanamo Bay detainees. Here is the critical language that the Rasul Court used to distinguish Eisentrager:

> They [the Guantanamo detainees] are not nationals of countries at war with the United States, and they deny that they have engaged in or plotted acts of aggression against the United States; they have never been afforded access to any tribunal, much less charged with and convicted of wrongdoing; and for more than two years they have been imprisoned in territory over which the United States exercises exclusive jurisdiction and control.

Judge Robertson's opinion finds these distinctions irrelevant. He says that the history of habeas corpus shows that it is not available to alien enemy combatants outside the United States, even if held in a territory over which the U.S. exercises exclusive control. This argument is not entirely persuasive, however, because presumably the Supreme Court was aware of the history of habeas when it nonetheless listed the location and duration of detention as significant factors that might distinguish the facts of Rasul from those of Eisentrager.

Judge Robertson also relies on another factor that, in his view, makes Hamdan's case constitutionally indistinguishable from Eisentrager. Like Eisentrager, Hamdan will in fact have access to a tribunal--namely, the military commission that will try him. Whether that factor alone is enough to make a constitutional difference will undoubtedly be hotly contested on appeal.

The Hidden Habeas-Protective Element in Judge Robertson's Ruling

Because Hamdan is one of the relatively small number of alien detainees whom the Administration intends to put on trial, Judge Robertson had no occasion to address the most draconian aspect of the MCA: Its elimination of habeas corpus for aliens--even if they are in the United States--who have been declared unlawful enemy combatants, either by the President's unilateral action or by a so-called Combatant Status Review Tribunal ("CSRT").

The MCA provides for civilian judicial review of CSRT determinations, but nowhere requires the Administration to use a CSRT or its equivalent in order to declare some alien an unlawful enemy combatant. There can be little doubt that an alien held without any sort of a hearing should be constitutionally entitled to habeas.

But even in a case in which the government uses a CSRT to find that an alien is an unlawful enemy combatant, Judge Robertson's opinion suggests that the alien could attack that tribunal as inadequate. CSRTs permit determinations based on classified information that the alien does not receive. If a court were to find that a CSRT is not a sufficiently reliable process for determining an alleged enemy combatant's status, then the rule of Eisentrager would not apply, and the alien would be entitled to habeas corpus after all.

Moreover, because the Administration is currently detaining many more aliens than it intends to try by military commission, the implication that detainees never scheduled for trial do have a constitutional right to habeas may ultimately be a more important result than the conclusion that aliens who will be scheduled for a military trial lack such a constitutional right.

U.S. ambassador claims Arar still a security threat

OTTAWA Canadian PressFRONT

The U.S. ambassador to Canada says Maher Arar is still considered a threat to the United States and will remain on a security watchlist, despite the findings of a Canadian inquiry.

"The decision to remove Mr. Arar from the United States in 2002 was made by U.S. officials based on our own independent assessment of the threat to the United States," David Wilkins said in a statement yesterday.

U.S. officials had other sources of information about Arar beyond that provided by the RCMP, and continue to regard Arar as a potential threat, Wilkins said.

The ambassador noted that Justice Dennis O'Connor, head of a recent inquiry that determined the RCMP gave the U.S. false information about Arar, acknowledged he did not know about everything in Arar's American file.

O'Connor's inquiry found no evidence linking Arar to terrorism, but the U.S. continues to deny him clearance to enter the country or even fly over U.S. airspace. It was the first formal acknowledgment from Washington that the U.S. government remains suspicious of Arar.

"Mr. Arar's original removal from the United States in 2002 was based on information from a variety of sources, as is his current watchlist status," Wilkins said in his statement.

NDP Leader Jack Layton urged the prime minister to intervene to have Arar's name stripped from the Americans' border watch list.

"This is simply not right," Layton told a news conference. "There is no evidence that Mr. Arar's name should be on such a list. We held a whole inquiry here in Canada on this question.

"The prime minister must do everything he possibly can to correct this situation because otherwise it sends out the message that the Canadian government does not stand behind its own citizens."

O'Connor determined that U.S. authorities were likely acting on misguided RCMP evidence in 2002 when they deported Arar to Damascus, where the Syrian-born Canadian was tortured into false confessions of terrorist involvement. But Wilkins' statement yesterday suggests the RCMP information did not necessarily tip the balance against Arar.

The Mounties have since apologized for their mistake. Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli resigned after giving a Commons committee conflicting evidence on what he knew about the Arar case and when he knew it.

Wilkins refused to elaborate further on the evidence U.S. authorities may have against Arar, citing a lawsuit Arar has launched against the U.S. government. The ambassador, however, pointed out the lawsuit was dismissed at the trial level, although it is currently under appeal.

Whatever that evidence may be, it didn't come from the U.S. State Department, said department spokesperson Sean McCormack.

"The terror watchlist is managed here by the U.S. government. There's a lot of different inputs to it," McCormack said in response to questions at the department's daily briefing.

"I can tell you, it's not a State Department input that has resulted in his still being on the list."

The New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, a non-profit group dedicated to protecting and advancing the rights guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, came to Arar's defence yesterday.

"That the United States would have the gall to keep Maher on a watch list, implying that he poses a threat to this country, is outrageous although not surprising since this administration is unwilling to admit its mistakes and still tries to conceal them," said the group's attorney, Maria LaHood.

"The real threat to the U.S. is our government's utter disregard for the rule of law and for the truth, which Maher has had the courage to stand up and expose."

Added executive director Vincent Warren: "After disappearing an innocent man, robbing him of his humanity and destroying his life, the U.S. government owes Maher Arar an apology. What happened to Mr. Arar should never happen to another human being."

Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day said last week he didn't know whether Arar was still on the watchlist, telling a Commons committee he had recently posed the question to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. He said he was told it was Arar's responsibility to find out for himself.

A spokesperson for Day said the minister also wrote Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff requesting the U.S. remove Arar from its list.

Arar has called for full accountability from Canadian officials involved in his detention.

He has also sued officials from the RCMP, CSIS, Foreign Affairs and others in senior government positions for their alleged role in his deportation and detention in Syria. The lawsuit seeks $37 million in compensation for "extraordinary injury."

Editorial: U.S. should put up or shut up on Arar

It's disappointing to hear from the Americans that they're not yet ready to remove the name of Maher Arar from that country's security watchlist.

The announcement effectively means Arar can't so much as set foot in the U.S. unless he wants to find himself in trouble with the authorities. Can't go there on vacation, can't attend a conference. Heck, he can't even legally be on a plane flying through American airspace.

Not that he might be in any hurry to go back to the U.S., considering his experience the last time his plane set down there.

Faster than you can say "passport please," Arar was yanked away from his family and placed on a charter flight to Damascus, where the Syrian-born Canadian was tortured into false confessions of involvement with al-Qaida.

A Canadian inquiry has recently concluded there was no evidence linking Arar to terrorism, and he is seeking a huge financial settlement from the government of Canada for RCMP errors that Arar says helped send him on his fateful journey.

As last week wound to an end, however, the U.S. ambassador to Canada said Arar is still considered a threat to the U.S. and will remain on a security watch-list, despite the findings of the Canadian inquiry.

“The decision to remove Mr. Arar from the United States in 2002 was made by U.S. officials based on our own independent assessment of the threat to the United States,” David Wilkins said in a statement.

That’s disturbing because, either the Americans are just being stubborn, or they know something that our own security services ought to be let in on.

Ever the diplomat, NDP Leader Jack Layton wasted no time ripping into the Americans as the weekend began, urging Prime Minister Stephen Harper to intervene to have Arar’s name stripped from the Americans’ border watchlist.

“This is simply not right,” Layton told a news conference. “There is no evidence that Mr. Arar’s name should be on such a list. We held a whole inquiry here in Canada on this question.”

Layton got it half right. Harper or Public Security Minister Stockwell Day ought to demand from the Americans that they either come clean about additional evidence they have against Arar, or if they have none, drop his name from the watchlist.

To do otherwise smacks of harassment, and the poor man has suffered enough of that.

TERRORISM NEWS:

ACLU Allowed Access To Document On Detainee Photos. The New York Times (12/19, Liptak, 1.16M) reports federal prosecutors in New York withdrew a subpoena to the American Civil Liberties Union seeking to retrieve copies of a classified document. In what is describes as "an opaque and defensive four-page letter" prosecutors "said they were acting 'in light of changed circumstances' and their determination that 'the grand jury can obtain the evidence necessary to its investigation from other sources.' Another factor may have played a role. A transcript of a closed hearing in the case that was unsealed yesterday suggested the government was going to lose."

The Washington Post (12/19, Barnes, 690K) reports that the ACLU "hailed the government's retreat as a victory." ACLU executive director Anthony D. Romero: "The Bush administration's attempt to suppress information using the grand jury process was truly chilling and is unprecedented in law and in our history as an organization." However, the Post writes, "the Justice Department said, in effect, that the ACLU had instigated the fight and had told the government that filing the subpoena would be the first step toward the ACLU turning over the document." The Post adds, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department had tried to handle the matter in a way that was as 'amicable, cooperative and as unobtrusively as possible.'"

The AP (12/19, Neumeister) reports, "The document _ marked "secret" in bold but small print on the top of its first page _ described when and how the military Public Affairs Office permits the media to photograph enemy prisoners of war and detainees in Iraq. It was dated more than a year after the release of pictures of American soldiers tormenting Iraqi detainees at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq."

The New York Sun (12/19, Gerstein) reports, "The government's decision to relent may have been influenced by comments the judge assigned to the case, Jed Rakoff, made at a hearing last week. 'There seems to be a huge difference between investigating a wrongful leak of a classified document and demanding back all copies of it,' the judge said, according to a transcript unsealed yesterday. 'I'm old enough to remember a case called the Pentagon Papers.'"

In an editorial, the Washington Post (12/19, A28, 690K) opines, "the government has wisely backed down from its effort to misuse its subpoena power to force the American Civil Liberties Union to turn over a classified document. The subpoena has been withdrawn and the document released. It turns out to have been an entirely innocuous memo outlining rules about photographing prisoners of war and detainees in Iraq. And that leaves two questions: Why in the world was this document classified in the first place? And why in the world did the government take the unprecedented step of using the grand jury process to try to retrieve 'any and all copies' of the memo?"

Judge Orders Padilla To Undergo Mental Competency Evaluation. The AP (12/19, Anderson) reports that a federal judge "ordered a mental exam Monday to determine whether Jose Padilla — charged with being part of a support cell for Islamic extremists around the world — is competent for trial." The AP notes that a psychiatrist and a psychologist "hired by Padilla's attorneys concluded he is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder and other mental problems stemming largely from his 3 1/2 years in solitary confinement at a Navy brig in Charleston, S.C. Prosecutors agreed a court-ordered evaluation was necessary."

Anthrax Vaccine Fails To Meet HHS Testing Deadline. The Washington Post (12/19, D2, Merle, 690K) reports, "VaxGen said yesterday that it did not meet a federal deadline to begin human testing of its anthrax vaccine." The FDA "has put the clinical trial on hold since November." The Department of Health and Human Services "had given the company until yesterday to begin testing or risk losing its contract but didn't say what action it would take. … 'I don't think we're in a position to make predictions on how long this will take,' said Lance Ignon, VaxGen's vice president of corporate affairs." HHS spokesman Bill Hall "said no decisions have been made about the contract's fate."

Former NSC Official Claims White House Ordered Op-ed Censored. The Los Angeles Times (12/19, Richter, 850K) reports Flynt Leverett, former senior director for Middle East affairs at the National Security Council and a former CIA analyst, "said Monday that the White House tried to silence his criticism of its Middle East policies by ordering the CIA to censor an op-ed column he wrote." Leverett "said the White House told a CIA censor board to excise parts of a 1,000-word commentary on U.S. policy toward Iran that he had offered to the New York Times. Leverett, who has criticized the administration for failing to deal directly with Tehran, said the board wanted to remove references to prior U.S. contacts with Iran" though "the events he wrote about were widely known." Leverett "speculated" that senior NSC officials, "such as deputy national security advisors Elliott Abrams or Meghan L. O'Sullivan, had authorized their subordinates to intervene."

The Financial Times (12/19, Dinmore) notes Leverett's allegations "come at a particularly sensitive time for the White House, which is under intense pressure to change its whole Middle East strategy following publication of the report of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said he knew nothing about the case but denied the administration would 'falsely silence critics on national security claims'." Although the White House "later confirmed it had suggested deletions to the article because it contained classified information, and then returned the piece to the CIA publications review board."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Justice Department Team Declines To Prosecute In Most Detainee Abuse Cases. New York Times (12/19, Johnston, 1.16M) reports that "[a] Justice Department team responsible for investigating accusations that civilian government employees had abused detainees has decided against prosecution in most of the nearly 20 cases referred in the last two years by the Pentagon and the Central Intelligence Agency, said lawyers who have been officially briefed on the effort. The prosecution team, which was established in June 2004 at the United States attorney's office in Alexandria, Va., has not brought a single indictment and has been plagued by problems." The Times notes that the group "has been unable to collect forensic evidence or find witnesses" for the cases, and in "some" cases, "has been stymied by the absence of facts in the referrals, the lawyers said. A few investigations remain open, although the lawyers declined to be specific about how many cases fell in that category." The Times adds, "Lawyers who have been briefed on the work of the Justice Department unit, initially made up of six federal prosecutors, said problems with evidence and the fragmentary nature of some of the accusations had proved so daunting that prosecutors never even reached the point of grappling with difficult legal issues involving permissive interrogation guidelines."

Durbin Seeks Details Of Investigations. The AP (12/19) reports that in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, who is the incoming Senate Majority Whip, "asked the Justice Department on Monday for an update on its progress prosecuting government employees who were accused in at least 17 cases of abusing detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan." The AP continues, "In response to Durbin's first request, the Justice Department revealed in a Jan. 17 letter that it had opened 20 investigations into claims of detainee abuse that were referred to prosecutors by the Pentagon and the CIA. The investigations were being led by a task force in the U.S. Attorney's office in Virginia's eastern district."

WAR NEWS:

Gates Says US Failure In Iraq Would Be A "Calamity." The AP (12/19, Burns) reports, "Robert Gates assumed the helm at the Pentagon on Monday, warning in his first public remarks as defense secretary that failure in Iraq would be a 'calamity' that would haunt the United States for years." Gates "pledged to give President Bush his honest advice on the costly and unpopular war, and said he would go to Iraq soon to see what US commanders believe should be done to quell the growing violence." He also said "he wants to hear the views of US commanders on how to improve the situation, 'unvarnished and straight from the shoulder.' The remarks seemed to contrast with critics' complaints that the man he replaced, Donald H. Rumsfeld, did not listen enough to the advice of the military's top officers." The New York Times (12/19, Stout, 1.16M) quotes Gates saying to Bush yesterday, "You have asked for my candor and my honest counsel. … You will get both."

The Washington Post (12/19, A4, White, 690K) reports the new secretary pledged that the Iraq war "will be his top priority. … 'All of us want to find a way to bring America's sons and daughters home again, but as the president has made clear, we simply cannot afford to fail in the Middle East,' Gates said yesterday at the Pentagon after Vice President Cheney swore him in as the nation's 22nd defense secretary. 'Failure in Iraq at this juncture would be a calamity that would haunt our nation, impair our credibility, and endanger Americans for decades to come.'" The Post notes Gates "originally was a member of the Iraq Study Group -- which recently issued a stark assessment of the war and made dozens of recommendations -- but stepped aside after Bush nominated him to replace Rumsfeld. Gates had been president of Texas A&M University since 2002."

As Gates Takes Over, Report Finds Iraq Situation "Worse Than Ever." Coverage of Gates' swearing-in was largely overshadowed – particularly on TV – by a report that finds the level of violence in Iraq at a record high. ABC World News (12/18, lead story, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Talk about a tough first day on a job." Gates "takes over as Defense Secretary and the first thing he gets is the Pentagon's own assessment of the war in Iraq, saying things are worse than ever. The number of attacks are up 22%. Military casualties are up 32%. And civilian deaths up 60%, since February.

CBS Evening News (12/18, story 4, 2:35, Martin, 7.66M) also notes the report, while NBC Nightly News (12/18, story 2, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) said "this had to be a sobering first day on the job for America's new Secretary of Defense, who was sworn in today at the Pentagon, and then, hours later, was handed a grim new assessment of the situation in Iraq." Likewise, Fox News' Special Report (12/18, Hume) also reported on Gates, then said, "this on a day the Pentagon released its quarterly progress report on Iraq, which showed the violence was highest on record from August to November, up 22%. The levels pose a grave threat to political progress, which is deemed limited because Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's effort at national reconciliation is showing no indications of succeeding."

Joint Chiefs Unanimously Opposed To Iraq Troop "Surge." The Washington Post (12/19, A1, Wright, Baker, 690K), in an anonymously sourced front-page story titled, "White House, Joint Chiefs At Odds on Adding Troops," reports White House officials are "aggressively promoting" a plan for Iraq that includes a temporary "surge" of 15,000-30,000 troops in the face of the "unanimous disagreement" of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. According to the Post, the Joint Chiefs are of the opinion that the White House "still does not have a defined mission and is latching on to the surge idea in part because of limited alternatives, despite warnings about the potential disadvantages for the military." The JCS "have taken a firm stand…because they believe the strategy review will be the most important decision on Iraq to be made since the March 2003 invasion. At regular interagency meetings and in briefing President Bush last week, the Pentagon has warned that any short-term mission "may only set up the United States for bigger problems when it ends." Additionally, the JCS warn that a "surge" would provide "an enormous edge to virtually all the armed factions in Iraq -- including al-Qaeda's foreign fighters, Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias -- without giving an enduring boost to the U.S military mission or to the Iraqi army, the officials said." The Post goes on quote a "senior administration official" who says "it is 'too simplistic' to say the surge question has broken down into a fight between the White House and the Pentagon, but…acknowledged that the military has questioned the option."

Iraqi Satellite TV Station Gains Audience With Anti-US Programming. The Los Angeles Times (12/19, Daragahi, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports on Al Zawraa, the newly launched Iraqi satellite television channel. Al Zawraa is portrayed as "renegade" and "pro-insurgent…with a 24-hour diet of propaganda against U.S. forces and the Iraqi government" that "has become something of a sensation throughout the country." The

Times adds, "Most hours of the day it plays footage of U.S. soldiers in Iraq being shot and blown up in insurgent attacks, often with religious chants or Saddam Hussein-era nationalist anthems in the background. There are segments warning Iraq's Sunni Arabs to be wary of Shiite Muslims, and occasional English-language commentary and subtitles clearly meant to demoralize U.S. troops. … It's not clear how big an Iraqi audience Al Zawraa captures. But its very presence demonstrates the insurgency's abilities. Despite 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq and intense diplomatic pressure on Iraq's neighbors, the station is able to circumvent U.S. and Iraqi forces and stage round-the-clock broadcasts, complete with news bulletins, graphics and commentary."

Documents Link Saddam With Chemical Attack On Kurds. The AP (12/19, By) reports Munqith al-Faroon, the chief prosecutor in Saddam Hussein's trial, "presented memos Monday from the ousted president's office approving chemical attacks against Kurdish villages, the most serious evidence against him in his genocide trial." al-Faroon "showed the Iraqi court trying Saddam and six other former regime members about 25 documents, including some presidential letters instructing the army to use 'special ammunition' — identified as 'mustard gas' — to quell a Kurdish rebellion in 1987. Some of the documents bore Saddam's signature, al-Faroon said."

Marine Will Be Charged In Haditha Case. The AP (12/18, Watkins) reports, "A Marine captain has been told he will be criminally charged in connection with the killing of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha, his attorney said Monday. Capt. Lucas McConnell, 31, was told by his commanding officer that he will be charged with dereliction of duty, said Kevin McDermott." McDermott said he and his client were "absolutely clueless" how McConnell could have committed dereliction, "adding that his client was not present during the killings. Separately, two [anonymous] military officials said a group of Marines would be charged Thursday for their alleged roles in the killings." The AP adds, "A parallel military investigation has examined whether officers in the Marines' chain of command tried to cover up the events. Results have not been made public."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Regulators Sue Three Former Fannie Mae Execs. The Washington Post (12/19, A1, Hilzenrath, 690K) reports federal regulators "sued three former Fannie Mae executives, including former chairman and chief executive Franklin D. Raines, to recoup more than $115 million in pay they received while the company's earnings were misstated." Regulators said Raines "and the others engaged in a variety of ruses to meet profit goals and boost their compensation. For example, they delayed booking $200 million of expenses one year and used transactions with no economic purpose in other periods simply to shift income into the future, the complaint alleged." The regulators' "discovery of accounting problems in 2004 ultimately led Fannie Mae to pay a $400 million penalty and correct years of financial results, erasing $6.3 billion of previously reported profit."

USA Today (12/19, Iwata, 2.27M) reports, "In a complaint with an administrative law judge, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight detailed 101 charges from 1998 to 2004 against Raines, former chief financial officer Timothy Howard and former controller Leanne Spencer, who all resigned in 2003 as the Fannie Mae scandal worsened." OFHEO is "seeking $100 million in penalties and $115 million in return of bonuses. The regulator also seeks the return of legal fees, and to bar the former executives from any future business with Fannie Mae."

The Wall Street Journal (12/19, Hagerty, Paletta, 2.04M) reports, "Responses from lawyers for the executives suggest that the regulator faces a long and difficult legal battle." The former executives "neglected internal controls, misapplied more than 20 accounting principles and misled the regulator and public, Ofheo Director James Lockhart charged in a statement. Fannie Mae recently announced a restatement of results that cut retained earnings as of June 30, 2004, by $6.3 billion." But "lawyers for all three executives denied the allegations, which Mr. Howard's attorney called 'a work of unsubstantiated fiction.' The lawyers' responses suggested that they will argue that Fannie's former accounting practices and internal controls were approved by outside auditors and Ofheo itself."

The New York Times (12/19, Peters, 1.16M) reports the charges "were the latest development in the fallout over accounting violations at Fannie Mae. After the housing oversight office denounced Fannie Mae in a scathing report in May, the company agreed to pay a $400 million settlement. Earlier this month, Fannie restated its earnings for several years, making a total of $6.3 billion in various corrections, to straighten out inaccuracies in its financial statements. It was one of the largest corporate accounting restatements on record."

The Washington Times (12/19, Gordon, 88K) reports Raines and Howard were "swept out of office two years ago in the multibillion-dollar accounting debacle at the government-sponsored company, which finances one of every five home loans in the United States. Fannie Mae earlier this month announced a long-awaited restatement for 2001 through June 30, 2004, that erased $6.3 billion in profit." Raines, "a prominent Washington figure who was White House budget director in the Clinton administration, led Fannie Mae -- with its legendary political clout, generosity in campaign contributions and lobbying savvy -- from 1999 until his ouster by the company board in December 2004."

SEC Opens "Formal" Investigation Of Broadcom Options Practices. Bloomberg (12/19, Brennan) reports, "Broadcom Corp., a chipmaker restating results to add $1.5 billion in payroll costs, said the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission has opened a 'formal" investigation into the company's options practices. Broadcom also canceled more than $37 million in stock options held by three unnamed individuals it holds responsible for manipulating their grant dates, the Irvine, California-based company said in a statement today. Broadcom said it took the actions as it finished an internal review of the matter." Cody Acree, Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst, in a note to investors: "The escalation of the SEC inquiry to formal status is a bit unsettling given the open-ended possibilities,"

Federal Investigators Find BP's Budget Cuts Led To Less Safety At Texas City Refinery. Financial Times (12/19, Mcnulty) reports on deterioration and safety problems at BP's Texas City refinery. Financial Times writes, "The US Department of Labor's Occupational Safety and Health Administration (Osha) uncovered more than 300 'egregious, wilful violations' in Texas City - BP's biggest refinery. BP did not admit guilt but agreed to a maximum allowable $21m fine and said it would spend $1bn improving and maintaining the refinery over the next five years. Many of the problems at the 70-year-old plant had, no doubt, been inherited by BP when it acquired the refinery in 1998 as part of its purchase of Amoco. Before the blast, the Texas City site had in 30 years suffered 23 fatalities - four since BP took over. But instead of making the investments needed to improve safety, BP in 1999 ordered a 25 per cent cut in fixed costs. Federal investigators would later conclude that these budget cuts caused a progressive deterioration in safety."

Study Casts Doubt On Directors' "Lucky" Options. The AP (12/19) reports, "About 1,400 corporate directors received option grants whose timing was manipulated, according to" a study conducted by academics at Harvard Law School, Cornell University, and INSEAD in France. The AP adds, "Of all options grants to directors, about 9 percent were received at 'lucky' times -- when the stock price was equal to a monthly low, according to a Harvard Law and Economics paper released Monday. After studying the period form 1996 to 2005, academics at Harvard Law School, Cornell University and INSEAD in France estimated that about 800 lucky grant events were the result of opportunistic timing." An abstract of the study is available online.,

On Monday, the Los Angeles Times (12/18, Kristof, 850K) reported, "Nearly 1,400 corporate board members appear to have profited from the manipulation of stock option grant dates over a 10-year period, according to a study being released today. The analysis raises the possibility that hundreds of board members were aware that options were backdated to boost their value to themselves and company executives. That could be seen as a conflict with their role as advocates for all company shareholders."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Reports Rise In Violent Crime Across Country. Media outlets across the country report on the FBI's Monday report, which said that violent crime rose 2.2 percent nationally in 2005. Coverage notes that local police chiefs have asked for more federal money to fight crime, but that money has not been forthcoming. For example, on ABC World News (12/18, story 5, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M), Stuart Thomas, Police Chief, Little Rock Police Department, said, "After September 11th, there was a kind of a shift in federal priorities. And what we saw was a reduction in some of the COPS hiring grants." Meanwhile, the Washington Post

(12/19, A1, Eggen, 690K) and Los Angeles Times (12/19, Schmitt, 850K) both note potential political ramifications.

ABC World News (12/18, story 5, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The FBI today published its statistics for the first half of 2006; and there's a troubling increase in the number of violent crimes – particularly robberies, which soared almost 10% -- with increases in areas where you might not expect to find them." ABC (Thomas) added, "Across the nation, robbery is surging at an extraordinary pace," and that "spike is indicative of an overall rise of violent crime. … Why the surge? A resurgence of gangs, career criminals returning home after years in prison, and large numbers of teenagers with guns. … Many police complain the federal money is drying up. They say the government has become so preoccupied with homeland security, it has forgotten about neighborhood security." Stuart Thomas, Police Chief, Little Rock Police Department: "After September 11th, there was a kind of a shift in federal priorities. And what we saw was a reduction in some of the COPS hiring grants." Thomas: "Police fear if drastic steps aren't taken now, an epidemic of violence could be on the horizon."

CBS Evening News (12/18, story 7, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A spike in murders and robberies tops our news briefing tonight, which also includes an arrest in a serial murder case." CBS (Strassman) added, "In every region of America, violent crime is getting worse. … The Justice Department is studying why, but many police chiefs say their departments are just stretched too thin." NBC Nightly News (12/18, story 6, 0:35, Williams, 9.87M) also noted the details of the FBI statistics, saying the report showed "a significant increase in violent crime."

The AP (12/19, Jordan) reports, "The Bush administration has asked for $1.2 billion in crime-fighting grants and assistance programs this year," which International Association of Chiefs of Police counsel Gene Voegtlin "described as at least a $1 billion hit from funding levels a decade ago. Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department is encouraged by a 2.6 percent drop in property crimes -- such as auto theft and other larcenies -- as outlined in the FBI report. But 'we are again concerned about the increase in violent crime in some cities and towns,' he said."

Under the headline "Violent Crime Is Up For 2nd Straight Year," the Washington Post (12/19, A1, Eggen, 690K) adds, "The numbers are certain to increase pressure on the Bush administration, whose detractors say local police concerns have been slighted by the focus on homeland security and counterterrorism. The Justice Department inspector general's office has reported sharp declines in the number of FBI agents and investigations dedicated to traditional crimes since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks."

The New York Times (12/19, Blumenthal, 1.16M) reports Voegtlin "said that since 1997, federal grants to local police agencies had decreased to $890 million from $2.4 billion. … The West led the increase in violent crime, up 4.7 percent. … The Northeast had the smallest increase in violent crime, 2.9 percent. The South led in homicides, up 3.3 percent. Many cities showed increases in homicides: Miami was up to 30 from 23; Indianapolis to 68 from 44; Boston to 37 from 29; and Detroit to 186 from 169." The Washington Times (12/19, Seper, 88K) notes, "Last year, the number of violent crimes increased by 2.5 percent, the largest gain in 15 years, and the Justice Department pledged to determine why the crime numbers were continuing to increase. A report on the matter has not yet been completed."

The Los Angeles Times (12/19, Schmitt, 850K) reports, "If the trend of rising crime continues, it could become a political issue in the 2008 election. … 'Violent street crime did not go away on Sept. 11,' said James O. Pasco Jr., executive director of the Fraternal Order of Police." Pasco added that "though 'the same or additional resources are needed to fight those crimes,' in many cases less money is being spent." The Times notes, "Federal aid to state and local police declined to about $890 million in 2006 from $2.5 billion in 2001. Police departments are being squeezed by growing domestic security duties at a time when federal agencies such as the FBI are focusing more on preventing terrorism than assisting local departments fighting traditional crimes."

Local Newspapers Add Local Statistics. Smaller media outlets add local statistics to their reports on the FBI statistics.. For example, the San Francisco Chronicle (12/19, Bulwa, 384K) reports, "Driven by a surge in armed robberies, violent crime rose in the Bay Area and around the country during the first six months of this year, the FBI said Monday in a report that raised concern that the drop in crime that started in the 1990s has turned around." The Dayton (OH) Daily News (12/19, McCall) reports, "Mirroring a nationwide trend, newly released FBI data showed violent crime increased by 6.4 percent in the city of Dayton during the first six months of 2006. … The numbers reflect what police across the country have been saying for months: that the lull in crime between 2001 and 2004 appears to be over." The Richmond Times-Dispatch (12/19) reports, "[I]n the metro Richmond area, the picture is not as bleak. In the first six months of 2006, Richmond saw a 14 percent decline in violent crime, despite a two-man killing spree that started the year."

Gonzales Considers Investigating Duke Lacrosse Prosecutor. WSOC-TV Charlotte, NC (12/18, 5:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says he might investigate DA Mike Nifong's handling of the Duke lacrosse rape case. Earlier this month, a state representative said Nifong violated the player's civil rights during the calling them names in the press. David Evans, Collin Finnerty and Reade Seligmann are expected to go on trial next year." WRAL-TV Raleigh, NC (12/18, 6:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is talking about the Duke Lacrosse rape case. North Carolina Congressman Walter B .Jones wants the Justice Department to investigate DA Mike Nifong's actions. In an interview with FOX News, Gonzales said the lacrosse rape case is one his office could investigate."

WRAZ-TV Raleigh, NC (12/18, 7:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "For the first time, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is talking about the Duke Lacrosse rape case and whether the suspects' civil rights were violated. A North Carolina Congressman is asking Gonzales and the Justice Department to investigate district attorney Mike Nifong's actions. Anything beyond that in an interview with FOX news, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said his office has made no decision, but acknowledged this issue is one it could investigate. Gonzales: Well, but even in connection with the state and local matter, if an investigation is conducted in such a way that civil rights laws are violated, that would be something that we might look into. Friday Defense Attorneys for the three defendants asked for the case to be moved out of Durham, and criticized the way DNA evidence was revealed. Cheshire: None of the DNA that was found of these numerous males matched the lacrosse players." WTVD-TV (12/18, 12:00 p.m.) in Raleigh, NC, also broadcasted this story. KVVU-TV (12/18, 5:00 a.m.) in Las Vegas and WGHP-TV (12/18, 5:00 a.m.) in Greensboro, NC, also broadcasted this story.

`Defendants' Supporters Ask Duke Officials To Call For Investigation. The Durham Herald Sun (12/19, Gronberg) reports, "Supporters of the three Duke lacrosse rape defendants on Monday asked university officials to join U.S. Rep. Walter Jones in calling for a federal civil-rights investigation of District Attorney Mike Nifong's handling of the case. The group Friends of Duke University said that while that wouldn't force Duke President Richard Brodhead or other administrators to take a position about the guilt or innocence of the accused men, it would support 'the undeniable proposition that public information suggests there is a sufficient likelihood of civil-rights violations' to merit U.S. Department of Justice scrutiny."

Witness Says Police Shot Unarmed Man In Back During Katrina Aftermath. On its Web site, CNN (12/18, Griffin, Polk, Albright-Hanna) reports, "New Orleans police lined up 'like at a firing range' and fatally shot an unarmed man in the back as he fled from them in the days after Hurricane Katrina swept ashore, a witness to the shooting told CNN." This statement "marks the first time a witness has come forward publicly with information about the shooting of Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally retarded man whose death has sparked a police investigation and a grand jury probe into what happened in and around the Danziger Bridge that day." CNN adds, "Initial police accounts said that Madison reached for his waistband and turned on police, but Gaston said Madison did not appear to have a weapon and that he was running away from police 'hands out, full speed' when he was shot."

Inmate Charged With Fashioning Letter Bomb. The Washington Post (12/19, A15, Markon, 690K) reports that Rodney Curtis Hamrick, a prisoner at Leavenworth, "was charged yesterday with fashioning a letter bomb and mailing it to the federal courthouse in Richmond, authorities said." He "mailed the bomb in October 2005, along with a letter several days later that contained a powdery substance labeled 'anthrax,' federal law enforcement officials said. Tests indicated that the substance was not anthrax."

Post Opposes Two DC Measures Aimed To Help Ex-Offenders. The Washington Post (12/19, A28, 690K) editorializes, "Creating better conditions for the reentry and rehabilitation of offenders is a worthy goal, and not just for the men and women released from prison. The community's interest is served if ex-offenders build crime-free lives. But two measures being considered by the D.C. Council to help offenders, no matter how well-intentioned, are cause for serious concern and, if approved, would undermine public safety." The Post considers council member Marion Barry's effort to amend the "Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination in employment or housing based upon an arrest or conviction record" the "most problematic." The Post writes, "No one is against giving people a second chance, but this bill goes too far." Another bill "would greatly expand the conditions for expungement, or sealing, of criminal records." The Post writes, "As Patricia A. Riley, special counsel to the U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia, testified, it 'tips the scales too far against the public interest and public safety.'"

Abramoff Defending Self In Lawsuits By Indian Tribes. Legal Times (12/19, Palmer) reports after "paying for a high-priced criminal defense by Chadbourne & Parke's Abbe Lowell in the government's corruption probe, former uber-lobbyist-turned-jailbird Jack Abramoff is taking a different approach in two lawsuits filed against him by Indian tribes." Abramoff is "representing himself against former client Louisiana Coushatta Tribe and the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas. So far, Abramoff has piggybacked on motions filed by lawyers for former Christian Coalition head Ralph Reed and former Abramoff associate Michael Scanlon in the Texas case."

Attorneys Starting To See More Settlements Creating Charitable Donations. Law.com (12/19, Geier) reports on a "creative flair" appearing in legal settlements. Law.com writes, "Civil actions ending in creative settlements that do more than put money into the pockets of plaintiffs and their lawyers are unusual, but attorneys are starting to see more of them. … Lawyers involved in settling cases that result in charitable donations acknowledge that parties in some instances gain in improved public relations and financial benefits such as tax breaks. They also note that the prospect of a defendant's gaining any such advantage can discourage plaintiffs from charitable settlements." Law.com adds, "Insurance companies and self-insured defendants would rather contribute to a public good than pay money to an individual. But the public seldom hears about the contributions because defendants do not want their payments to appear to be admissions of liability."

Company Uses Technology To Better Respond To Email Discovery Requests. On Law.com (12/19) Edward Kelley, assistant general counsel at Transatlantic Reinsurance Company, writes, "Any attorney or in-house counsel who relies on e-mail for evidence or litigation support knows that e-mail discovery is among the most mind-numbing, inefficient processes that enterprises face. And in today's highly regulated business climate, e-mail messages have become one of the most scrutinized and sought after categories of business records." Kelley reviews his employer's travails in creating efficient discovery processes for email. He writes, "The technology we now employ is sophisticated -- using advanced weighting algorithms to help index our e-mail-specific metadata and accurately establish e-mail rank, giving each e-mail a relevancy score. … By reducing our e-mail review time, as a company we can respond even more rapidly and confidently to regulatory inquiries. This resource has freed up our legal team to respond faster and move on to more strategic work."

Texas Supreme Court Says Courts Can Reduce Attorney Fees As Well As Damages. Law.com (12/19, Robbins) reports, "In a unanimous decision, the Texas Supreme Court has ruled for the first time that two legal principles appellate courts use to limit or overturn damage awards also can be applied to attorney fees. On Dec. 1, the Supreme Court affirmed the 1st Court of Appeals' decision to significantly reduce the damages awarded in Barker and Barker v. Eckman, a suit involving the distribution of proceeds from the sale of bull semen collected, stored and sold under a bailment agreement. The high court concluded that the Houston appeals court was correct when it held that the statute of limitations barred breaches of the agreement that occurred more than four years before Walter Eckman sued Emzy and Ava Barker. … In his analysis finding that the Barkers are entitled to a meaningful evidentiary review of the attorney fees awarded, Supreme Court Justice Phillip Johnson, author of the opinion, cited 1996's Saenz v. Fidelity & Guaranty Insurance Underwriters. The Supreme Court made it clear in Saenz that a court of appeals must conduct a meaningful review to determine whether sufficient evidence supports a jury's award of mental anguish damages."

Schwarzenegger Orders Fix For California Execution Procedures. The Los Angeles Times (12/19, Weinstein, 850K) reports California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "directed his administration to fix problems with the state's procedure to execute prisoners." Schwarzenegger's action came "in response to a stinging decision issued Friday by U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose, who said the state's system 'is broken, but ..can be fixed.'" Fogel, "who visited the death chamber in San Quentin and held a four-day hearing in September, said the state's current procedures involving lethal injection violates the Constitution's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment." Fogel listed "a number of problems with how the death penalty is implemented in California, including inconsistent and unreliable screening of execution team members, poorly trained staff, inconsistent and unreliable record keeping of drugs used in the process, improper mixing, preparation and administration of drugs administered by the execution team, overcrowded conditions and poorly designed facilities in which the execution team must work."

ANTITRUST:

FCC Commissioner Recuses Self From Voting On AT&T Merger. The Washington Post (12/19, D1, Sipress, 690K) reports, "Federal Communications Commissioner Robert M. McDowell announced yesterday that he would disqualify himself from voting on AT&T's proposed purchase of BellSouth on ethical grounds, depriving the FCC of a potential swing vote that could have broken the stalemate among its Democratic and Republican members." He "felt compelled to silence speculation over whether he would take part in the vote" and "accused his colleagues of failing to negotiate in good faith over conditions for approving the $86 billion merger proposed seven months ago." McDowell had "previously worked as senior vice president for Comptel, an association that lobbied on behalf of companies competing with AT&T and BellSouth."

The Wall Street Journal (12/19, A3, Schatz, 2.04M) reports that McDowell's decision "was an unwelcome development for the companies, which had been counting on the Republican to break the impasse that has paralyzed the agency's review of the deal." His action "increases the likelihood that AT&T will be forced to accept some conditions involving 'net neutrality,' or the idea that all Internet traffic should be treated equally. However, it also sweeps away uncertainty about who will vote, which has slowed negotiations on merger conditions."

USA Today (12/19, 3B, Cauley, 2.27M) reports, "Earlier this month FCC general counsel Sam Feder said that McDowell could vote on the deal. McDowell said he had hoped Feder's recommendation would provide him with the 'legal equivalent of body armor.' Instead, he said, 'I was handed Swiss cheese.' After conferring with several advisers, including the executive branch's Office of Government Ethics, McDowell decided to 'follow my own personal sense of ethics' and 'disqualify myself from this matter.'"

LATimes Approves Of McDowell Decision. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/19, 850K) writes, "It's unclear whether he acted out of principle or obligation, but Robert M. McDowell made the right choice Monday. … McDowell has publicly called for fewer regulations and has questioned the need for Net neutrality rules. No matter. At least McDowell got to act principled — in announcing his decision, he used the words 'ethics' or 'ethical' 33 times in five pages."

Express Scripts Attempt To Outbid CVS For Caremark. The Washington Post (12/19, D1, Shin, 690K) reports, "Pharmacy-benefit manager Express Scripts yesterday attempted to outbid retail pharmacy giant CVS for Caremark Rx with an offer of $26 billion in cash and stock, joining a flurry of year-end mergers and acquisitions. The proposal stunned many investors and marked the first shot in what could become a protracted battle over who gets to be the nation's leading filler of drug prescriptions. … Caremark and CVS last month agreed to what was characterized as a merger of equals, with CVS offering Caremark shareholders $22.5 million in stock. The combination of Caremark, the nation's second-largest pharmacy-benefit manager, and CVS, the second-largest pharmacy retailer, would create the biggest private-sector buyer of prescription drugs, responsible for managing more than 1 billion prescriptions a year."

USA Today (12/19, 1B, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "While investors may think the Express Scripts cash-and-stock offer is more attractive than the $21 billion CVS all-stock deal, management at Caremark and CVS may be convinced that theirs is the better long-term move, says Merrill Lynch analyst Tom Gallucci in a research note to investors. … Analyst

CVS Could "Sweeten" Bid, Analysts Say. The Dow Jones Newswires (12/18, Covert) reports, "[A]nalysts say CVS, of Woonsocket, R.I., could sweeten its bid, which had been perceived as low by Wall Street. In addition to its healthy balance sheet, CVS, in acquiring Nashville-based Caremark, could use the target company's strong cash flow to pay down debt it might take on to fund a bigger price tag. Analysts add that a deal with CVS would likely be more attractive to regulators, as an Express Scripts deal risks greater antitrust concerns."

Biomet Agrees To Private Buyout, Finds Backdated Options Grants. The New York Times (12/19, Feder, 1.16M) reports, "Biomet, a major manufacturer of artificial hips and knees, said today that it had agreed to be acquired by a private investment consortium for $10.9 billion. The buyout bid came from affiliates of the Blackstone Group, Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and TPG." Additionally, Biomet "announced today that a board committee's review of the company's options-dating practices back to 1996 had uncovered numerous cases of option grants backdated to create immediate profits for the recipients, as well as shortcomings in the company's records."

The Wall Street Journal (12/19, C4, Carey, Vuocolo, 2.04M) reports, "The Warsaw, Ind., company said that if its shareholders agree to the deal, they will receive $44 a common share from a private-equity group that includes affiliates of Blackstone Group, Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Texas Pacific Group. The price represents a 27% premium to the stock's closing price in early April, a few days before Biomet said it had hired Morgan Stanley to help it look at strategic alternatives. That move came a week after the resignation of Dane Miller, Biomet's co-founder and its chief executive officer for 29 years. Mr. Miller is expected to be an investor in the new private company once the deal closes in October 2007."

The AP (12/19, Martin) reports,Linda Varoli, vice president of merger research with the New York-based Wall Street Access, said the $10.9 billion purchase price — which will be paid with cash and loans — reflects the potential of the industry, which has been rattled recently by antitrust concerns. In June, Biomet and three other orthopedics makers announced they had received subpoenas stemming from possible criminal violations in the manufacturing and sale of orthopedic implant devices."

Apollo Management To Buy Out Realogy. The AP (12/19) reports, "-- The parent of Century 21 and Coldwell Banker real estate brokerages said it is being acquired by an affiliate of private equity firm Apollo Management LP for about $6.65 billion in cash. The buyout of Realogy Corp. includes about $1.6 billion in debt and other liabilities of roughly $750 million, the brokerage said late Sunday. Realogy also owns Sotheby's International Realty."

EU Clears Merck To Buy Serono. The AP (12/19) reports, "EU regulators on Monday cleared Germany's Merck KGaA to buy Swiss biotechnology company Serono SA. The European Commission cleared the deal automatically after identifying no antitrust problems and receiving no complaints from rivals within a deadline of 25 working days."

Milberg Weiss Dismissed From Antitrust Case. The New York Times (12/19, 1.16M) reports, "Milberg Weiss & Bershad, the law firm accused of paying plaintiffs to bring class-action lawsuits, was removed yesterday as one of the lead firms in an antitrust case against carmakers over Canadian imports. Federal District Judge D. Brock Hornby in Maine granted a request by the carmakers to remove Milberg Weiss as the vice chairman of the plaintiffs' executive committee." The Times notes, "Milberg Weiss and two of its partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman, were indicted in May on charges they paid clients to sue companies for securities fraud."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

States Sue EPA Over Soot Levels. The AP (12/19) reports, "More than a dozen states sued the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency on Monday to lower soot levels from smokestacks and exhaust pipes, a move state officials argue would save thousands of lives. The states argue that the Bush administration is ignoring science and its own experts in refusing to slightly reduce the allowed threshold for soot. The lawsuit is the latest salvo against the Bush administration, which has repeatedly come under fire for what some states and environmentalists have said is its lack of commitment to environmental issues." The AP adds, "Officials from California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Maine, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont and the District of Columbia joined New York in the action filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Milwaukee SAC Says Post 9/11 FBI "Much More Proactive." The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (12/19, 255K) runs excerpts from reporter Gina Barton's recent interview with FBI Milwaukee SAC Richard K. Ruminski. Barton: "How have things in the FBI changed since 9-11?" Ruminski: "We've completely changed our focus from being mainly a criminal investigative agency that also worked counter-intelligence matters. We are now in a status where we're trying to be much more proactive. We went from a reactive agency to much more proactive because of our newest responsibility of detecting and preventing terrorism, which is a very difficult task." Barton: "Sen. Herb Kohl recently asked the national FBI director to send more crime-fighting resources to Milwaukee. Do you think the FBI needs to get more involved in solving Milwaukee's crime problem?" Ruminski: "We have been extremely involved in the violent crime area. We work gangs, we work narcotics investigations, but we work them in task force settings. We had numerous arrests here of gang members several weeks back. … We address some of the more complex (criminal) enterprise organizations…in a task force setting."

FBI Casts Wider Skills Net In Post-9/11 Recruiting Push. The Mobile (AL) Press-Register (12/18, Kirby) reported, "The prototypical FBI agent in the J. Edgar Hoover days was a lawyer or accountant. Today's ideal candidate is more likely to be a computer whiz who is fluent in a second language. Finding new agents with that kind of background can be challenging, especially since they must also pass a background check, lie detector test and physical fitness trial, as well as survive a written test, an oral interview and 18 weeks of training at Quantico, Va. Former Special Agent Craig Dahle was in charge of recruiting for the Mobile field office until his retirement last month. In that role, he was one of the men and women responsible for trying to achieve the agency's national recruiting goal of 1,000 new agents for the fiscal year that ended in September. The bureau fell short of that target, hiring 791 agents. 'A thousand is extremely ambitious because the process of getting hired as an FBI special agent is unlike any other job, I'd dare say,' Dahle said." The Press-Register noted, "The FBI has aggressively stepped up its hiring since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, taking on an average of 873 agents a year since 9/11 compared with an annual average of 632 in the five previous years. … The FBI also has hired 4,886 support staff since 9/11, Dahle said. These include analysts and computer experts, he said. … 'There's been a lot of hiring in that area that would not have happened had 9/11 not happened,' he said."

Accused ATF Shooters Make First Court Appearance. The Macon Telegraph (12/19, 59K) reports, "Two suspects in the shooting and wounding of two federal agents have made their first court appearance. Chardriguez Durden, 23, of Stone Mountain is charged with six counts of aggravated assault on a police officer and violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act. Paul Thompson Jr., 19, of Covington is charged with violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act."

Advocates Say Marijuana Is California's Top Cash Crop. On its Web site, KESQ, Palm Desert, California (12/19) reports that a new report "says marijuana is California's number one cash crop, worth some 14-billion dollars a year. That's despite an all-out crack-down campaign by the feds against the drug. Medicinal marijuana advocates say it's California's number one cash crop simply because it's illegal." KESQ also notes DEA raids on marijuana dispensaries such as CannaHelp and Palm Springs Caregivers and reports anti-prohibition advocates "say classifying marijuana as illegal is the problem."

Report's Author Claims "War On Drugs" Is Failing. The UK's Guardian (12/19) says the author of the report, Jon Gettman, "says the figures show the war on drugs is not working: 'Illicit marijuana cultivation provides considerable unreported revenue for growers without corresponding tax obligations to compensate the public for the social and fiscal costs related to [its] use.' His suggestion that the crop be legalized and taxed was rejected by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, which pointed to countries with large drug cash crops, notably Colombia and Afghanistan."

Financial Gains Disputed. The Washington Times/UPI (12/18) reported Gettman "advocates removing marijuana from the federal list of hard-core Schedule 1 drugs and treating it like tobacco and alcohol by legalizing and reaping a tax windfall, while also controlling production and distribution to better restrict use by minors. [The ONDCP's] Tom Riley…disagreed, and said coca has plagued Colombia and opium poppies are a disaster for Afghanistan."

Meth Use Possibly Linked To Rise In Violent Crimes. The Washington Post (12/19, A1, Eggen, 690K) reports a "surge in violent crime that began last year accelerated in the first half of 2006, the FBI reported yesterday, providing the clearest signal yet that the historic drop in the U.S. crime rate has ended and is being reversed. … Many communities, particularly those in urbanized areas, may be headed into a period of sustained crime increases, they said. While no one is certain of the causes, experts cited an increase in the number of young men in their crime-prone years, diminished crime-fighting assistance from the federal government, fewer jobs for people with marginal skills and even the ongoing growth in methamphetamine use in some places."

IMMIGRATION:

High-Tech Substitutes For Immigrant Labor Found To Be Rare. The Wall Street Journal (12/19, Kronholz, 2.04M) reports, "With the country deeply divided over immigration, some economists and policy makers are suggesting that technological innovations could offer a way out of the economy's reliance on illegal workers." However, "it's unlikely that mechanization will reduce the demand for illegal immigrants anytime soon. For most of the jobs they do, there's no easy high-tech substitute."

TAX:

Tax Preparation Firms Under Fire For Expensive Holiday Loans. NBC Nightly News (12/18, story 5, 2:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Some of this nation's biggest tax preparing firms are offering a new product, so called holiday loans that give customers up front money to pay for Christmas gifts, but at a high price." NBC (Corke) added, "It is a major twist on something the tax prep firms have been doing for years, figuring out your refund and lend you that amount. You pay them back when Uncle Sam's check arrives. Holiday loans are available in December. Instead of a W-2 form, you bring in a pay stub, the tax firm estimates your refund, and lends you that amount." Mark Winston Griffith, consumer advocate: "They are marketed to people at a time when they are probably most vulnerable." Corke: "Consumer advocates criticized the low pressures, interest sometimes tops 300%. So a $100 loan can cost $400 if it is held for a year."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Brownback To Allow Vote On Michigan Judge. The New York Times (12/19, Lewis, 1.16M) reports Sen. Sam Brownback (R), "who blocked the confirmation" of Michigan state Judge Janet Neff to the Federal District Court "because she attended a same-sex commitment ceremony for the daughter of her long-time neighbors, says he will now allow a vote on the nomination." Brownback, who has "been criticized for blocking the nomination, said he would also no longer press a proposed solution he offered on Dec. 8 that garnered even more criticism: that he would remove his block if Judge Neff agreed to recuse herself from all cases involving same-sex unions." Brownback said "he still believed Judge Neff's behavior raised serious questions about her impartiality and that he was likely to vote against her," but he added he "did not realize his proposal — asking a nominee to agree in advance to remove herself from deciding a whole category of cases — was so unusual as to be possibly unprecedented."

WSJournal Criticizes Concept Of "Independent" Ethics Enforcer. The Wall Street Journal (12/19, 2.04M) editorializes, "Congressional mores could certainly use an upgrade, but it pays to beware of reformers promising to clean up politics by letting someone else do the dirty work. Exhibit A is the strange new enthusiasm for an 'independent' office of public integrity for Congress." One "warning sign is that the proposal is being marketed by the same folks who gave us 'independent counsels' such as Lawrence Walsh and Ken Starr for the executive branch, as well as the glories of 'campaign finance reform.'" A "better name for such an 'independent' ethics body would be the office of public buck-passing, because it would allow Congress to spare itself the heavy political lifting of judging colleagues. Handing over that duty to outsiders would make Congress less politically accountable, not more, while creating a whole new set of political problems and disputes."

Leahy Promises Oversight Of Executive Branch. Editor & Publisher (12/18, Fitzgerald) reports, "In a little-noticed speech last week at Georgetown University Law Center, U.S. Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) lamented the recent congressional acquiescence to the Bush administration's secrecy, and promised to restore the constitutional balance between the executive and legislative branches of government." Leahy "said he will work to strengthen open-government laws, and to provide more congressional oversight of the White House."

OTHER NEWS:

Polonium Poisoning Said To Hold Lessons For Possible Terror Attacks. Peter D. Zimmerman, chief scientist of the United States Senate Foreign Relations Committee from 2001 to 2003, writes in the New York Times (12/19, 1.16M), "The exotic murder-by-polonium of the former KGB spy Alexander Litvinenko has embroiled Russia, Britain and Germany in a diplomatic scuffle and a hunt for more traces of the lethal substance. But it also throws into question most of the previous analyses of 'dirty bombs,' terrorist attacks using radioactive isotopes wrapped in explosives (or using other dispersion techniques) to spread radioactive material in crowded areas. Essentially all analysts, myself included, played down the possibility of using alpha radiation…as a source of dirty bombs. We concentrated instead on isotopes that emit penetrating gamma rays, which are basically super-powered packets of light, hard to shield and effective at a yard or more." As a result, "a near-term goal should to require specific licensing of any person or company seeking to purchase alpha sources stronger than one millicurie, about a third of a lethal dose. A longer-term goal ought to be eliminating nearly all use of polonium in industry through other technologies. That is a technical challenge and would cost some money, but it would certainly be less expensive than coping with the devastation of a smoky bomb."

TERRORISM NEWS:

ACLU Allowed Access To Document On Detainee Photos. The New York Times (12/19, Liptak, 1.16M) reports federal prosecutors in New York withdrew a subpoena to the American Civil Liberties Union seeking to retrieve copies of a classified document. In what is describes as "an opaque and defensive four-page letter" prosecutors "said they were acting 'in light of changed circumstances' and their determination that 'the grand jury can obtain the evidence necessary to its investigation from other sources.' Another factor may have played a role. A transcript of a closed hearing in the case that was unsealed yesterday suggested the government was going to lose."

The Washington Post (12/19, Barnes, 690K) reports that the ACLU "hailed the government's retreat as a victory." ACLU executive director Anthony D. Romero: "The Bush administration's attempt to suppress information using the grand jury process was truly chilling and is unprecedented in law and in our history as an organization." However, the Post writes, "the Justice Department said, in effect, that the ACLU had instigated the fight and had told the government that filing the subpoena would be the first step toward the ACLU turning over the document." The Post adds, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department had tried to handle the matter in a way that was as 'amicable, cooperative and as unobtrusively as possible.'"

The AP (12/19, Neumeister) reports, "The document _ marked "secret" in bold but small print on the top of its first page _ described when and how the military Public Affairs Office permits the media to photograph enemy prisoners of war and detainees in Iraq. It was dated more than a year after the release of pictures of American soldiers tormenting Iraqi detainees at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq."

The New York Sun (12/19, Gerstein) reports, "The government's decision to relent may have been influenced by comments the judge assigned to the case, Jed Rakoff, made at a hearing last week. 'There seems to be a huge difference between investigating a wrongful leak of a classified document and demanding back all copies of it,' the judge said, according to a transcript unsealed yesterday. 'I'm old enough to remember a case called the Pentagon Papers.'"

In an editorial, the Washington Post (12/19, A28, 690K) opines, "the government has wisely backed down from its effort to misuse its subpoena power to force the American Civil Liberties Union to turn over a classified document. The subpoena has been withdrawn and the document released. It turns out to have been an entirely innocuous memo outlining rules about photographing prisoners of war and detainees in Iraq. And that leaves two questions: Why in the world was this document classified in the first place? And why in the world did the government take the unprecedented step of using the grand jury process to try to retrieve 'any and all copies' of the memo?"

Judge Orders Padilla To Undergo Mental Competency Evaluation. The AP (12/19, Anderson) reports that a federal judge "ordered a mental exam Monday to determine whether Jose Padilla — charged with being part of a support cell for Islamic extremists around the world — is competent for trial." The AP notes that a psychiatrist and a psychologist "hired by Padilla's attorneys concluded he is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder and other mental problems stemming largely from his 3 1/2 years in solitary confinement at a Navy brig in Charleston, S.C. Prosecutors agreed a court-ordered evaluation was necessary."

Anthrax Vaccine Fails To Meet HHS Testing Deadline. The Washington Post (12/19, D2, Merle, 690K) reports, "VaxGen said yesterday that it did not meet a federal deadline to begin human testing of its anthrax vaccine." The FDA "has put the clinical trial on hold since November." The Department of Health and Human Services "had given the company until yesterday to begin testing or risk losing its contract but didn't say what action it would take. … 'I don't think we're in a position to make predictions on how long this will take,' said Lance Ignon, VaxGen's vice president of corporate affairs." HHS spokesman Bill Hall "said no decisions have been made about the contract's fate."

Former NSC Official Claims White House Ordered Op-ed Censored. The Los Angeles Times (12/19, Richter, 850K) reports Flynt Leverett, former senior director for Middle East affairs at the National Security Council and a former CIA analyst, "said Monday that the White House tried to silence his criticism of its Middle East policies by ordering the CIA to censor an op-ed column he wrote." Leverett "said the White House told a CIA censor board to excise parts of a 1,000-word commentary on U.S. policy toward Iran that he had offered to the New York Times. Leverett, who has criticized the administration for failing to deal directly with Tehran, said the board wanted to remove references to prior U.S. contacts with Iran" though "the events he wrote about were widely known." Leverett "speculated" that senior NSC officials, "such as deputy national security advisors Elliott Abrams or Meghan L. O'Sullivan, had authorized their subordinates to intervene."

The Financial Times (12/19, Dinmore) notes Leverett's allegations "come at a particularly sensitive time for the White House, which is under intense pressure to change its whole Middle East strategy following publication of the report of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said he knew nothing about the case but denied the administration would 'falsely silence critics on national security claims'." Although the White House "later confirmed it had suggested deletions to the article because it contained classified information, and then returned the piece to the CIA publications review board."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Justice Department Team Declines To Prosecute In Most Detainee Abuse Cases. New York Times (12/19, Johnston, 1.16M) reports that "[a] Justice Department team responsible for investigating accusations that civilian government employees had abused detainees has decided against prosecution in most of the nearly 20 cases referred in the last two years by the Pentagon and the Central Intelligence Agency, said lawyers who have been officially briefed on the effort. The prosecution team, which was established in June 2004 at the United States attorney's office in Alexandria, Va., has not brought a single indictment and has been plagued by problems." The Times notes that the group "has been unable to collect forensic evidence or find witnesses" for the cases, and in "some" cases, "has been stymied by the absence of facts in the referrals, the lawyers said. A few investigations remain open, although the lawyers declined to be specific about how many cases fell in that category." The Times adds, "Lawyers who have been briefed on the work of the Justice Department unit, initially made up of six federal prosecutors, said problems with evidence and the fragmentary nature of some of the accusations had proved so daunting that prosecutors never even reached the point of grappling with difficult legal issues involving permissive interrogation guidelines."

Durbin Seeks Details Of Investigations. The AP (12/19) reports that in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, who is the incoming Senate Majority Whip, "asked the Justice Department on Monday for an update on its progress prosecuting government employees who were accused in at least 17 cases of abusing detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan." The AP continues, "In response to Durbin's first request, the Justice Department revealed in a Jan. 17 letter that it had opened 20 investigations into claims of detainee abuse that were referred to prosecutors by the Pentagon and the CIA. The investigations were being led by a task force in the U.S. Attorney's office in Virginia's eastern district."

WAR NEWS:

Gates Says US Failure In Iraq Would Be A "Calamity." The AP (12/19, Burns) reports, "Robert Gates assumed the helm at the Pentagon on Monday, warning in his first public remarks as defense secretary that failure in Iraq would be a 'calamity' that would haunt the United States for years." Gates "pledged to give President Bush his honest advice on the costly and unpopular war, and said he would go to Iraq soon to see what US commanders believe should be done to quell the growing violence." He also said "he wants to hear the views of US commanders on how to improve the situation, 'unvarnished and straight from the shoulder.' The remarks seemed to contrast with critics' complaints that the man he replaced, Donald H. Rumsfeld, did not listen enough to the advice of the military's top officers." The New York Times (12/19, Stout, 1.16M) quotes Gates saying to Bush yesterday, "You have asked for my candor and my honest counsel. … You will get both."

The Washington Post (12/19, A4, White, 690K) reports the new secretary pledged that the Iraq war "will be his top priority. … 'All of us want to find a way to bring America's sons and daughters home again, but as the president has made clear, we simply cannot afford to fail in the Middle East,' Gates said yesterday at the Pentagon after Vice President Cheney swore him in as the nation's 22nd defense secretary. 'Failure in Iraq at this juncture would be a calamity that would haunt our nation, impair our credibility, and endanger Americans for decades to come.'" The Post notes Gates "originally was a member of the Iraq Study Group -- which recently issued a stark assessment of the war and made dozens of recommendations -- but stepped aside after Bush nominated him to replace Rumsfeld. Gates had been president of Texas A&M University since 2002."

As Gates Takes Over, Report Finds Iraq Situation "Worse Than Ever." Coverage of Gates' swearing-in was largely overshadowed – particularly on TV – by a report that finds the level of violence in Iraq at a record high. ABC World News (12/18, lead story, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Talk about a tough first day on a job." Gates "takes over as Defense Secretary and the first thing he gets is the Pentagon's own assessment of the war in Iraq, saying things are worse than ever. The number of attacks are up 22%. Military casualties are up 32%. And civilian deaths up 60%, since February.

CBS Evening News (12/18, story 4, 2:35, Martin, 7.66M) also notes the report, while NBC Nightly News (12/18, story 2, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) said "this had to be a sobering first day on the job for America's new Secretary of Defense, who was sworn in today at the Pentagon, and then, hours later, was handed a grim new assessment of the situation in Iraq." Likewise, Fox News' Special Report (12/18, Hume) also reported on Gates, then said, "this on a day the Pentagon released its quarterly progress report on Iraq, which showed the violence was highest on record from August to November, up 22%. The levels pose a grave threat to political progress, which is deemed limited because Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's effort at national reconciliation is showing no indications of succeeding."

Joint Chiefs Unanimously Opposed To Iraq Troop "Surge." The Washington Post (12/19, A1, Wright, Baker, 690K), in an anonymously sourced front-page story titled, "White House, Joint Chiefs At Odds on Adding Troops," reports White House officials are "aggressively promoting" a plan for Iraq that includes a temporary "surge" of 15,000-30,000 troops in the face of the "unanimous disagreement" of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. According to the Post, the Joint Chiefs are of the opinion that the White House "still does not have a defined mission and is latching on to the surge idea in part because of limited alternatives, despite warnings about the potential disadvantages for the military." The JCS "have taken a firm stand…because they believe the strategy review will be the most important decision on Iraq to be made since the March 2003 invasion. At regular interagency meetings and in briefing President Bush last week, the Pentagon has warned that any short-term mission "may only set up the United States for bigger problems when it ends." Additionally, the JCS warn that a "surge" would provide "an enormous edge to virtually all the armed factions in Iraq -- including al-Qaeda's foreign fighters, Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias -- without giving an enduring boost to the U.S military mission or to the Iraqi army, the officials said." The Post goes on quote a "senior administration official" who says "it is 'too simplistic' to say the surge question has broken down into a fight between the White House and the Pentagon, but…acknowledged that the military has questioned the option."

Iraqi Satellite TV Station Gains Audience With Anti-US Programming. The Los Angeles Times (12/19, Daragahi, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports on Al Zawraa, the newly launched Iraqi satellite television channel. Al Zawraa is portrayed as "renegade" and "pro-insurgent…with a 24-hour diet of propaganda against U.S. forces and the Iraqi government" that "has become something of a sensation throughout the country." The Times adds, "Most hours of the day it plays footage of U.S. soldiers in Iraq being shot and blown up in insurgent attacks, often with religious chants or Saddam Hussein-era nationalist anthems in the background. There are segments warning Iraq's Sunni Arabs to be wary of Shiite Muslims, and occasional English-language commentary and subtitles clearly meant to demoralize U.S. troops. … It's not clear how big an Iraqi audience Al Zawraa captures. But its very presence demonstrates the insurgency's abilities. Despite 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq and intense diplomatic pressure on Iraq's neighbors, the station is able to circumvent U.S. and Iraqi forces and stage round-the-clock broadcasts, complete with news bulletins, graphics and commentary."

Documents Link Saddam With Chemical Attack On Kurds. The AP (12/19, By) reports Munqith al-Faroon, the chief prosecutor in Saddam Hussein's trial, "presented memos Monday from the ousted president's office approving chemical attacks against Kurdish villages, the most serious evidence against him in his genocide trial." al-Faroon "showed the Iraqi court trying Saddam and six other former regime members about 25 documents, including some presidential letters instructing the army to use 'special ammunition' — identified as 'mustard gas' — to quell a Kurdish rebellion in 1987. Some of the documents bore Saddam's signature, al-Faroon said."

Marine Will Be Charged In Haditha Case. The AP (12/18, Watkins) reports, "A Marine captain has been told he will be criminally charged in connection with the killing of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha, his attorney said Monday. Capt. Lucas McConnell, 31, was told by his commanding officer that he will be charged with dereliction of duty, said Kevin McDermott." McDermott said he and his client were "absolutely clueless" how McConnell could have committed dereliction, "adding that his client was not present during the killings. Separately, two [anonymous] military officials said a group of Marines would be charged Thursday for their alleged roles in the killings." The AP adds, "A parallel military investigation has examined whether officers in the Marines' chain of command tried to cover up the events. Results have not been made public."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Regulators Sue Three Former Fannie Mae Execs. The Washington Post (12/19, A1, Hilzenrath, 690K) reports federal regulators "sued three former Fannie Mae executives, including former chairman and chief executive Franklin D. Raines, to recoup more than $115 million in pay they received while the company's earnings were misstated." Regulators said Raines "and the others engaged in a variety of ruses to meet profit goals and boost their compensation. For example, they delayed booking $200 million of expenses one year and used transactions with no economic purpose in other periods simply to shift income into the future, the complaint alleged." The regulators' "discovery of accounting problems in 2004 ultimately led Fannie Mae to pay a $400 million penalty and correct years of financial results, erasing $6.3 billion of previously reported profit."

USA Today (12/19, Iwata, 2.27M) reports, "In a complaint with an administrative law judge, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight detailed 101 charges from 1998 to 2004 against Raines, former chief financial officer Timothy Howard and former controller Leanne Spencer, who all resigned in 2003 as the Fannie Mae scandal worsened." OFHEO is "seeking $100 million in penalties and $115 million in return of bonuses. The regulator also seeks the return of legal fees, and to bar the former executives from any future business with Fannie Mae."

The Wall Street Journal (12/19, Hagerty, Paletta, 2.04M) reports, "Responses from lawyers for the executives suggest that the regulator faces a long and difficult legal battle." The former executives "neglected internal controls, misapplied more than 20 accounting principles and misled the regulator and public, Ofheo Director James Lockhart charged in a statement. Fannie Mae recently announced a restatement of results that cut retained earnings as of June 30, 2004, by $6.3 billion." But "lawyers for all three executives denied the allegations, which Mr. Howard's attorney called 'a work of unsubstantiated fiction.' The lawyers' responses suggested that they will argue that Fannie's former accounting practices and internal controls were approved by outside auditors and Ofheo itself."

The New York Times (12/19, Peters, 1.16M) reports the charges "were the latest development in the fallout over accounting violations at Fannie Mae. After the housing oversight office denounced Fannie Mae in a scathing report in May, the company agreed to pay a $400 million settlement. Earlier this month, Fannie restated its earnings for several years, making a total of $6.3 billion in various corrections, to straighten out inaccuracies in its financial statements. It was one of the largest corporate accounting restatements on record."

The Washington Times (12/19, Gordon, 88K) reports Raines and Howard were "swept out of office two years ago in the multibillion-dollar accounting debacle at the government-sponsored company, which finances one of every five home loans in the United States. Fannie Mae earlier this month announced a long-awaited restatement for 2001 through June 30, 2004, that erased $6.3 billion in profit." Raines, "a prominent Washington figure who was White House budget director in the Clinton administration, led Fannie Mae -- with its legendary political clout, generosity in campaign contributions and lobbying savvy -- from 1999 until his ouster by the company board in December 2004."

SEC Opens "Formal" Investigation Of Broadcom Options Practices. Bloomberg (12/19, Brennan) reports, "Broadcom Corp., a chipmaker restating results to add $1.5 billion in payroll costs, said the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission has opened a 'formal" investigation into the company's options practices. Broadcom also canceled more than $37 million in stock options held by three unnamed individuals it holds responsible for manipulating their grant dates, the Irvine, California-based company said in a statement today. Broadcom said it took the actions as it finished an internal review of the matter." Cody Acree, Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst, in a note to investors: "The escalation of the SEC inquiry to formal status is a bit unsettling given the open-ended possibilities,"

Federal Investigators Find BP's Budget Cuts Led To Less Safety At Texas City Refinery. Financial Times (12/19, Mcnulty) reports on deterioration and safety problems at BP's Texas City refinery. Financial Times writes, "The US Department of Labor's Occupational Safety and Health Administration (Osha) uncovered more than 300 'egregious, wilful violations' in Texas City - BP's biggest refinery. BP did not admit guilt but agreed to a maximum allowable $21m fine and said it would spend $1bn improving and maintaining the refinery over the next five years. Many of the problems at the 70-year-old plant had, no doubt, been inherited by BP when it acquired the refinery in 1998 as part of its purchase of Amoco. Before the blast, the Texas City site had in 30 years suffered 23 fatalities - four since BP took over. But instead of making the investments needed to improve safety, BP in 1999 ordered a 25 per cent cut in fixed costs. Federal investigators would later conclude that these budget cuts caused a progressive deterioration in safety."

Study Casts Doubt On Directors' "Lucky" Options. The AP (12/19) reports, "About 1,400 corporate directors received option grants whose timing was manipulated, according to" a study conducted by academics at Harvard Law School, Cornell University, and INSEAD in France. The AP adds, "Of all options grants to directors, about 9 percent were received at 'lucky' times -- when the stock price was equal to a monthly low, according to a Harvard Law and Economics paper released Monday. After studying the period form 1996 to 2005, academics at Harvard Law School, Cornell University and INSEAD in France estimated that about 800 lucky grant events were the result of opportunistic timing." An abstract of the study is available online.,

On Monday, the Los Angeles Times (12/18, Kristof, 850K) reported, "Nearly 1,400 corporate board members appear to have profited from the manipulation of stock option grant dates over a 10-year period, according to a study being released today. The analysis raises the possibility that hundreds of board members were aware that options were backdated to boost their value to themselves and company executives. That could be seen as a conflict with their role as advocates for all company shareholders."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Reports Rise In Violent Crime Across Country. Media outlets across the country report on the FBI's Monday report, which said that violent crime rose 2.2 percent nationally in 2005. Coverage notes that local police chiefs have asked for more federal money to fight crime, but that money has not been forthcoming. For example, on ABC World News (12/18, story 5, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M), Stuart Thomas, Police Chief, Little Rock Police Department, said, "After September 11th, there was a kind of a shift in federal priorities. And what we saw was a reduction in some of the COPS hiring grants." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (12/19, A1, Eggen, 690K) and Los Angeles Times (12/19, Schmitt, 850K) both note potential political ramifications.

ABC World News (12/18, story 5, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The FBI today published its statistics for the first half of 2006; and there's a troubling increase in the number of violent crimes – particularly robberies, which soared almost 10% -- with increases in areas where you might not expect to find them." ABC (Thomas) added, "Across the nation, robbery is surging at an extraordinary pace," and that "spike is indicative of an overall rise of violent crime. … Why the surge? A resurgence of gangs, career criminals returning home after years in prison, and large numbers of teenagers with guns. … Many police complain the federal money is drying up. They say the government has become so preoccupied with homeland security, it has forgotten about neighborhood security." Stuart Thomas, Police Chief, Little Rock Police Department: "After September 11th, there was a kind of a shift in federal priorities. And what we saw was a reduction in some of the COPS hiring grants." Thomas: "Police fear if drastic steps aren't taken now, an epidemic of violence could be on the horizon."

CBS Evening News (12/18, story 7, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A spike in murders and robberies tops our news briefing tonight, which also includes an arrest in a serial murder case." CBS (Strassman) added, "In every region of America, violent crime is getting worse. … The Justice Department is studying why, but many police chiefs say their departments are just stretched too thin." NBC Nightly News (12/18, story 6, 0:35, Williams, 9.87M) also noted the details of the FBI statistics, saying the report showed "a significant increase in violent crime."

The AP (12/19, Jordan) reports, "The Bush administration has asked for $1.2 billion in crime-fighting grants and assistance programs this year," which International Association of Chiefs of Police counsel Gene Voegtlin "described as at least a $1 billion hit from funding levels a decade ago. Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department is encouraged by a 2.6 percent drop in property crimes -- such as auto theft and other larcenies -- as outlined in the FBI report. But 'we are again concerned about the increase in violent crime in some cities and towns,' he said."

Under the headline "Violent Crime Is Up For 2nd Straight Year," the Washington Post (12/19, A1, Eggen, 690K) adds, "The numbers are certain to increase pressure on the Bush administration, whose detractors say local police concerns have been slighted by the focus on homeland security and counterterrorism. The Justice Department inspector general's office has reported sharp declines in the number of FBI agents and investigations dedicated to traditional crimes since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks."

The New York Times (12/19, Blumenthal, 1.16M) reports Voegtlin "said that since 1997, federal grants to local police agencies had decreased to $890 million from $2.4 billion. … The West led the increase in violent crime, up 4.7 percent. … The Northeast had the smallest increase in violent crime, 2.9 percent. The South led in homicides, up 3.3 percent. Many cities showed increases in homicides: Miami was up to 30 from 23; Indianapolis to 68 from 44; Boston to 37 from 29; and Detroit to 186 from 169." The Washington Times (12/19, Seper, 88K) notes, "Last year, the number of violent crimes increased by 2.5 percent, the largest gain in 15 years, and the Justice Department pledged to determine why the crime numbers were continuing to increase. A report on the matter has not yet been completed."

The Los Angeles Times (12/19, Schmitt, 850K) reports, "If the trend of rising crime continues, it could become a political issue in the 2008 election. … 'Violent street crime did not go away on Sept. 11,' said James O. Pasco Jr., executive director of the Fraternal Order of Police." Pasco added that "though 'the same or additional resources are needed to fight those crimes,' in many cases less money is being spent." The Times notes, "Federal aid to state and local police declined to about $890 million in 2006 from $2.5 billion in 2001. Police departments are being squeezed by growing domestic security duties at a time when federal agencies such as the FBI are focusing more on preventing terrorism than assisting local departments fighting traditional crimes."

Local Newspapers Add Local Statistics. Smaller media outlets add local statistics to their reports on the FBI statistics.. For example, the San Francisco Chronicle (12/19, Bulwa, 384K) reports, "Driven by a surge in armed robberies, violent crime rose in the Bay Area and around the country during the first six months of this year, the FBI said Monday in a report that raised concern that the drop in crime that started in the 1990s has turned around." The Dayton (OH) Daily News (12/19, McCall) reports, "Mirroring a nationwide trend, newly released FBI data showed violent crime increased by 6.4 percent in the city of Dayton during the first six months of 2006. … The numbers reflect what police across the country have been saying for months: that the lull in crime between 2001 and 2004 appears to be over." The Richmond Times-Dispatch (12/19) reports, "[I]n the metro Richmond area, the picture is not as bleak. In the first six months of 2006, Richmond saw a 14 percent decline in violent crime, despite a two-man killing spree that started the year."

Gonzales Considers Investigating Duke Lacrosse Prosecutor. WSOC-TV Charlotte, NC (12/18, 5:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says he might investigate DA Mike Nifong's handling of the Duke lacrosse rape case. Earlier this month, a state representative said Nifong violated the player's civil rights during the calling them names in the press. David Evans, Collin Finnerty and Reade Seligmann are expected to go on trial next year." WRAL-TV Raleigh, NC (12/18, 6:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is talking about the Duke Lacrosse rape case. North Carolina Congressman Walter B .Jones wants the Justice Department to investigate DA Mike Nifong's actions. In an interview with FOX News, Gonzales said the lacrosse rape case is one his office could investigate."

WRAZ-TV Raleigh, NC (12/18, 7:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "For the first time, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is talking about the Duke Lacrosse rape case and whether the suspects' civil rights were violated. A North Carolina Congressman is asking Gonzales and the Justice Department to investigate district attorney Mike Nifong's actions. Anything beyond that in an interview with FOX news, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said his office has made no decision, but acknowledged this issue is one it could investigate. Gonzales: Well, but even in connection with the state and local matter, if an investigation is conducted in such a way that civil rights laws are violated, that would be something that we might look into. Friday Defense Attorneys for the three defendants asked for the case to be moved out of Durham, and criticized the way DNA evidence was revealed. Cheshire: None of the DNA that was found of these numerous males matched the lacrosse players." WTVD-TV (12/18, 12:00 p.m.) in Raleigh, NC, also broadcasted this story. KVVU-TV (12/18, 5:00 a.m.) in Las Vegas and WGHP-TV (12/18, 5:00 a.m.) in Greensboro, NC, also broadcasted this story.

`Defendants' Supporters Ask Duke Officials To Call For Investigation. The Durham Herald Sun (12/19, Gronberg) reports, "Supporters of the three Duke lacrosse rape defendants on Monday asked university officials to join U.S. Rep. Walter Jones in calling for a federal civil-rights investigation of District Attorney Mike Nifong's handling of the case. The group Friends of Duke University said that while that wouldn't force Duke President Richard Brodhead or other administrators to take a position about the guilt or innocence of the accused men, it would support 'the undeniable proposition that public information suggests there is a sufficient likelihood of civil-rights violations' to merit U.S. Department of Justice scrutiny."

Witness Says Police Shot Unarmed Man In Back During Katrina Aftermath. On its Web site, CNN (12/18, Griffin, Polk, Albright-Hanna) reports, "New Orleans police lined up 'like at a firing range' and fatally shot an unarmed man in the back as he fled from them in the days after Hurricane Katrina swept ashore, a witness to the shooting told CNN." This statement "marks the first time a witness has come forward publicly with information about the shooting of Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally retarded man whose death has sparked a police investigation and a grand jury probe into what happened in and around the Danziger Bridge that day." CNN adds, "Initial police accounts said that Madison reached for his waistband and turned on police, but Gaston said Madison did not appear to have a weapon and that he was running away from police 'hands out, full speed' when he was shot."

Inmate Charged With Fashioning Letter Bomb. The Washington Post (12/19, A15, Markon, 690K) reports that Rodney Curtis Hamrick, a prisoner at Leavenworth, "was charged yesterday with fashioning a letter bomb and mailing it to the federal courthouse in Richmond, authorities said." He "mailed the bomb in October 2005, along with a letter several days later that contained a powdery substance labeled 'anthrax,' federal law enforcement officials said. Tests indicated that the substance was not anthrax."

Post Opposes Two DC Measures Aimed To Help Ex-Offenders. The Washington Post (12/19, A28, 690K) editorializes, "Creating better conditions for the reentry and rehabilitation of offenders is a worthy goal, and not just for the men and women released from prison. The community's interest is served if ex-offenders build crime-free lives. But two measures being considered by the D.C. Council to help offenders, no matter how well-intentioned, are cause for serious concern and, if approved, would undermine public safety." The Post considers council member Marion Barry's effort to amend the "Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination in employment or housing based upon an arrest or conviction record" the "most problematic." The Post writes, "No one is against giving people a second chance, but this bill goes too far." Another bill "would greatly expand the conditions for expungement, or sealing, of criminal records."

The Post writes, "As Patricia A. Riley, special counsel to the U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia, testified, it 'tips the scales too far against the public interest and public safety.'"

Abramoff Defending Self In Lawsuits By Indian Tribes. Legal Times (12/19, Palmer) reports after "paying for a high-priced criminal defense by Chadbourne & Parke's Abbe Lowell in the government's corruption probe, former uber-lobbyist-turned-jailbird Jack Abramoff is taking a different approach in two lawsuits filed against him by Indian tribes." Abramoff is "representing himself against former client Louisiana Coushatta Tribe and the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas. So far, Abramoff has piggybacked on motions filed by lawyers for former Christian Coalition head Ralph Reed and former Abramoff associate Michael Scanlon in the Texas case."

Attorneys Starting To See More Settlements Creating Charitable Donations. Law.com (12/19, Geier) reports on a "creative flair" appearing in legal settlements. Law.com writes, "Civil actions ending in creative settlements that do more than put money into the pockets of plaintiffs and their lawyers are unusual, but attorneys are starting to see more of them. … Lawyers involved in settling cases that result in charitable donations acknowledge that parties in some instances gain in improved public relations and financial benefits such as tax breaks. They also note that the prospect of a defendant's gaining any such advantage can discourage plaintiffs from charitable settlements." Law.com adds, "Insurance companies and self-insured defendants would rather contribute to a public good than pay money to an individual. But the public seldom hears about the contributions because defendants do not want their payments to appear to be admissions of liability."

Company Uses Technology To Better Respond To Email Discovery Requests. On Law.com (12/19) Edward Kelley, assistant general counsel at Transatlantic Reinsurance Company, writes, "Any attorney or in-house counsel who relies on e-mail for evidence or litigation support knows that e-mail discovery is among the most mind-numbing, inefficient processes that enterprises face. And in today's highly regulated business climate, e-mail messages have become one of the most scrutinized and sought after categories of business records." Kelley reviews his employer's travails in creating efficient discovery processes for email. He writes, "The technology we now employ is sophisticated -- using advanced weighting algorithms to help index our e-mail-specific metadata and accurately establish e-mail rank, giving each e-mail a relevancy score. … By reducing our e-mail review time, as a company we can respond even more rapidly and confidently to regulatory inquiries. This resource has freed up our legal team to respond faster and move on to more strategic work."

Texas Supreme Court Says Courts Can Reduce Attorney Fees As Well As Damages. Law.com (12/19, Robbins) reports, "In a unanimous decision, the Texas Supreme Court has ruled for the first time that two legal principles appellate courts use to limit or overturn damage awards also can be applied to attorney fees. On Dec. 1, the Supreme Court affirmed the 1st Court of Appeals' decision to significantly reduce the damages awarded in Barker and Barker v. Eckman, a suit involving the distribution of proceeds from the sale of bull semen collected, stored and sold under a bailment agreement. The high court concluded that the Houston appeals court was correct when it held that the statute of limitations barred breaches of the agreement that occurred more than four years before Walter Eckman sued Emzy and Ava Barker. … In his analysis finding that the Barkers are entitled to a meaningful evidentiary review of the attorney fees awarded, Supreme Court Justice Phillip Johnson, author of the opinion, cited 1996's Saenz v. Fidelity & Guaranty Insurance Underwriters. The Supreme Court made it clear in Saenz that a court of appeals must conduct a meaningful review to determine whether sufficient evidence supports a jury's award of mental anguish damages."

Schwarzenegger Orders Fix For California Execution Procedures. The Los Angeles Times (12/19, Weinstein, 850K) reports California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "directed his administration to fix problems with the state's procedure to execute prisoners." Schwarzenegger's action came "in response to a stinging decision issued Friday by U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose, who said the state's system 'is broken, but ..can be fixed.'" Fogel, "who visited the death chamber in San Quentin and held a four-day hearing in September, said the state's current procedures involving lethal injection violates the Constitution's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment." Fogel listed "a number of problems with how the death penalty is implemented in California, including inconsistent and unreliable screening of execution team members, poorly trained staff, inconsistent and unreliable record keeping of drugs used in the process, improper mixing, preparation and administration of drugs administered by the execution team, overcrowded conditions and poorly designed facilities in which the execution team must work."

ANTITRUST:

FCC Commissioner Recuses Self From Voting On AT&T Merger. The Washington Post (12/19, D1, Sipress, 690K) reports, "Federal Communications Commissioner Robert M. McDowell announced yesterday that he would disqualify himself from voting on AT&T's proposed purchase of BellSouth on ethical grounds, depriving the FCC of a potential swing vote that could have broken the stalemate among its Democratic and Republican members." He "felt compelled to silence speculation over whether he would take part in the vote" and "accused his colleagues of failing to negotiate in good faith over conditions for approving the $86 billion merger proposed seven months ago." McDowell had "previously worked as senior vice president for Comptel, an association that lobbied on behalf of companies competing with AT&T and BellSouth."

The Wall Street Journal (12/19, A3, Schatz, 2.04M) reports that McDowell's decision "was an unwelcome development for the companies, which had been counting on the Republican to break the impasse that has paralyzed the agency's review of the deal." His action "increases the likelihood that AT&T will be forced to accept some conditions involving 'net neutrality,' or the idea that all Internet traffic should be treated equally. However, it also sweeps away uncertainty about who will vote, which has slowed negotiations on merger conditions."

USA Today (12/19, 3B, Cauley, 2.27M) reports, "Earlier this month FCC general counsel Sam Feder said that McDowell could vote on the deal. McDowell said he had hoped Feder's recommendation would provide him with the 'legal equivalent of body armor.' Instead, he said, 'I was handed Swiss cheese.' After conferring with several advisers, including the executive branch's Office of Government Ethics, McDowell decided to 'follow my own personal sense of ethics' and 'disqualify myself from this matter.'"

LATimes Approves Of McDowell Decision. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/19, 850K) writes, "It's unclear whether he acted out of principle or obligation, but Robert M. McDowell made the right choice Monday. … McDowell has publicly called for fewer regulations and has questioned the need for Net neutrality rules. No matter. At least McDowell got to act principled — in announcing his decision, he used the words 'ethics' or 'ethical' 33 times in five pages."

Express Scripts Attempt To Outbid CVS For Caremark. The Washington Post (12/19, D1, Shin, 690K) reports, "Pharmacy-benefit manager Express Scripts yesterday attempted to outbid retail pharmacy giant CVS for Caremark Rx with an offer of $26 billion in cash and stock, joining a flurry of year-end mergers and acquisitions. The proposal stunned many investors and marked the first shot in what could become a protracted battle over who gets to be the nation's leading filler of drug prescriptions. … Caremark and CVS last month agreed to what was characterized as a merger of equals, with CVS offering Caremark shareholders $22.5 million in stock. The combination of Caremark, the nation's second-largest pharmacy-benefit manager, and CVS, the second-largest pharmacy retailer, would create the biggest private-sector buyer of prescription drugs, responsible for managing more than 1 billion prescriptions a year."

USA Today (12/19, 1B, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "While investors may think the Express Scripts cash-and-stock offer is more attractive than the $21 billion CVS all-stock deal, management at Caremark and CVS may be convinced that theirs is the better long-term move, says Merrill Lynch analyst Tom Gallucci in a research note to investors. … Analyst Robert Willoughby at Bank of America wrote in his note Monday about the Express Scripts bid that Caremark's board will be 'hard-pressed to credibly thwart such an offer.'"

CVS Could "Sweeten" Bid, Analysts Say. The Dow Jones Newswires (12/18, Covert) reports, "[A]nalysts say CVS, of Woonsocket, R.I., could sweeten its bid, which had been perceived as low by Wall Street. In addition to its healthy balance sheet, CVS, in acquiring Nashville-based Caremark, could use the target company's strong cash flow to pay down debt it might take on to fund a bigger price tag. Analysts add that a deal with CVS would likely be more attractive to regulators, as an Express Scripts deal risks greater antitrust concerns."

Biomet Agrees To Private Buyout, Finds Backdated Options Grants. The New York Times (12/19, Feder, 1.16M) reports, "Biomet, a major manufacturer of artificial hips and knees, said today that it had agreed to be acquired by a private investment consortium for $10.9 billion. The buyout bid came from affiliates of the Blackstone Group, Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and TPG." Additionally, Biomet "announced today that a board committee's review of the company's options-dating practices back to 1996 had uncovered numerous cases of option grants backdated to create immediate profits for the recipients, as well as shortcomings in the company's records."

The Wall Street Journal (12/19, C4, Carey, Vuocolo, 2.04M) reports, "The Warsaw, Ind., company said that if its shareholders agree to the deal, they will receive $44 a common share from a private-equity group that includes affiliates of Blackstone Group, Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Texas Pacific Group. The price represents a 27% premium to the stock's closing price in early April, a few days before Biomet said it had hired Morgan Stanley to help it look at strategic alternatives. That move came a week after the resignation of Dane Miller, Biomet's co-founder and its chief executive officer for 29 years. Mr. Miller is expected to be an investor in the new private company once the deal closes in October 2007."

The AP (12/19, Martin) reports,Linda Varoli, vice president of merger research with the New York-based Wall Street Access, said the $10.9 billion purchase price — which will be paid with cash and loans — reflects the potential of the industry, which has been rattled recently by antitrust concerns. In June, Biomet and three other orthopedics makers announced they had received subpoenas stemming from possible criminal violations in the manufacturing and sale of orthopedic implant devices."

Apollo Management To Buy Out Realogy. The AP (12/19) reports, "-- The parent of Century 21 and Coldwell Banker real estate brokerages said it is being acquired by an affiliate of private equity firm Apollo Management LP for about $6.65 billion in cash. The buyout of Realogy Corp. includes about $1.6 billion in debt and other liabilities of roughly $750 million, the brokerage said late Sunday. Realogy also owns Sotheby's International Realty."

EU Clears Merck To Buy Serono. The AP (12/19) reports, "EU regulators on Monday cleared Germany's Merck KGaA to buy Swiss biotechnology company Serono SA. The European Commission cleared the deal automatically after identifying no antitrust problems and receiving no complaints from rivals within a deadline of 25 working days."

Milberg Weiss Dismissed From Antitrust Case. The New York Times (12/19, 1.16M) reports, "Milberg Weiss & Bershad, the law firm accused of paying plaintiffs to bring class-action lawsuits, was removed yesterday as one of the lead firms in an antitrust case against carmakers over Canadian imports. Federal District Judge D. Brock Hornby in Maine granted a request by the carmakers to remove Milberg Weiss as the vice chairman of the plaintiffs' executive committee." The Times notes, "Milberg Weiss and two of its partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman, were indicted in May on charges they paid clients to sue companies for securities fraud."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

States Sue EPA Over Soot Levels. The AP (12/19) reports, "More than a dozen states sued the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency on Monday to lower soot levels from smokestacks and exhaust pipes, a move state officials argue would save thousands of lives. The states argue that the Bush administration is ignoring science and its own experts in refusing to slightly reduce the allowed threshold for soot. The lawsuit is the latest salvo against the Bush administration, which has repeatedly come under fire for what some states and environmentalists have said is its lack of commitment to environmental issues." The AP adds, "Officials from California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Maine, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont and the District of Columbia joined New York in the action filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Milwaukee SAC Says Post 9/11 FBI "Much More Proactive." The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (12/19, 255K) runs excerpts from reporter Gina Barton's recent interview with FBI Milwaukee SAC Richard K. Ruminski. Barton: "How have things in the FBI changed since 9-11?" Ruminski: "We've completely changed our focus from being mainly a criminal investigative agency that also worked counter-intelligence matters. We are now in a status where we're trying to be much more proactive. We went from a reactive agency to much more proactive because of our newest responsibility of detecting and preventing terrorism, which is a very difficult task." Barton: "Sen. Herb Kohl recently asked the national FBI director to send more crime-fighting resources to Milwaukee. Do you think the FBI needs to get more involved in solving Milwaukee's crime problem?" Ruminski: "We have been extremely involved in the violent crime area. We work gangs, we work narcotics investigations, but we work them in task force settings. We had numerous arrests here of gang members several weeks back. … We address some of the more complex (criminal) enterprise organizations…in a task force setting."

FBI Casts Wider Skills Net In Post-9/11 Recruiting Push. The Mobile (AL) Press-Register (12/18, Kirby) reported, "The prototypical FBI agent in the J. Edgar Hoover days was a lawyer or accountant. Today's ideal candidate is more likely to be a computer whiz who is fluent in a second language. Finding new agents with that kind of background can be challenging, especially since they must also pass a background check, lie detector test and physical fitness trial, as well as survive a written test, an oral interview and 18 weeks of training at Quantico, Va. Former Special Agent Craig Dahle was in charge of recruiting for the Mobile field office until his retirement last month. In that role, he was one of the men and women responsible for trying to achieve the agency's national recruiting goal of 1,000 new agents for the fiscal year that ended in September. The bureau fell short of that target, hiring 791 agents. 'A thousand is extremely ambitious because the process of getting hired as an FBI special agent is unlike any other job, I'd dare say,' Dahle said." The Press-Register noted, "The FBI has aggressively stepped up its hiring since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, taking on an average of 873 agents a year since 9/11 compared with an annual average of 632 in the five previous years. … The FBI also has hired 4,886 support staff since 9/11, Dahle said. These include analysts and computer experts, he said. … 'There's been a lot of hiring in that area that would not have happened had 9/11 not happened,' he said."

Accused ATF Shooters Make First Court Appearance. The Macon Telegraph (12/19, 59K) reports, "Two suspects in the shooting and wounding of two federal agents have made their first court appearance. Chardriguez Durden, 23, of Stone Mountain is charged with six counts of aggravated assault on a police officer and violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act. Paul Thompson Jr., 19, of Covington is charged with violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act."

Advocates Say Marijuana Is California's Top Cash Crop. On its Web site, KESQ, Palm Desert, California (12/19) reports that a new report "says marijuana is California's number one cash crop, worth some 14-billion dollars a year. That's despite an all-out crack-down campaign by the feds against the drug. Medicinal marijuana advocates say it's California's number one cash crop simply because it's illegal." KESQ also notes DEA raids on marijuana dispensaries such as CannaHelp and Palm Springs Caregivers and reports anti-prohibition advocates "say classifying marijuana as illegal is the problem."

Report's Author Claims "War On Drugs" Is Failing. The UK's Guardian (12/19) says the author of the report, Jon Gettman, "says the figures show the war on drugs is not working: 'Illicit marijuana cultivation provides considerable unreported revenue for growers without corresponding tax obligations to compensate the public for the social and fiscal costs related to [its] use.' His suggestion that the crop be legalized and taxed was rejected by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, which pointed to countries with large drug cash crops, notably Colombia and Afghanistan."

Financial Gains Disputed. The Washington Times/UPI (12/18) reported Gettman "advocates removing marijuana from the federal list of hard-core Schedule 1 drugs and treating it like tobacco and alcohol by legalizing and reaping a tax windfall, while also controlling production and distribution to better restrict use by minors. [The ONDCP's] Tom Riley…disagreed, and said coca has plagued Colombia and opium poppies are a disaster for Afghanistan."

Meth Use Possibly Linked To Rise In Violent Crimes. The Washington Post (12/19, A1, Eggen, 690K) reports a "surge in violent crime that began last year accelerated in the first half of 2006, the FBI reported yesterday, providing the clearest signal yet that the historic drop in the U.S. crime rate has ended and is being reversed. … Many communities, particularly those in urbanized areas, may be headed into a period of sustained crime increases, they said. While no one is certain of the causes, experts cited an increase in the number of young men in their crime-prone years, diminished crime-fighting assistance from the federal government, fewer jobs for people with marginal skills and even the ongoing growth in methamphetamine use in some places."

IMMIGRATION:

High-Tech Substitutes For Immigrant Labor Found To Be Rare. The Wall Street Journal (12/19, Kronholz, 2.04M) reports, "With the country deeply divided over immigration, some economists and policy makers are suggesting that technological innovations could offer a way out of the economy's reliance on illegal workers." However, "it's unlikely that mechanization will reduce the demand for illegal immigrants anytime soon. For most of the jobs they do, there's no easy high-tech substitute."

TAX:

Tax Preparation Firms Under Fire For Expensive Holiday Loans. NBC Nightly News (12/18, story 5, 2:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Some of this nation's biggest tax preparing firms are offering a new product, so called holiday loans that give customers up front money to pay for Christmas gifts, but at a high price." NBC (Corke) added, "It is a major twist on something the tax prep firms have been doing for years, figuring out your refund and lend you that amount. You pay them back when Uncle Sam's check arrives. Holiday loans are available in December. Instead of a W-2 form, you bring in a pay stub, the tax firm estimates your refund, and lends you that amount." Mark Winston Griffith, consumer advocate: "They are marketed to people at a time when they are probably most vulnerable." Corke: "Consumer advocates criticized the low pressures, interest sometimes tops 300%. So a $100 loan can cost $400 if it is held for a year."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Brownback To Allow Vote On Michigan Judge. The New York Times (12/19, Lewis, 1.16M) reports Sen. Sam Brownback (R), "who blocked the confirmation" of Michigan state Judge Janet Neff to the Federal District Court "because she attended a same-sex commitment ceremony for the daughter of her long-time neighbors, says he will now allow a vote on the nomination." Brownback, who has "been criticized for blocking the nomination, said he would also no longer press a proposed solution he offered on Dec. 8 that garnered even more criticism: that he would remove his block if Judge Neff agreed to recuse herself from all cases involving same-sex unions." Brownback said "he still believed Judge Neff's behavior raised serious questions about her impartiality and that he was likely to vote against her," but he added he "did not realize his proposal — asking a nominee to agree in advance to remove herself from deciding a whole category of cases — was so unusual as to be possibly unprecedented."

WSJournal Criticizes Concept Of "Independent" Ethics Enforcer. The Wall Street Journal (12/19, 2.04M) editorializes, "Congressional mores could certainly use an upgrade, but it pays to beware of reformers promising to clean up politics by letting someone else do the dirty work. Exhibit A is the strange new enthusiasm for an 'independent' office of public integrity for Congress." One "warning sign is that the proposal is being marketed by the same folks who gave us 'independent counsels' such as Lawrence Walsh and Ken Starr for the executive branch, as well as the glories of 'campaign finance reform.'" A "better name for such an 'independent' ethics body would be the office of public buck-passing, because it would allow Congress to spare itself the heavy political lifting of judging colleagues. Handing over that duty to outsiders would make Congress less politically accountable, not more, while creating a whole new set of political problems and disputes."

Leahy Promises Oversight Of Executive Branch. Editor & Publisher (12/18, Fitzgerald) reports, "In a little-noticed speech last week at Georgetown University Law Center, U.S. Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) lamented the recent congressional acquiescence to the Bush administration's secrecy, and promised to restore the constitutional balance between the executive and legislative branches of government." Leahy "said he will work to strengthen open-government laws, and to provide more congressional oversight of the White House."

OTHER NEWS:

Polonium Poisoning Said To Hold Lessons For Possible Terror Attacks. Peter D. Zimmerman, chief scientist of the United States Senate Foreign Relations Committee from 2001 to 2003, writes in the New York Times (12/19, 1.16M), "The exotic murder-by-polonium of the former KGB spy Alexander Litvinenko has embroiled Russia, Britain and Germany in a diplomatic scuffle and a hunt for more traces of the lethal substance. But it also throws into question most of the previous analyses of 'dirty bombs,' terrorist attacks using radioactive isotopes wrapped in explosives (or using other dispersion techniques) to spread radioactive material in crowded areas. Essentially all analysts, myself included, played down the possibility of using alpha radiation…as a source of dirty bombs. We concentrated instead on isotopes that emit penetrating gamma rays, which are basically super-powered packets of light, hard to shield and effective at a yard or more." As a result, "a near-term goal should to require specific licensing of any person or company seeking to purchase alpha sources stronger than one millicurie, about a third of a lethal dose. A longer-term goal ought to be eliminating nearly all use of polonium in industry through other technologies. That is a technical challenge and would cost some money, but it would certainly be less expensive than coping with the devastation of a smoky bomb."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Prosecutors Drop A.C.L.U. Subpoena In Document Fight (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

Federal prosecutors in New York yesterday withdrew a subpoena to the American Civil Liberties Union that had sought to retrieve all copies of a classified document.

In an opaque and defensive four-page letter to the judge in the case, the prosecutors said they were acting "in light of changed circumstances" and their determination that "the grand jury can obtain the evidence necessary to its investigation from other sources."

Another factor may have played a role. A transcript of a closed hearing in the case that was unsealed yesterday suggested the government was going to lose.

Anthony D. Romero, the A.C.L.U.'s executive director, sounded jubilant in describing the development. "The government blinked in this standoff," Mr. Romero said. The subpoena was unusual in that it sought not only to gather evidence but also to confiscate all tangible traces of the information in the document, apparently with the goal of preventing its distribution.

The document itself, declassified Friday and released by the A.C.L.U. yesterday, was not obviously confidential. An "information paper" dated Dec. 20, 2005, it was marked "secret" at the top and bottom of each of its four pages. The A.C.L.U. said it received the document in an unsolicited e-mail message in October.

The document collected a number of policies concerning photographs of enemy prisoners of war. Journalists, the document said, "are generally permitted, and to some extent even encouraged, to photograph" prisoners "from point-of-capture throughout the entire detainment process," though they are discouraged from showing recognizable faces.

The document was dated almost two years after photographs of abuse at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq were first made public and during the debate over the Detainee Treatment Act, which included an amendment introduced by Senator John McCain prohibiting the cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment of detainees. President Bush signed the bill 10 days later.

A lawyer for the A.C.L.U. said that the document was potentially embarrassing, but that its release hardly endangered the national defense.

"If you read between the lines," said the lawyer, Charles S. Sims, a First Amendment specialist at Proskauer Rose, "what it really says is that we want to exploit group photos of detainees." The implicit instruction in the document, he said, was this: "If pictures of detainees can help sell the war, go for it."

The effort to retrieve all copies of the document was a novel and, according to many legal experts, improper use of a grand jury subpoena. The subpoena cited a provision of the espionage laws that requires people in possession of some sorts of national security information to return it to the government if asked. But the A.C.L.U. said that the document at issue did not qualify and that, in any event, a subpoena was the wrong way to enforce the law.

In a transcript of a closed hearing in the case on Dec. 11 that was unsealed yesterday, Judge Jed S. Rakoff of Federal District Court in Manhattan seemed to indicate grave reservations about the tactic.

"What's the authority for saying that a subpoenaed party can't keep a copy of any document that they produced to the grand jury?" Judge Rakoff asked Jennifer G. Rodgers, an assistant United States attorney. Ms. Rodgers did not provide a direct answer, and yesterday's letter withdrawing the subpoena did not address the question.

Later in the hearing, Judge Rakoff compared the situation to the Nixon administration's effort to stop The New York Times and The Washington Post from publishing a secret history of the Vietnam War.

"There seems to be a huge difference," Judge Rakoff said, "between investigating a wrongful leak of a classified document and demanding back all copies of it, and I'm old enough to remember a case called the Pentagon Papers."

In yesterday's letter, Ms. Rodgers suggested that the A.C.L.U. had set up the government, creating a fight that could have been resolved informally.

"The government has attempted to pursue its investigation and its request for the document at issue in as amicable, cooperative and unobtrusive a manner as possible," she wrote. The A.C.L.U. filed a motion to quash the subpoena, she wrote, even though "the matter might be something the parties could negotiate without litigation, which always remained the government's strong preference."

In an interview, Mr. Sims said of Ms. Rodgers's letter, "Virtually every factoid in that presentation is entirely false."

Judge Rakoff, too, in last week's argument, appeared unconvinced by the government's contention that it thought the matter could have been resolved short of litigation.

"It's not easy to believe," Judge Rakoff said, "that the A.C.L.U., despite its history, would be cooperative. Well, hope springs eternal."

Mr. Romero, the A.C.L.U.'s executive director, said the case would have a lasting impact. "It certainly helps the press and whistle-blowers to resist the strong-arm efforts of the government," he said.

For ACLU, A Victory In Standoff With U.S. (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

Federal prosecutors yesterday dropped their demand that the American Civil Liberties Union turn over all copies of a "secret" document the organization had obtained, after the government was roundly criticized for using a grand jury subpoena in an attempt to seize the material.

The government's unprecedented legal move demanded "any and all copies of the document" in an apparent attempt to keep the ACLU from using the information. It was part of a broader grand jury investigation into leaks of classified information that, in this case, included the Army directive about photographing enemy prisoners, federal prosecutors confirmed yesterday.

The ACLU hailed the government's retreat as a victory. "This was a legal standoff with enormous implications for free speech and the public's right to know, and today the government blinked," said ACLU Executive Director Anthony D. Romero. "The Bush administration's attempt to suppress information using the grand jury process was truly chilling and is unprecedented in law and in our history as an organization."

But the Justice Department said, in effect, that the ACLU had instigated the fight and had told the government that filing the subpoena would be the first step toward the ACLU turning over the document.

In a letter to U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff of New York, prosecutors said the government issued the demand based on "what it believed to be the ACLU's representation, through counsel, that the ACLU was requesting a subpoena in lieu of voluntary cooperation."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department had tried to handle the matter in a way that was as "amicable, cooperative and as unobtrusively as possible."

Charles S. Sims, who represented the ACLU in the case, called the government's contention "the most preposterous thing I've ever heard." He said it's "inconceivable" an ACLU lawyer would have ever requested the broad subpoena that the government issued.

The government's demand for "any and all copies of the documents" drew the ire of civil libertarians and newspaper editorial boards, which said federal prosecutors were going far beyond established precedents and were trying to suppress information rather than investigating who leaked the document.

The 3 1/2 -page document, which the ACLU had maintained would be only "mildly embarrassing" to the government, was an "information paper" prepared by a judge advocate for the 101st Airborne Division. It told soldiers not to photograph enemy prisoners of war and detainees.

The document is dated Dec. 20, 2005, more than a year after the military was scandalized by photos of prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib in Iraq.

Romero said the documents "raise the question of whether the guidelines were in place prior to the Abu Ghraib scandal and if not, why it took more than a year after the scandal to issue a policy."

ACLU lawyer Sims said there was nothing in the document that ever should have been classified, and was indicative of the Bush administration's tendency toward secrecy.

A transcript of last week's closed hearing on the issue, unsealed yesterday, shows Rakoff skeptical of the government's use of a grand jury subpoena.

He said there is a "huge difference between investigating a wrongful leak of a classified document and demanding back all copies of it." He added that he was "old enough to remember a case called the Pentagon Papers," the Supreme Court decision that concerned prior restraint of publication of leaked government documents.

Govt. Cedes In ACLU Fight Over Document (HC/AP)

By Larry Neumeister Associated Press Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, December 19, 2006

NEW YORK — After demanding that the American Civil Liberties Union turn over a classified document it had been given and prove it had destroyed every copy of it, the government agreed Monday to make the document about photographs of detainees public.

The document _ marked "secret" in bold but small print on the top of its first page _ described when and how the military Public Affairs Office permits the media to photograph enemy prisoners of war and detainees in Iraq. It was dated more than a year after the release of pictures of American soldiers tormenting Iraqi detainees at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

"We were in a standoff, and the government blinked," said ACLU Executive Director Anthony D. Romero.

DOJ_NMG_0107536

The civil rights group has said that it was handed a grand jury subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan on Nov. 20, nearly a month after the ACLU received the document unsolicited and soon after it refused to comply with a prosecutor's demands to turn it over.

The ACLU fought the request, claiming the government's move was an attempt to discourage scrutiny.

The document says that the news media and the Public Affairs Office are permitted to photograph prisoners and detainees as long as the photography cannot be interpreted as holding the subjects of the photographs "up to public curiosity." It also says U.S. soldiers were prohibited from photographing prisoners and detainees unless that was required as part of a photographer's official duties.

It was declassified Friday, said U.S. Attorney Jennifer G. Rodgers.

In a letter Monday to U.S. District Judge Jed. S. Rakoff, she asked for the subpoena to be withdrawn "in light of changed circumstances," including that the grand jury can get the information it needs elsewhere. She said the subpoena was issued only after the ACLU's attorneys asked for it to establish a "process" for handing over the papers.

U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff said that going forward all court filings in the matter will be "presumptively public" unless he orders otherwise.

Romero said the document was "at best mildly embarrassing" because it might indicate that the government had waited a long time after the Abu Ghraib scandal to strengthen its photography guidelines.

Justice Department Heads Off Legal Battle With ACLU (NYSUN)

By Josh Gerstein

New York Sun, December 19, 2006

The Justice Department has headed off a First Amendment battle with the American Civil Liberties Union by dropping a grand jury subpoena demanding that the group turn over all copies of a document the government said was classified.

The government also declassified the disputed document, which had been marked "secret" but turned out to be a seemingly innocuous directive relating to photography of battlefield detainees by the press and military personnel.

"It has nothing to do with national defense. It's media policy," an attorney representing the ACLU, Charles Sims, said in an interview. The four-page document, which the ACLU said it received unsolicited via e-mail in October, appears to have been drafted by military lawyers at the 101st Airborne Division in Fort Campbell, Ky.

Mr. Sims speculated that the memorandum was classified because it indicates that service members are generally banned from photographing detainees, but under some circumstances members of the press are encouraged to photograph those who have been captured. "The fact they are using detainees as a media opportunity to plug the war is embarrassing and shameful," he said.

After the government subpoenaed "any and all copies" of the document last month, the ACLU filed a motion to quash in federal court. The group argued that a grand jury subpoena was an improper vehicle to, in essence, erase records from the ACLU's files.

The government's decision to relent may have been influenced by comments the judge assigned to the case, Jed Rakoff, made at a hearing last week. "There seems to be a huge difference between investigating a wrongful leak of a classified document and demanding back all copies of it," the judge said, according to a transcript unsealed yesterday. "I'm old enough to remember a case called the Pentagon Papers."

A federal prosecutor, Jennifer Rodgers, said the subpoena was a valid way to investigate what was done or might be done with the document.

"If we were to receive from them in compliance with the subpoena, 1,000 photocopies of this classified document that they had in their possession, then it's possible that that would change the focus of the grand jury investigation to look at what they were planning to do with these documents," she told the judge. In earlier discussions, the prosecutor said the ACLU was not a target of the grand jury but could be violating the Espionage Act or a law that protects so-called communications intelligence.

In a letter to the court yesterday, Ms. Rodgers suggested that the ACLU was eager to turn the dispute into a court fight and filed the legal motion even though she was willing to extend the deadline on the subpoena while the two sides negotiated. The prosecutor also indicated that an attorney for the ACLU indicated that officials at the group disagreed on whether to challenge the subpoena.

Ms. Rodgers did not indicate how the detainee photography policy came to be stamped "secret." She said an investigation is ongoing into "improper dissemination of classified and sensitive documents from a government agency," which she did not identify.

Secrecy And Common Sense (WP)

THE GOVERNMENT has wisely backed down from its effort to misuse its subpoena power to force the American Civil Liberties Union to turn over a classified document. The subpoena has been withdrawn and the document released. It turns out to have been an entirely innocuous memo outlining rules about photographing prisoners of war and detainees in Iraq. And that leaves two questions: Why in the world was this document classified in the first place? And why in the world did the government take the unprecedented step of using the grand jury process to try to retrieve "any and all copies" of the memo?

It's commonly accepted that overclassification is rampant, but even so it's hard to make sense of this one. What in this document could justify its previous classification as secret -- meaning, supposedly, that its release could cause "serious damage" to the national security? This episode ought to trigger a reassessment of the reflexive impulse to classify.

Similarly, the notion that federal prosecutors took the extraordinary step of issuing a subpoena to the ACLU to have the document returned raises serious questions of judgment. Either they didn't take the time to examine the document and to question Defense Department personnel about its contents, in which case they were negligent, or they looked at the memo and decided, despite its inoffensive contents, to use their subpoena power to go after it, in which case they were bullying and insensitive to constitutional concerns.

An excessive zeal for secrecy works against the kind of public debate essential in a democracy, but it also works against government's legitimate interest in keeping secrets. Authorities are less likely to be taken seriously in cases where the national security really might be harmed if they are willing to abuse the grand jury process, as in this case, even to conceal a routine memorandum.

Mental Exam Ordered For Terror Suspect (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, December 19, 2006

A federal judge ordered a mental exam Monday to determine whether Jose Padilla — charged with being part of a support cell for Islamic extremists around the world — is competent for trial.

A psychiatrist and a psychologist hired by Padilla's attorneys concluded he is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder and other mental problems stemming largely from his 3 1/2 years in solitary confinement at a Navy brig in Charleston, S.C.

Prosecutors agreed a court-ordered evaluation was necessary.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen accused of being an al-Qaida operative, claims he was tortured in Defense Department custody, a charge repeatedly denied by prosecutors and Pentagon officials. Padilla's lawyers have asked the judge to dismiss the charges against him because of "outrageous government conduct" during his time in the brig.

Padilla and co-defendants Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi have pleaded not guilty to conspiracy and material support charges. The most serious charge carries up to 15 years in prison.

Padilla was added to the case late last year amid a legal battle over President Bush's authority to hold him without charge as an enemy combatant. Padilla was originally arrested in 2002 on suspicion of plotting a radioactive "dirty bomb" attack inside the U.S., but the Miami charges do not mention that.

Trial is set for Jan. 22.

Testing Of Anthrax Vaccine Still On Hold (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0107538

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

VaxGen said yesterday that it did not meet a federal deadline to begin human testing of its anthrax vaccine.

The Food and Drug Administration has put the clinical trial on hold since November. The Department of Health and Human Services had given the company until yesterday to begin testing or risk losing its contract but didn't say what action it would take.

The FDA continues to have concerns about the vaccine's reliability, according to a company statement. The hold will remain until "sufficient vaccine stability" has been demonstrated, the statement said.

"I don't think we're in a position to make predictions on how long this will take," said Lance Ignon, VaxGen's vice president of corporate affairs. "We continue to believe that with the right kind of commitment, we can develop and deliver a modern anthrax vaccine."

HHS spokesman Bill Hall said no decisions have been made about the contract's fate.

After a recent meeting, the FDA indicated it was interested in having technical discussions with VaxGen about its proposed methods for measuring the vaccine's potency and stability, Ignon said. "We felt that the conversation with the FDA was very productive," he said.

The company's $1 billion vaccine effort, already years behind schedule, is by far the largest component of the Bush administration's Project BioShield, a $5.6 billion plan to counter bioterrorism threats. The project has been marked by delays and operational problems. Congress passed legislation this month to revamp and salvage the BioShield effort, reorganizing its management and providing struggling companies with periodic cash infusions for their research and testing.

But Ignon said the legislation will not address the breakdown in communication that has festered between VaxGen and HHS. "We have repeatedly tried to engage them in what we feel would be productive conversation" about the future of the program, he said. He declined to give specific examples of the proposals the company wants to address.

Hall said that while HHS is not privy to many of VaxGen's conversations with the FDA, there is a formal process in place. "Our contracting staff has regular communication with VaxGen as we do with any company with which we hold a contract," he said.

The contract calls for VaxGen to produce enough of the vaccine for 25 million people, roughly the equivalent of the population in the New York and Washington areas combined.

White House Accused Of Censorship (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 19, 2006

A former CIA analyst says the agency was told to cut parts of his op-ed column.

WASHINGTON — A former National Security Council official said Monday that the White House tried to silence his criticism of its Middle East policies by ordering the CIA to censor an op-ed column he wrote.

Flynt Leverett, a former senior director for Middle East affairs at the National Security Council, or NSC, and a former CIA analyst, said the White House told a CIA censor board to excise parts of a 1,000-word commentary on U.S. policy toward Iran that he had offered to the New York Times.

Leverett, who has criticized the administration for failing to deal directly with Tehran, said the board wanted to remove references to prior U.S. contacts with Iran.

Leverett said the events he wrote about were widely known.

He said the agency's action "was fabricated to silence an established critic of the administration's foreign policy incompetence at a moment when the White House is working hard to fend off political pressure to take a different approach."

Leverett said that in discussing the case with a CIA official, he was told that "the White House has equities" in the issue, meaning it was concerned about potentially classified material.

Speaking to reporters Monday, Leverett speculated that senior NSC officials, such as deputy national security advisors Elliott Abrams or Meghan L. O'Sullivan, had authorized their subordinates to intervene.

DOJ_NMG_0107539

But U.S. officials said the move was taken by lower-level staff members at the CIA and NSC. "There was nothing political here," a White House official said, addressing Leverett's claims.

Tom Crispell, a CIA spokesman, said the agency's review of Leverett's column remained an open case.

He said that in such cases, the writer and the agency can come to an agreement on language that will convey what the writer wants without compromising sensitive material.

Sometimes this can be accomplished by quoting the public comments of officials. "More often than not the issues are worked out," Crispell said.

Leverett said there were two key paragraphs that the CIA board wanted to cut. The first was about U.S. cooperation with Iran concerning Afghanistan about the time of the Sept. 11 attacks in 2001.

The second dealt with an offer by Iran to the United States in early 2003 to discuss the possibility of a "grand bargain" that would settle several disputes between the two countries.

He said both episodes had been publicly discussed by former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell and his former deputy, Richard L. Armitage.

"There is no basis for claiming that these issues are classified and not already in the public domain," he said.

Leverett, who worked at the NSC during President Bush's first term and is now with the New America Foundation, a liberal-leaning think tank, said he had written a lot about Iran and had spoken often about the Middle East since leaving government.

Like other former CIA employees, he is required to submit manuscripts for articles, books and speeches to the agency for review. Until last week, the CIA's review board "had never sought to remove or change a single word in any of my drafts."

He said his op-ed column was distilled from a much longer article that had not been challenged by the agency.

Leverett said the United States lost a promising opportunity to resolve its issues with Iran in 2003, when Tehran made its overture.

He said any deal that Washington made now would be on less favorable terms, because Iran had gained strength in the region and the United States was tied down in Iraq.

Critic Accuses Bush Of Silencing Dissent (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, December 19, 2006

A former senior Bush administration official who has been outspoken in his criticism of US foreign policy accused the White House on Monday of trying to silence him by censoring an article he co-authored that advocated broad engagement with Iran.

Flynt Leverett, a former CIA analyst and director in the national security council, said the White House had threatened him with criminal prosecution if he went ahead and published an opinion piece prepared for the New York Times.

Mr Leverett, an analyst at the New America Foundation, a Washington think-tank, accused the White House of using the pretext of protecting classified information to limit dissent from someone highly critical of its Iran policy.

His allegations come at a particularly sensitive time for the White House, which is under intense pressure to change its whole Middle East strategy following publication of the report of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

Mr Leverett told a news conference that the CIA had already cleared the piece in question, which he was required to submit as a former analyst. He said the White House then intervened and excised material that he had already -published in a recent paper for the Century Foundation, a New York think-tank, and had either been stated in public by US officials or reported by the media.

The offending segments, he said, dealt with Iran's assistance to the US in ousting the Taliban in 2001 and then helping set up a new Afghan government, and an offer Iran made to the US in 2003 – first reported by the Financial Times – to talk about a "grand bargain" that the Bush administration quickly rejected.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said he knew nothing about the case but denied the administration would "falsely silence critics on national security claims".

The White House later confirmed it had suggested deletions to the article because it contained classified information, and then returned the piece to the CIA publications review board.

Speaking at a news conference, Mr Leverett accused his former CIA colleagues of being "spineless" in the face of political pressure. He said the CIA review board told him there was nothing of a classified nature in the article but that they had to bow to the White House.

"This is the state of our intelligence community six years into the Bush administration," he said. He co-authored the piece with his wife, Hillary Mann, also a former official.

Analysts said Mr Leverett was not the only critic to have attracted the administration's disapproval and that the CIA had tightened up its pre-publication review procedures and threatened other former officials with punishment for stating what was already on public record.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Inquiry Falters On Civilians Accused Of Detainee Abuse (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 18 — A Justice Department team responsible for investigating accusations that civilian government employees had abused detainees has decided against prosecution in most of the nearly 20 cases referred in the last two years by the Pentagon and the Central Intelligence Agency, said lawyers who have been officially briefed on the effort.

The prosecution team, which was established in June 2004 at the United States attorney's office in Alexandria, Va., has not brought a single indictment and has been plagued by problems.

The team has been unable to collect forensic evidence or find witnesses needed to bring indictments out of war-ravaged areas of Iraq and Afghanistan. In some cases, the unit has been stymied by the absence of facts in the referrals, the lawyers said. A few investigations remain open, although the lawyers declined to be specific about how many cases fell in that category.

The team was set up in the aftermath of the uproar over abuses at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq; it was to investigate accusations that detainees had been mistreated by civilian personnel. Civilians have worked in large numbers in Afghanistan and Iraq, among them C.I.A. officers, Americans hired by companies under contract with the military as interrogators and translators, and local residents temporarily employed as support workers.

The military justice system, meanwhile, has won convictions against a number of soldiers in cases from Abu Ghraib and elsewhere in Iraq and Afghanistan. In some cases, the Justice Department has declined to prosecute in cases involving the same events in which military lawyers have brought charges against members of the armed services.

Lawyers who have been briefed on the work of the Justice Department unit, initially made up of six federal prosecutors, said problems with evidence and the fragmentary nature of some of the accusations had proved so daunting that prosecutors never even reached the point of grappling with difficult legal issues involving permissive interrogation guidelines. These guidelines, most of them based on Justice Department legal opinions, granted government officials the authority to use harsh tactics in questioning detainees.

In one case, Justice Department prosecutors investigated an accusation that a civilian translator working under a contract with the military had sexually assaulted a detainee at Abu Ghraib prison. But when investigators arrived in Iraq, the detainee and witnesses had been released in Baghdad and could not be found.

In another case, a referral cited abusive conduct by a government employee but did not include the names of witnesses or victims or where they lived. In other cases, investigators began their inquiries long after the alleged crimes occurred, when any forensic evidence a crime scene might have provided had been lost.

One of the investigations that remains open involves the November 2003 death of Manadel al-Jamadi, who died at Abu Ghraib after a brutal interrogation in one of the most widely publicized abuse cases in Iraq. Mr. Jamadi was in the custody of a C.I.A. officer and a contract interpreter at the time of his death, although he had first been captured by a team of Navy Seals.

Justice Department prosecutors who reviewed the case advised superiors that neither of the civilians could be charged. They concluded that Mr. Jamadi probably sustained severe injuries when he was in military custody before he was turned over to the intelligence agency and that therefore the civilians could not be prosecuted for his death. Frank Spinner, who represented some of the Navy Seals who have faced disciplinary proceedings, denied that military personnel were responsible for Mr. Jamadi's death. "He walked into Abu Ghraib, into the custody of the C.I.A.," Mr. Spinner said.

Justice Department officials have never publicly disclosed that the prosecution team had terminated most of its cases or that it encountered serious evidentiary problems — an assertion likely to be met with skepticism by lawmakers and human rights activists who have been critical of the department's unwillingness to discuss the abuse cases.

In a letter sent Monday to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois and a member of the Judiciary Committee, urged the Justice Department to be more forthcoming.

"Providing more public information about the Justice Department's handling of detainee abuse cases would be an important step in restoring the confidence of the American people in their government and would send a powerful message to the rest of the world about the role of the rule of law in American society," Mr. Durbin's letter said.

Hina Shamsi, senior counsel at Human Rights First, a group based in New York, said: "Secrecy itself invites abuse. Investigations shrouded in secrecy invite immunity for abuse. Congress needs to take a hard look at what happened, and why, and how to keep the agency accountable."

Spokesmen for the Pentagon and the C.I.A. declined to comment on specifics of the referrals, but both said their agencies took seriously accusations of detainee abuse. The C.I.A. has been advised that most of the cases have been closed, an intelligence official said. The referrals had stirred resentment within the agency, where some officers believed the actions of agency personnel did not warrant criminal investigation.

James Rybicki, a spokesman for the United States attorney's office in Alexandria, declined to comment on the details of the cases or their status. "This office continues the independent investigation of the cases referred to us," Mr. Rybicki said. "Because our review is ongoing, however, we cannot make any further comment at this time."

In a letter earlier this year responding to questions posed by Mr. Durbin, the Justice Department said the prosecution unit had received 19 separate accusations of abuse in Iraq and Afghanistan. Eleven referrals of possible wrongdoing came from the Pentagon, and eight from an unspecified agency later identified as the Central Intelligence Agency. The Department reported that it had dropped two of the cases on grounds of insufficient evidence.

Although the team has brought no charges, one civilian case has been prosecuted by federal prosecutors in North Carolina, resulting in a felony assault conviction against David A. Passaro, a C.I.A. contract employee. The charges stemmed from an interrogation in June 2003 at an American base in Afghanistan that resulted in the death of an Afghan, Abdul Wali.

Even that case caused problems for prosecutors, one of the lawyers said. Investigators were unable to retrieve the body of Mr. Wali from where he was buried to determine precisely the cause of his death. As a result, Mr. Passaro was not charged with Mr. Wali's death, but with beating him with a flashlight.

While the details about most cases are not known, one of the closed cases is believed to have involved the C.I.A. contract personnel who were at times present during the interrogation of Maj. Gen. Abed Hamed Mowhoush, an Iraqi who died after a rough interrogation in November 2003. General Mowhoush died of "asphyxiation due to smothering and chest compression," according to an autopsy report, after he was severely clubbed, beaten with fists and shoved into a sleeping bag.

In the Jamadi and Mowhoush cases, military prosecutors brought charges against several members of the armed forces. But they had no jurisdiction over civilians working alongside their military counterparts. A court-martial of Lt. Andrew Ledford, the leader of the Navy Seal unit that captured Mr. Jamadi, ended with an acquittal. A court-martial in the Mowhoush case concluded with a conviction of Chief Warrant Officer Lewis Welshofer Jr., who was fined $6,000 and confined for 60 days to his barracks.

Mr. Spinner, a defense lawyer who has specialized in military cases and who represented Lieutenant Ledford and Chief Warrant Officer Welshofer, said the Jamadi case in particular had raised questions about the role of the C.I.A. "The evidence was clear," Mr. Spinner said. "Let's have equal justice. If you're going to try Ledford and try the Seals, then you have to go after the C.I.A. guys."

From the start, there were doubts among some Democrats in Congress that the Justice Department could mount a serious prosecutorial effort against intelligence officers and other civilians accused of violence against terror suspects. It was the Justice Department, through a series of legal opinions and memoranda, that played a crucial role in erecting the legal framework intended to give C.I.A. officers the widest possible latitude in interrogating terror suspects and virtually indemnify them from legal liability.

Senator Seeks Detainee Abuse Case Update (AP)

AP, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A key Democratic senator asked the Justice Department on Monday for an update on its progress prosecuting government employees who were accused in at least 17 cases of abusing detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In response, a Justice spokesman said at least some of the cases are still under investigation.

In a letter sent Monday to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, incoming Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin, D-Ill., noted that the department began looking into the allegations of abuse two and a half years ago.

"In that time, there have not been any indictments in any of these cases," wrote Durbin, who first pressed the Justice Department for a prosecutions update in November 2005, when now-Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty was seeking Senate confirmation.

"It is my understanding that since then, the Justice Department has not commented publicly on the status of any of these cases," wrote Durbin, who sits on the Senate panel that oversees the Justice Department.

In response to Durbin's first request, the Justice Department revealed in a Jan. 17 letter that it had opened 20 investigations into claims of detainee abuse that were referred to prosecutors by the Pentagon and the CIA. The investigations were being led by a task force in the U.S. Attorney's office in Virginia's eastern district - which McNulty headed before taking the Justice Department's No. 2 job in March.

Two of those cases were dropped because of insufficient evidence to support a prosecution, the Justice Department letter noted. Additionally, another case resulted in the indictment of a former CIA contractor in North Carolina.

Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said at least a few of the estimated 17 remaining cases are still open. "The Justice Department continues to investigate these cases," Roehrkasse said Monday. He declined further comment.

The New York Times reported on its Web site Monday that a Justice Department team has decided against prosecuting nearly all of the 20 cases that were initially under investigation. It was not immediately clear precisely how many cases remain open, and Roehrkasse refused to respond to the newspaper's report.

Privately, Justice officials have acknowledged difficulties in tracking down reliable witnesses or preserving enough evidence to bring strong cases against the accused employees.

WAR NEWS:

Gates: Iraq Failure Would Be 'Calamity' (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, December 19, 2006

Robert Gates assumed the helm at the Pentagon on Monday, warning in his first public remarks as defense secretary that failure in Iraq would be a "calamity" that would haunt the United States for years.

The former CIA chief pledged to give President Bush his honest advice on the costly and unpopular war, and said he would go to Iraq soon to see what U.S. commanders believe should be done to quell the growing violence.

"All of us want to find a way to bring America's sons and daughters home again," Gates, 63, said after taking the oath of office as defense secretary from Vice President Dick Cheney at a Pentagon ceremony. "But as the president has made clear, we simply cannot afford to fail in the Middle East. Failure in Iraq at this juncture would be a calamity that would haunt our nation, impair our credibility, and endanger Americans for decades to come."

He takes office as Bush conducts a wide-ranging review of his approach to the 3 1/2 year-old Iraq conflict. The fighting, teetering on the edge of a civil war between sects, has seen more than 2,940 Americans die at a cost to U.S. taxpayers exceeding $300 billion.

Officials say the options Bush is studying run from a short-term buildup of thousands of more troops to a pullback of U.S. combat units so they can focus on training Iraqis and hunting terrorists. Bush said last week that he would wait until January to announce his new strategy, to give Gates a chance to offer advice.

Gates said he wants to hear the views of U.S. commanders on how to improve the situation, "unvarnished and straight from the shoulder." The remarks seemed to contrast with critics' complaints that the man he replaced, Donald H. Rumsfeld, did not listen enough to the advice of the military's top officers.

President Bush called Gates "the right man" for the multiple challenges of Iraq and the global war on terrorism.

"We are a nation at war," Bush said. "And I rely on our secretary of defense to provide me with the best possible advice and to help direct our nation's armed force as they engage the enemies of freedom around the world. Bob Gates is the right man to take on these challenges. He'll be an outstanding leader for our men and women in uniform."

Gates formally assumed the job earlier Monday in a private swearing-in ceremony at the White House, replacing Donald H. Rumsfeld.

He took office more than month after President Bush announced he was switching Pentagon chiefs, saying he wanted "fresh perspective" on the widely unpopular and costly war and acknowledging the current approach was not working well enough. Rumsfeld was a chief architect of the war strategy and still defends the decision to invade in March 2003.

"You have asked for my candor and my honest counsel at this critical moment in our nation's history, and you will get both," Gates said.

He said that since his Senate confirmation earlier this month he has participated in meetings on Iraq at the White House, received briefings at the Pentagon and held in-depth discussions with the president on ways ahead in Iraq.

Besides the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Gates faces other immediate challenges. One is the Army's proposal that it be allowed to grow by tens of thousands of soldiers, given the strains it is enduring from the two wars. Rumsfeld had resisted increasing the size of the Army or the Marine Corps; Gates' view is unknown.

It's not yet clear whether Gates intends to immediately shake up the Pentagon by firing generals or replacing senior civilian officials. He has asked Gordon England, the deputy defense secretary, to remain, but some have already announced their departures, including the top intelligence official, Stephen Cambone.

In his remarks Monday, Gates said he looked forward to working with Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as well as the service chiefs and civilian service secretaries.

Gates, who had been president of Texas A&M University since 2002, completed his tenure over the weekend by attending three commencement ceremonies on the College Station campus.

At his confirmation hearing, Gates won plaudits for his candor, especially for acknowledging the U.S. was not winning in Iraq. That contrasted with Bush's remark at an Oct. 25 news conference that, "Absolutely, we're winning."

Gates was a member of the Iraq Study Group that spent nine months assessing the situation in Iraq and produced recommendations that include phasing out most U.S. combat troops by 2008. Gates left the commission when Bush announced that he had been picked to replace Rumsfeld.

"In my view, all options are on the table, in terms of how we address this problem in Iraq," Gates said at his confirmation hearing.

Gates, a Kansas native, joined the CIA in 1966. He left in 1974 to join the staff of the National Security Council until 1979, when he returned to the spy agency. He rose to deputy director for intelligence in 1982.

His 1987 nomination to head the CIA was scuttled when he was accused of knowing more than he admitted about the Iran-Contra affair. The Reagan administration secretly had sold arms to Iran in hopes of freeing hostages in Lebanon, and used the money to help the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

Gates went to the White House as President Reagan's deputy national security adviser in 1989, then took over the CIA in 1991. He left Washington in 1993 and since August 2002 has been president of Texas A&M University.

Replacing Rumsfeld, Gates Issues Warning On Iraq (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 18 – Robert M. Gates became secretary of defense today, pledging to rely on advice from the uniformed military professionals and convey his own no-holds-barred opinions to the White House.

"You have asked for my candor and my honest counsel," Mr. Gates told President Bush at a Pentagon ceremony. "You will get both."

The new secretary said Iraq is at the top of his list of concerns, and that he will go there "quite soon" to confer with military leaders and hear their assessments "unvarnished and straight from the shoulder."

"We simply cannot afford to fail in the Middle East," Mr. Gates said. A failure in Iraq would haunt the United States "for decades to come," he said.

Nor can the United States afford to neglect Afghanistan, where progress in the post-Taliban era is "at risk," Mr. Gates said. That country "cannot be allowed to become a sanctuary for extremists again," he said. Before the Taliban was overthrown in the American-led military campaign of 2001, Afghanistan was a host for Al Qaeda terrorists.

Mr. Gates was sworn in at the Pentagon by Vice President Dick Cheney, himself a former defense secretary, after being sworn in at the White House in a private ceremony that made him Donald H. Rumsfeld's successor.

President Bush said he was counting on Mr. Gates to bring a "fresh perspective" to the Pentagon as the United States charts "a new way forward in Iraq" to build a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself and be an ally in the war against "extremists and radicals."

A new perspective was what President Bush called for immediately after the mid-term elections, when he abruptly announced Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation not long after insisting that Mr. Rumsfeld was at the Pentagon to stay. Today, Mr. Bush praised Mr. Rumsfeld as a "superb leader."

"For nearly six years, Don Rumsfeld has served with exceptional strength and energy at a time of challenge and change, and he produced impressive results," Mr. Bush said. He said the former secretary "took ballistic missile defense from theory to reality, and undertook the most sweeping transformation of America's global defense posture since the start of the Cold War."

Even in peacetime, the job of defense secretary has been considered an enormous challenge because of the vast Pentagon bureaucracy. Now, Mr. Bush said, "We are a nation at war, and I rely on our secretary of defense to provide me with the best possible advice and to help direct our nation's armed forces as they engage the enemies of freedom around the world. Bob Gates is the right man to take on these challenges."

Defense Chief Gates Sworn In (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates took the oath of office yesterday, warning that the nation cannot afford failure in Iraq and promising that the war there will be his top priority.

Gates, 63, becomes Pentagon chief at a time when President Bush and military commanders are hashing out the best way forward in Iraq, hoping to salvage a situation that is by many accounts on the brink of disaster. In his confirmation hearings before the Senate, Gates said he believes the United States is neither winning nor losing the war and pledged to consider all options for the future.

"All of us want to find a way to bring America's sons and daughters home again, but as the president has made clear, we simply cannot afford to fail in the Middle East," Gates said yesterday at the Pentagon after Vice President Cheney swore him in as the nation's 22nd defense secretary. "Failure in Iraq at this juncture would be a calamity that would haunt our nation, impair our credibility, and endanger Americans for decades to come."

President Bush chose Gates to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld immediately after the November elections, when Democrats gained control of Congress. The election results were viewed as a strong message from the public that the war in Iraq is off track. Gates, a former head of the CIA, was officially sworn in early yesterday at the White House and publicly took the oath at the Pentagon.

Gates vowed yesterday to provide "candor" and "honest counsel" to the president and to listen to the professionals at the Pentagon "who ultimately must carry out the decisions" his department makes -- alluding to the perception of Rumsfeld as a Pentagon chief who did not heed war advice from his top military commanders. Gates told the uniformed service members that he will rely on their "clear-eyed advice in the weeks and months ahead," and said he plans to travel to Iraq so he can hear assessments of the situation "unvarnished and straight from the shoulder."

Bush has delayed speaking to the nation about his decisions on Iraq so Gates can make his own assessment. Gates said he has been attending National Security Council meetings, has received briefings at the Pentagon and has discussed the situation with the president.

As U.S. officials debate whether to send more troops into Iraq or to create a major shift in military operations there, Bush said yesterday that he expects Gates to "help our country forge a new way forward in Iraq."

"As Bob Gates raises his hand and takes the oath of office, he does so at a time of great consequence for our nation," Bush said. "He knows the stakes in the war on terror. He recognizes this is a long struggle against an enemy unlike any our nation has fought before."

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, attended the Pentagon ceremony and said in an interview afterward that he fears the Bush administration could go forward with ill-fated policies in Iraq but believes Gates will work with Congress. Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the outgoing chairman, said he, too, is optimistic.

"I expect he'll bring a fresh perspective on Iraq," Levin said. "Also, I expect he will be much more open to oversight."

Gates originally was a member of the Iraq Study Group -- which recently issued a stark assessment of the war and made dozens of recommendations -- but stepped aside after Bush nominated him to replace Rumsfeld. Gates had been president of Texas A&M University since 2002.

"I return to public service in the hope that I can make a difference at a time when our nation is facing daunting challenges and difficult choices," Gates said.

White House, Joint Chiefs At Odds On Adding Troops (WP)

By Robin Wright And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

The Bush administration is split over the idea of a surge in troops to Iraq, with White House officials aggressively promoting the concept over the unanimous disagreement of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, according to U.S. officials familiar with the intense debate.

Sending 15,000 to 30,000 more troops for a mission of possibly six to eight months is one of the central proposals on the table of the White House policy review to reverse the steady deterioration in Iraq. The option is being discussed as an element in a range of bigger packages, the officials said.

But the Joint Chiefs think the White House, after a month of talks, still does not have a defined mission and is latching on to the surge idea in part because of limited alternatives, despite warnings about the potential disadvantages for the military, said the officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the White House review is not public.

The chiefs have taken a firm stand, the sources say, because they believe the strategy review will be the most important decision on Iraq to be made since the March 2003 invasion.

At regular interagency meetings and in briefing President Bush last week, the Pentagon has warned that any short-term mission may only set up the United States for bigger problems when it ends. The service chiefs have warned that a short-term mission could give an enormous edge to virtually all the armed factions in Iraq -- including al-Qaeda's foreign fighters, Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias -- without giving an enduring boost to the U.S military mission or to the Iraqi army, the officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0107546

The Pentagon has cautioned that a modest surge could lead to more attacks by al-Qaeda, provide more targets for Sunni insurgents and fuel the jihadist appeal for more foreign fighters to flock to Iraq to attack U.S. troops, the officials said.

The informal but well-armed Shiite militias, the Joint Chiefs have also warned, may simply melt back into society during a U.S. surge and wait until the troops are withdrawn -- then reemerge and retake the streets of Baghdad and other cities.

Even the announcement of a time frame and mission -- such as for six months to try to secure volatile Baghdad -- could play to armed factions by allowing them to game out the new U.S. strategy, the chiefs have warned the White House.

The idea of a much larger military deployment for a longer mission is virtually off the table, at least so far, mainly for logistics reasons, say officials familiar with the debate. Any deployment of 40,000 to 50,000 would force the Pentagon to redeploy troops who were scheduled to go home.

A senior administration official said it is "too simplistic" to say the surge question has broken down into a fight between the White House and the Pentagon, but the official acknowledged that the military has questioned the option. "Of course, military leadership is going to be focused on the mission -- what you're trying to accomplish, the ramifications it would have on broader issues in terms of manpower and strength and all that," the official said.

The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss internal deliberations, said military officers have not directly opposed a surge option. "I've never heard them be depicted that way to the president," the official said. "Because they ask questions about what the mission would be doesn't mean they don't support it. Those are the kinds of questions the president wants his military planners to be asking."

The concerns raised by the military are sometimes offset by concerns on the other side. For instance, those who warn that a short-term surge would harm longer-term deployments are met with the argument that the situation is urgent now, the official said. "Advocates would say: 'Can you afford to wait? Can you afford to plan in the long term? What's the tipping point in that country? Do you have time to wait?' "

Which way Bush is leaning remains unclear. "The president's keeping his cards pretty close to his vest," the official said, "and I think people may be trying to interpret questions he's asking and information he's asking for as signs that he's made up his mind."

Robert M. Gates, who was sworn in yesterday as defense secretary, is headed for Iraq this week and is expected to play a decisive role in resolving the debate, officials said. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's views are still open, according to State Department officials. The principals met again yesterday to continue discussions.

The White House yesterday noted the growing number of reports about what is being discussed behind closed doors. "It's also worth issuing a note of caution, because quite often people will try to litigate preferred options through the press," White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters.

Discussions are expected to continue through the holidays. Rice is expected to travel to the president's ranch near Crawford, Tex., after Christmas for consultations on Iraq. The administration's foreign policy principals are also expected to hold at least two meetings during the holiday. The White House has said the president will outline his new strategy to the nation early next year.

As the White House debate continues, another independent report on Iraq strategy is being issued today by the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based crisis monitoring group that includes several former U.S. officials. It calls for more far-reaching policy revisions and reversals than did even the Iraq Study Group report, the bipartisan report issued two weeks ago.

The new report calls the study group's recommendations "not nearly radical enough" and says that "its prescriptions are no match for its diagnosis." It continues: "What is needed today is a clean break both in the way the U.S. and other international actors deal with the Iraqi government, and in the way the U.S. deals with the region."

The Iraqi government and military should not be treated as "privileged allies" because they are not partners in efforts to stem the violence but rather parties to the conflict, it says. Trying to strengthen the fragile government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will not contribute to Iraq's stability, it adds. Iraq's escalating crisis cannot be resolved militarily, the report says, and can be solved only with a major political effort.

The International Crisis Group proposes three broad steps: First, it calls for creation of an international support group, including the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council and Iraq's six neighbors, to press Iraq's constituents to accept political compromise.

Second, it urges a conference of all Iraqi players, including militias and insurgent groups, with support from the international community, to forge a political compact on controversial issues such as federalism, distribution of oil revenue, an amnesty, the status of Baath Party members and a timetable for U.S. withdrawal. Finally, it suggests a new regional strategy that would include engagement with Syria and Iran and jump-starting the moribund Arab-Israeli peace process.

Iraqi TV Station Plays Up U.S. Losses (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi And Molly Hennessy-fiske, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, December 19, 2006

BAGHDAD — The men with laptops sat around an unadorned conference table, chatting amicably about their plans and operations.

The scene on the newly launched Al Zawraa satellite television channel could have been footage from the boardroom of any company, if it weren't for the ski masks the men wore and the subject of the meeting: future mortar attacks on U.S. bases in Iraq.

The renegade, pro-insurgent Al Zawraa channel, with a 24-hour diet of propaganda against U.S. forces and the Iraqi government, has become something of a sensation throughout the country. It has drawn condemnation from U.S. officials, Iraqi politicians and Friday prayer leaders.

Most hours of the day it plays footage of U.S. soldiers in Iraq being shot and blown up in insurgent attacks, often with religious chants or Saddam Hussein-era nationalist anthems in the background. There are segments warning Iraq's Sunni Arabs to be wary of Shiite Muslims, and occasional English-language commentary and subtitles clearly meant to demoralize U.S. troops.

"Your new enlisting qualifications are kind of comical," an announcer says in slightly accented American English, over an image of a U.S. soldier in a field hospital, a bandage on his newly amputated arm. "I mean, what are you doing? Thirty-nine years old? That's the new age of recruiting? Are you recruiting nannies? I guess if we are patient, we might witness crippled people enlisting for the Marines."

The station attempts to present an alternative to images of the war appearing in U.S. and other Iraqi media. It shows footage of Americans abusing Iraqis and Baghdad government officials collaborating with the "occupier." Even Michael Moore's "Fahrenheit 911," the 2004 documentary critical of the Bush administration's foreign policy, gets drawn into the commentary.

"After all, there are honest guys in America," the announcer says in comments directed at President Bush. "If Mr. Moore can talk to you like that, so can I."

It's not clear how big an Iraqi audience Al Zawraa captures. But its very presence demonstrates the insurgency's abilities. Despite 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq and intense diplomatic pressure on Iraq's neighbors, the station is able to circumvent U.S. and Iraqi forces and stage round-the-clock broadcasts, complete with news bulletins, graphics and commentary.

Al Zawraa started out several months ago as an aboveground hard-line Sunni channel, but it was shut down by the Iraqi government Nov. 5, the day Hussein received the death penalty. Iraqi police raided the station's headquarters after broadcasts criticized the verdict.

At the time, Mishaan Jaburi, a member of parliament said to be behind the station, disputed the sanction.

"If Saddam had ordered the killing of some hundreds of Iraqi people, the current officials in Baghdad deserve 1,000 death sentences because they cause the daily killing of more than those killed by Saddam," Jaburi, who has been accused of embezzling state funds, told the Associated Press from Syria.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki had warned stations in July not to broadcast footage that would jeopardize the nation's stability. But the attempt to stifle Al Zawraa backfired. It quickly reemerged as an underground station with violent, no-holds-barred content clearly meant to incite Sunnis.

Broadcast staples include images of U.S. soldiers manhandling Iraqi women, photos from the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal and footage of Iraqi children burned and injured in alleged U.S. attacks.

The station also loops shaky, slow-motion footage of U.S. vehicles being blown up and American soldiers, often in crosshairs, crumpling to the ground after being shot by snipers.

One question-and-answer segment with insurgents shows them installing Katyusha rocket launchers on cars and assembling weapons to fire rocket-propelled grenades.

"And you still using this tactic?" the announcer asks.

"Oh yes. With the will of God, we will never give up," an insurgent replies.

Al Zawraa announcers dispute U.S. casualty statistics. They insist that instead of nearly 3,000 American soldiers killed, the death toll is closer, as one said, to "30,000 miserable, poor nobodies who you have convinced that they will win a scholarship after a tiny tour in a little place called Iraq."

They attempt to portray the insurgency as a powerful force to be reckoned with for years to come. "There will be no negotiating," an announcer states. "For us, it's straight and simple. We are fighting for our religion and for our soil. We will fight you while you are packing. We will fight you while you are sleeping. We will fight you as you are evacuating your last soldier."

Some of the images of Americans being attacked are available on the Web and in video shops in Iraq. Some U.S. military officers shrug off Al Zawraa, saying it rarely broadcasts anything new.

Some viewers acknowledge the station's sectarian biases but say it's no different from other new Iraqi channels beholden to political blocs.

"Al Zawraa is not serving the interest of the Iraqi people," said Zaid Farooq, a 33-year-old Baghdad electrical engineer. "They are saying bad things about the government. But we can't blame Al Zawraa when there are other channels like Al Iraqiya," the state-owned station.

Though Al Zawraa rarely praises or shows footage of the many insurgent attacks on Iraqi civilians and security forces, it's the station's sectarian agenda that most irks the Shiite-dominated government. After Iraqis held a reconciliation conference Saturday meant to heal wounds between Sunnis and Shiites, the station quickly broadcast denunciations of the meeting by the Muslim Scholars Assn., a leading Sunni clerical group.

A recent segment showed Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr sitting among a group of clerics and ordering an unseen person to "send them in there as soldiers," a suggestion that his men had infiltrated the security forces and were taking part in death-squad operations against Sunnis.

An announcer alleged that Sadr, a critic of U.S. policies here, had stopped his fight against the Americans and was now focusing his efforts against Sunnis.

Iraqi government efforts to track down the renegade station have come to naught. No one's quite sure where it broadcasts from or even who is behind it. Iraqi national security advisor Mowaffak Rubaie and a senior U.S. military official said it was broadcasting from somewhere near the Kurdish city of Irbil at one point and recently signed a distribution deal with the Egyptian satellite company NileSat.

There are indications that the Iraqi government is still looking for Al Zawraa. Police in the Sunni city of Hawija near Kirkuk raided the home of another member of Jaburi's parliamentary bloc Sunday, arresting him and two others on unspecified security charges.

Prosecutor Implicates Saddam In Attacks (AP)

By By
AP, December 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107549

The chief prosecutor in Saddam Hussein's trial presented memos Monday from the ousted president's office approving chemical attacks against Kurdish villages, the most serious evidence against him in his genocide trial.

Munqith al-Faroon showed the Iraqi court trying Saddam and six other former regime members about 25 documents, including some presidential letters instructing the army to use "special ammunition" — identified as "mustard gas" — to quell a Kurdish rebellion in 1987. Some of the documents bore Saddam's signature, al-Faroon said.

Documents from Saddam's government played a crucial role in his first trial, for the 1987 killing of Shiites in the town of Dujail. In that trial, which ended with Saddam being sentenced to death, prosecutors presented memos with his signature approving death sentences for Shiites and rewarding intelligence agents for their role in the Dujail crackdown.

As in past hearings, Saddam said Monday that anything that occurred during his 34-year rule of Iraq was ultimately his responsibility, but he did not say he ordered the attacks.

"Any strike whether it was by special ammunition — chemical as (the prosecutor) interpreted or conventional — and (claims) by any military or civil official who said Saddam Hussein ordered us to do so, I take the responsibility with honor, whether the order came from me or not," Saddam told the court.

He admitted that he was not tolerant of "dissidents," including Kurdish rebels, but insisted that he did not target women and children.

His defense lawyers and some co-defendants have said in recent hearings that it was the Iranian, not the Iraqi army, that carried out the chemical attacks against Iraq's Kurdish population.

Saddam exonerated one of his co-defendants, former military intelligence chief Sabir al-Douri, saying that his role and that of his department was limited to gathering intelligence, not carrying out orders.

"As the commander in chief of the armed forces, the military intelligence gathers information and is connected to the secretary of the president of the republic. It has no other duty than to collect intelligence," Saddam said.

Earlier Monday, al-Faroon presented a letter dated in 1987 and signed by Iraq's military intelligence, asking Saddam's presidential office for permission to strike Kurdish rebels with the "special ammunition."

"It identifies the special ammunition right here as 'mustard gas,'" al-Faroon maintained, pointing to the gas reference in the letter, which was briefly shown during a television broadcast of the proceedings.

A response letter from Saddam's presidential office said it sanctioned the strike, provided that its "goal is not only to harm the rebels," according to al-Faroon, who asserted that the other target was Kurdish civilians.

Another 1987 letter, this one by Iraq's air force command addressing the defense ministry, said that "there were 44 strikes carried out by 44 warplanes, using special ammunition on the bases of (Kurdish) agents, except for one village because it was near our ground units," al-Faroon said.

The prosecuting lawyer also read a letter to the intelligence headquarters in eastern Iraq sent in 1987 by one of the intelligence offices in the northern Kurdish area that said a "number of reporters have arrived at Sarglou area to see the result of Iraqi shelling, using chemical weapons. It is likely that journalists will be sent to the areas hit to report on the incidents."

Al-Douri — Saddam's military intelligence chief — ruled out any connection with the alleged chemical attacks, saying such an offensive was not feasible because his department lacked the technical expertise.

"There was not a single officer or a body in my organization that was specialized in chemical weapons," he said, adding that he suspected some of the documents were not authentic. Al-Douri had previously accused Iran of attacking Iraq's Kurds with chemicals.

Saddam and his co-defendants have pleaded innocent to charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity for their alleged roles in the 1987-88 military offensive against the Kurds, codenamed Operation Anfal.

The prosecution estimates that 180,000 Kurds were killed when Saddam's army waged a scorched-earth campaign against Kurdish separatist guerrillas, allegedly destroying hundreds of villages, killing or forcing their residents to flee.

Saddam and one other defendant have pleaded innocent to the additional charge of genocide.

If convicted, all the accused could be condemned to death.

Saddam was convicted in the Dujail trial where he was convicted of ordering the execution of 148 Iraqis, including children, after a 1982 attempt to assassinate him.

DOJ_NMG_0107550

His lawyers appealed that trial's verdict and sentence. The appeals court is expected to rule early next month.

Iraqi officials have suggested that Saddam's prosecution on genocide charges would be halted if the appeals court upholds the death sentence of the first trial.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said Friday he hoped it would only be a matter of days before an appeals court rules on Saddam's death sentence.

The trial was adjourned until Tuesday.

Marine To Be Charged In Haditha Case (AP)

By Thomas Watkins,

AP, December 19, 2006

A Marine captain has been told he will be criminally charged in connection with the killing of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha, his attorney said Monday.

Capt. Lucas McConnell, 31, was told by his commanding officer that he will be charged with dereliction of duty, said Kevin McDermott, his attorney.

"We're just absolutely clueless as to what kind of dereliction of duty he could have committed," he said, adding that his client was not present during the killings.

Separately, two military officials said a group of Marines would be charged Thursday for their alleged roles in the killings. The officials requested anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about the charges ahead of their announcement.

The charges would mark the latest step in a massive investigation into the actions of a squad of Camp Pendleton-based Marines and several officers on Nov. 19, 2005. Earlier this month, the Marine Corps said that charges were being finalized against several troops but the precise timing was unclear.

Marine spokesman Lt. Col. Sean Gibson said Monday: "We will be presenting as much information as allowable at the appropriate time."

The Marine Corps initially reported that 15 civilians died in a roadside-bomb blast. Citing survivor accounts and human rights groups, a media report in March said that the killings were deliberate acts by the Marines, prompting the criminal investigation.

A parallel military investigation has examined whether officers in the Marines' chain of command tried to cover up the events. Results have not been made public.

The killing began when a roadside bomb struck the last of a four-vehicle convoy containing a 12-Marine squad and several Iraqi soldiers. Driver Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas died in the blast and two other Marines were seriously wounded.

In the events that followed, two dozen Iraqis were killed. Five men were shot to death when they approached the scene in a taxi, and others — including women and children — died in three houses over the next several hours.

Neal Puckett, a defense attorney for squad leader Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, has described the events of the day as a tragic but lawful combat engagement.

The criminal case will focus on whether the Marines were responding to perceived threats with legitimate force, or if the troops went too far and acted outside their rules of combat.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Fannie Mae Ex-Officials Are Sued For Disputed Pay (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107551

Federal regulators yesterday sued three former Fannie Mae executives, including former chairman and chief executive Franklin D. Raines, to recoup more than $115 million in pay they received while the company's earnings were misstated.

In an administrative complaint, regulators said Raines and the others engaged in a variety of ruses to meet profit goals and boost their compensation. For example, they delayed booking $200 million of expenses one year and used transactions with no economic purpose in other periods simply to shift income into the future, the complaint alleged.

The regulators' discovery of accounting problems in 2004 ultimately led Fannie Mae to pay a $400 million penalty and correct years of financial results, erasing $6.3 billion of previously reported profit.

Charged with Raines were J. Timothy Howard, former chief financial officer of the government-chartered mortgage finance company, and Leanne G. Spencer, former controller.

The former executives "improperly manipulated earnings to maximize their bonuses, while knowingly neglecting accounting systems and internal controls, misapplying over twenty accounting principles and misleading the regulator and the public," James B. Lockhart III, director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, said in a statement.

The three "did very serious harm to this company," Lockhart said in a conference call with reporters.

Lawyers for the former executives said the allegations were false and politically motivated. OFHEO's director had been warning for weeks that he planned to take action against former Fannie Mae executives, and he has cited the company's problems in calling on Congress to pass legislation giving Fannie's regulators greater power.

Lockhart is using Raines as a prop in his legislative campaign, and his agency has distorted evidence that it has kept from public view, Kevin M. Downey, an attorney for Raines, wrote in a letter yesterday to the OFHEO director.

Lawyers for Howard and Spencer noted that the agency now bringing the charges once vouched for Fannie's soundness, adding that the company's annual financial results were certified by auditor KPMG.

OFHEO's charges are to be reviewed by an administrative law judge, who will recommend a final decision to the agency's director. Raines's lawyer called on the current director, Lockhart, to withdraw from the matter, saying he was "fatally biased" because he repeatedly accused Raines of wrongdoing prior to bringing charges.

The agency is seeking to recoup $84.6 million in bonuses, stock option grants and other awards from Raines alone. In addition, OFHEO is seeking penalties from the three former executives that could total more than $100 million.

Before Fannie's problems came to light, Raines was one of Washington's most prominent businessmen, widely viewed as a potential Treasury secretary. His rÃ©sumÃ© traced his rise from humble roots to the heights of government and finance: graduate of Harvard College and Harvard Law School, Rhodes Scholar, junior aide to President Jimmy Carter, investment banker at Lazard Freres, chairman of Harvard's Board of Overseers, director of President Bill Clinton's Office of Management and Budget.

He was also a leader of the Business Roundtable, a lobbying group for chief executives of major corporations, and he worked to repair corporate America's credibility after accounting scandals at Enron and other companies.

"As a CEO, one of the most offensive things about the corporate scandals that emerged recently was to hear CEOs claim that they did not know, they could not know, and they could not be expected to know about the activities that brought down their companies," Raines wrote in Fannie Mae's 2002 annual report.

In 2004, an OFHEO examination faulted Fannie's accounting and challenged its management, ultimately leading the company to settle charges of fraud and other violations with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Fannie's accounting problems were so extensive that it took two years and cost more than $1.4 billion for thousands of workers to redo past financial reports. Fannie remains unable to issue current financial statements on a timely basis, one of the basic requirements of any public company, and in the absence of such reports, its shares continue trading on the New York Stock Exchange by special dispensation.

The charges filed yesterday are the first to target the top executives who presided over the company during the accounting debacle.

To unlock maximum executive bonuses for 1998, regulators alleged, Fannie understated expenses by almost $200 million, counted two years of low-income housing tax credits in a single year, and, through a last-minute bookkeeping entry, recorded $3.9 million of "miscellaneous income."

The complaint said Raines has testified that he had no reason to refute Spencer's statement that he signed off on the decision to defer the nearly $200 million of expenses.

Most of Fannie's flawed bookkeeping involved accounting for derivatives, financial instruments Fannie uses to hedge against movements in interest rates. Raines argued in 2004 that the derivatives accounting involved complex issues about which experts could disagree. Regulators said that the issues were black and white and that Fannie deliberately violated the requirements. Other companies have issued corrections over similar mistakes.

Relations between the company and the agency have often been antagonistic. In a May report, OFHEO alleged that Fannie lobbied to keep the agency poorly funded so that Fannie "would essentially be regulated only by itself."

Raines's successor as chief executive, Daniel H. Mudd, distanced himself from Fannie's posture under Raines, telling lawmakers this year that the days "of the arrogant, defiant my-way Fannie Mae had to end."

A Fannie spokesman declined to comment yesterday.

Unlike OFHEO, the SEC has taken no action against Raines or Howard. The SEC's investigation is continuing, SEC spokesman John Nester said.

The Justice Department has said that it does not plan to prosecute Fannie Mae, though it has been investigating whether Raines and Howard committed perjury when they testified about Fannie's accounting at a 2004 congressional hearing.

Fannie, Raines and Howard, meanwhile, are defending themselves against litigation brought by shareholders.

Fannie Mae recently sued its former auditor KPMG, alleging the accounting firm's negligence caused damages of more than $2 billion. KPMG said it plans to pursue claims of its own against Fannie Mae.

A fair review of OFHEO's claims "will demonstrate the propriety in all respects of Mr. Howard's conduct," said his attorney, Steven M. Salky. Spencer's work "was nothing short of outstanding," said her attorney, David S. Krakoff.

OFHEO acted yesterday to meet a two-year statute of limitations. Its charges could take years to resolve. More than three years after an accounting scandal at Fannie's rival Freddie Mac, the agency remains in litigation to recoup pay from former Freddie executives.

Ex-Fannie Execs Face Civil Charges (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, December 19, 2006

Federal regulators Monday filed civil charges against former Fannie Mae CEO Franklin Raines and two other former executives, accusing them of manipulating Fannie Mae's earnings to jack up their bonuses.

In a complaint with an administrative law judge, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight detailed 101 charges from 1998 to 2004 against Raines, former chief financial officer Timothy Howard and former controller Leanne Spencer, who all resigned in 2003 as the Fannie Mae scandal worsened.

FINDLAW: Notice of charges against the three

OFHEO is seeking $100 million in penalties and $115 million in return of bonuses. The regulator also seeks the return of legal fees, and to bar the former executives from any future business with Fannie Mae.

A major force in the mortgage investment market, Fannie Mae has been engulfed in political controversy and financial scandal for years. Lawmakers and regulators are seeking greater regulatory control of the government-sponsored housing finance giant.

Fannie Mae was run by Harvard University graduate Raines, former budget director in the Clinton administration and one of the first black CEOs of a major corporation.

James Lockhart, OFHEO's director, said the actions of the former executives "cost the enterprise and shareholders many billions of dollars and damaged the public trust."

OFHEO alleges that the former executives submitted "misleading and inaccurate accounting statements and inaccurate capital reports that enabled them to grow Fannie Mae in an unsafe and unsound manner."

Defense attorneys for the former executives deny the charges.

Howard's lawyer, Steven Salky of the Zuckerman Spaeder law firm, called the allegations "a work of unsubstantiated fiction" and "a politically motivated attempt to rewrite history."

Spencer's attorney, David Krakoff of Mayer Brown Rowe & Maw, said OFHEO brought the charges even after reporting to Congress that Fannie Mae surpassed financial safety requirements through 2003.

Raines' attorney, Kevin Downey of Williams & Connolly, demanded Monday that Lockhart recuse himself from the case. In a letter to Lockhart, he called the OFHEO director "a fatally biased regulator" who is using the case to advance his political agenda of enacting Fannie Mae-related legislation. Raines' lawyers hope to move the case to a federal court.

Lockhart declined to address the allegations of bias.

While the charges cover 1998 to 2004, Lockhart said other violations may have occurred in the early 1990s.

The agency continues to investigate other current and former Fannie Mae executives, he said.

Two years ago, a special examination by OFHEO found that former Fannie Mae executives ignored internal financial controls and manipulated earnings through questionable "cookie jar" reserves.

Last spring, OFHEO and Fannie Mae agreed to a $400 millionfine for alleged accounting manipulation.

Regulator Seeks Legal Action Against Fannie Mae Ex-Officials (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty And Damian Paletta

The Wall Street Journal, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Fannie Mae's main regulator announced legal action aimed at forcing three former executives of the government-sponsored mortgage company to pay back more than $115 million of bonuses.

But responses from lawyers for the executives suggest that the regulator faces a long and difficult legal battle.

The regulator, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, or Ofheo, also said it is seeking fines against the three that could total more than $100 million. Ofheo plans to present to an administrative law judge allegations that the three former executives "improperly manipulated earnings to maximize their bonuses." The former executives are Franklin Raines, who was chief executive officer, Timothy Howard, chief financial officer, and Leanne Spencer, controller. The former executives and their lawyers yesterday were notified about the claims in a notice of charges.

Fannie ousted all three about two years ago after regulators found that the company violated accounting rules.

The former executives neglected internal controls, misapplied more than 20 accounting principles and misled the regulator and public, Ofheo Director James Lockhart charged in a statement. Fannie Mae recently announced a restatement of results that cut retained earnings as of June 30, 2004, by $6.3 billion.

Lawyers for all three executives denied the allegations, which Mr. Howard's attorney called "a work of unsubstantiated fiction." The lawyers' responses suggested that they will argue that Fannie's former accounting practices and internal controls were approved by outside auditors and Ofheo itself.

In a letter to the regulator yesterday, Kevin Downey, a lawyer for Mr. Raines, called on Ofheo's Mr. Lockhart to remove himself from the case. Mr. Downey wrote that Mr. Lockhart's public comments in recent months show that he is "fatally biased" against Mr. Raines and already has concluded that the former CEO is guilty. An Ofheo official declined to comment on the letter.

Ofheo said it expects the U.S. Office of Personnel Management to refer the case to an administrative law judge, a justice who handles cases involving federal agencies. After hearing from the two sides and perhaps holding public hearings, the judge would recommend a decision to Ofheo's director, who could "accept, modify or set aside" the recommendation, Ofheo said. The defendants could appeal to a federal court.

Mr. Downey said Ofheo should allow the executives to challenge the agency's findings and proposed remedies immediately in federal court rather than going through the administrative law procedure.

For three years, Ofheo has been waging a similar legal battle to force two former top officers at Freddie Mac, a rival of Fannie, to give up some of their compensation because of an accounting scandal at Freddie that erupted in 2003. So far, former Freddie Chief Executive Leland Brendsel and former Chief Financial Officer Vaughn Clarke have successfully resisted Ofheo's demands for paybacks. The case is being heard by an administrative law judge in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0107554

In the Fannie case, Ofheo is seeking restitution of about $85 million of bonuses, stock options and other nonsalary compensation paid to Mr. Raines from 1998 through 2003, $27 million from Mr. Howard, and $5.7 million from Ms. Spencer.

Fannie and Freddie, which were chartered by Congress but are owned by shareholders, buy home mortgages from lenders and package them into securities.

U.S. Files Charges In Fannie Mae Accounting Case (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

Federal authorities filed civil charges today against three former top executives of Fannie Mae, the giant government-sponsored company that underwrites home mortgages, including the former chief executive, Franklin D. Raines, accusing them of manipulating Fannie Mae's books to fatten their bonuses.

The charges were the latest development in the fallout over accounting violations at Fannie Mae. After the housing oversight office denounced Fannie Mae in a scathing report in May, the company agreed to pay a $400 million settlement. Earlier this month, Fannie restated its earnings for several years, making a total of $6.3 billion in various corrections, to straighten out inaccuracies in its financial statements. It was one of the largest corporate accounting restatements on record.

In all, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight filed 101 charges today against Mr. Raines, J. Timothy Howard and Leanne G. Spencer. Mr. Howard was once Fannie Mae's chief financial officer; Ms. Spencer was the company's controller.

The allegations against them include fabricating "deliberately misleading" financial reports, manipulating earnings and failing to operate a sound system of internal checks and balances.

"The 101 charges reveal how the individuals improperly manipulated earnings to maximize their bonuses, while knowingly neglecting accounting systems and internal controls," said James B. Lockhart, director of the housing oversight office, in announcing the charges today. "They submitted six years of misleading and inaccurate accounting statements and inaccurate capital reports that enabled them to grow Fannie Mae in an unsafe and unsound manner."

If proven, the charges against the executives could result in fines of more than $100 million being assessed against them. In addition, the housing oversight office is asking that the Fannie executives be ordered to repay some $115 million that they were paid by the company. Regulators have said that, of the $90 million paid to Mr. Raines from 1998 to 2003, the years during which the accounting violations occurred, at least $52 million was tied to bonus targets that were reached by manipulating accounting.

Kevin M. Downey, Mr. Raines's lawyer, strongly denied the accusations against his client. In a letter to Mr. Lockhart, Mr. Downey asked that he remove himself from the case. "The long record in this matter demonstrates that you are a fatally biased regulator," Mr. Downey wrote.

Steven Salky, a lawyer for Mr. Howard, called the new charges "a work of unsubstantiated fiction." In a statement, Mr. Salky said the allegations are "a politically motivated attempt to rewrite history."

Mr. Raines and Mr. Howard were forced out of the company in December 2004, and investigators have since laid much of the blame for the problems on their shoulders.

Fannie Mae, the second-largest financial institution in the nation, buys home mortgages and sells bonds backed by them, which investors consider to be implicitly backed by the Treasury, though there is no formal guarantee. Its activities and those of similar smaller agencies dominate the mortgage-backed securities market. Once known as the Federal National Mortgage Association, the company changed its name in 1997 to match its Wall Street nickname, based on its abbreviation.

Former Fannie Leaders Charged (WT/AP)

By Marcy Gordon

The Washington Times, December 19, 2006

The government yesterday filed civil charges against former Fannie Mae Chief Executive Franklin D. Raines and two other top executives, accusing them of misconduct costing shareholders billions of dollars.

The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight (OFHEO), the D.C. mortgage giant's regulator, announced that it is seeking fines and the return of millions of dollars in bonus money. It filed 101 charges against Mr. Raines, former Chief Financial Officer Timothy Howard and former Controller Leanne Spencer.

DOJ_NMG_0107555

Mr. Raines and Mr. Howard were swept out of office two years ago in the multibillion-dollar accounting debacle at the government-sponsored company, which finances one of every five home loans in the United States. Fannie Mae earlier this month announced a long-awaited restatement for 2001 through June 30, 2004, that erased $6.3 billion in profit.

OFHEO said it is seeking civil fines of $100 million or more against the three former executives and restitution totaling more than $115 million in bonus money tied to an improper accounting scheme.

The regulator may bring similar charges against both current and former executives and directors, OFHEO General Counsel Alfred Pollard said. Fannie Mae spokesman Brian Faith declined to comment.

Attorneys for Mr. Raines, Mr. Howard and Ms. Spencer disputed the regulators' charges and said they were politically motivated. The lawyer for Mr. Raines called OFHEO Director James B. Lockhart "a fatally biased regulator" and asked him in a letter to remove himself "immediately and completely from any further regulatory action affecting Mr. Raines."

Mr. Lockhart's true motivation is to get Congress to enact legislation tightening the government reins on Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, its smaller sibling in the $8 trillion home-mortgage market, said Mr. Raines' attorney, Kevin Downey.

Mr. Raines, a prominent Washington figure who was White House budget director in the Clinton administration, led Fannie Mae -- with its legendary political clout, generosity in campaign contributions and lobbying savvy -- from 1999 until his ouster by the company board in December 2004.

Mr. Lockhart said the charges "reveal how the individuals improperly manipulated earnings to maximize their bonuses, while knowingly neglecting accounting systems and internal controls, misapplying over 20 accounting principles, and misleading the regulator and the public."

"The misconduct cost [Fannie Mae] and shareholders many billions of dollars and damaged the public trust," he said.

OFHEO, the regulator for Fannie Mae and McLean company Freddie Mac, in May issued a blistering report charging a six-year accounting fraud at Fannie Mae, the second-largest U.S. financial institution after Citigroup Inc. The regulators said the scheme included manipulations to reach quarterly earnings targets so that company executives could pocket hundreds of millions in bonuses from 1998 to 2004.

Fannie Mae paid a record $400 million civil fine in a settlement with OFHEO and the Securities and Exchange Commission. It also agreed to limit the growth of its multibillion-dollar mortgage holdings, capping them at $727 billion, and to make top-to-bottom changes in its corporate culture, accounting procedures and ways of managing risk.

The notice of charges filed by OFHEO includes accusations that Mr. Raines, Mr. Howard and Ms. Spencer engaged in earnings manipulation and "deliberately misleading" financial reporting, and failed to establish a sound internal-controls system.

The charges will be heard by an administrative law judge, who will make a recommendation to Mr. Lockhart -- not a binding decision -- on whether the charges should stand. The three would have the right to appeal a final ruling in federal court.

Mr. Raines' total compensation from 1998 through 2004 was $91.1 million, including some $52.6 million in bonuses. Mr. Howard earned $30.8 million during the period, including $16.8 million in bonuses; Ms. Spencer received $7.3 million, of which some $3.5 million was bonus money.

Mr. Howard's attorney, Steven Salky, called the accusations against his client "a politically motivated attempt to rewrite history."

The charges are "a work of unsubstantiated fiction, starkly at odds with both the actual facts and the conclusions reached by OFHEO during its extensive annual examinations of Fannie Mae," he said. "We are eager for a fair and impartial adjudication of these claims, which will demonstrate the propriety in all respects of Mr. Howard's conduct."

Ms. Spencer's lawyer, David Krakoff, said her annual performance reviews for the six years she was controller "found her work was nothing short of outstanding."

"We look forward to disproving the politically motivated claims brought by OFHEO," he said.

Broadcom Faces Upgraded, `Formal' SEC Options Probe (BLOOM)

By Peter J. Brennan

Bloomberg, December 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107556

Dec. 18 (Bloomberg) -- Broadcom Corp., a chipmaker restating results to add $1.5 billion in payroll costs, said the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission has opened a ``formal'' investigation into the company's options practices.

Broadcom also canceled more than $37 million in stock options held by three unnamed individuals it holds responsible for manipulating their grant dates, the Irvine, California-based company said in a statement today. Broadcom said it took the actions as it finished an internal review of the matter.

Dates on ``numerous'' grants were manipulated after they were issued from 1998 to 2003, Broadcom said. The SEC's formal probe gives it subpoena power to demand information from current and former Broadcom employees. The company has said that because of the irregularities, related compensation costs will at least double, the biggest increase in the widening options scandal.

``The escalation of the SEC inquiry to formal status is a bit unsettling given the open-ended possibilities,'' said Cody Acree, a Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst, in a note to investors. Acree said current demand for the company's products isn't improving, so he's keeping a ``hold'' rating on the shares.

Shares of Broadcom rose 13 cents to $33.72 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading and have risen 7.3 percent this year.

Samueli, Others Absolved

Chief Executive Officer Scott McGregor and acting Chief Financial Officer Bruce Kiddoo can certify Broadcom's financial statements, the company said. It said Henry Samueli, co-founder, chairman and chief technical officer, and Broadcom's outside directors didn't receive any improperly dated grants.

The company's statement didn't mention William Ruehle, who quit Sept. 19 after nine years as Broadcom's chief financial officer. Broadcom spokesman Bill Blanning didn't immediately answer questions posed in an e-mail.

Samueli and the outside directors ``reasonably'' relied upon management and professionals to correctly handle option grants and their accounting treatment, Broadcom said.

Executives and directors who say they relied on professional advice could be establishing a valid defense, said Jacob Frenkel, a former enforcement lawyer with the SEC.

``Once it is asserted, that opens for discovery the extent of the discussions'' among the CEO, chairman and those responsible for the options backdating, Frenkel said in an interview. ``That could be the difference between to charge and not charge'' in both civil and criminal cases.

Options granted since 2003 have been properly dated and accounted for, the company said, including those given to co-founder Henry Nicholas. Nicholas quit as CEO in January of 2003, saying he wanted to spend more time with his family.

`Voluntary' Repricing

Remaining employees who received improperly dated options have ``voluntarily'' agreed to higher exercise prices, reflecting grant dates chosen by the company, Broadcom said. It said all the individuals ``actively responsible'' for the date manipulation have left the company.

The SEC's upgraded investigation means it can subpoena documents and witnesses who are both current and former employees, said Frenkel, now a lawyer with Shulman, Rogers, Gandal, Pordy & Ecker in Rockville, Maryland.

``The federal investigation likely will be time consuming and demanding,'' Frenkel said. ``It does not portend an enforcement action.''

Amended results for 2005 and the first quarter of 2006 will be reported in January, the company said. McGregor in October said he would be disappointed if reports for the second and third quarters weren't released by the end of this year.

High Flier

Broadcom was a high-flying company where expensive Italian Lamborghini sports cars dotted the parking lot as the stock price shot up to as high as a split-adjusted $183.17 in August 2000. Sales soared from $37 million in 1998, when Broadcom shares began trading publicly, to $2.67 billion last year. The company makes chips for a wide variety of consumer electronics such as television set-top boxes, Apple Computer Inc.'s video iPod and Nintendo Co.'s Wii game console.

DOJ_NMG_0107557

This is the second major accounting scandal to hit Broadcom. In 2001, the company was forced to change how it accounted for warrants issued in connection with the more than 30 acquisitions that fueled its sales growth. Lawsuits charged Broadcom with inflating its revenue and the company last year settled for $150 million.

Incentives

Stock options let recipients buy shares at a future date, usually at the market price on the day they were granted. Often they are given to managers as an incentive.

The U.S. Justice Department and SEC are investigating Broadcom and other companies to determine if they manipulated the dates of option grants to boost their value. At least 185 other companies have announced internal or federal options probes in the scandal.

Broadcom's internal investigators reviewed 6 million pages of documents and electronic information and interviewed over 40 people about the option grants, the company said.

``There was uncertainty and confusion as to the accounting rules for options, and certain individuals may have acted without fully understanding the rules or whether compensation charges should have been taken," Broadcom's statement said.

Blowdown: How Faults At BP Led To One Of America's Worst Industrial Disasters (FT)

By Sheila Mcnulty

Financial Times, December 19, 2006

Part of William Bradley Bessire's job as project co-ordinator at BP's Texas City refinery was to put on a lavish "safety lunch" to reward the workers in his section for every week without an accident.

At such a lunch on March 23 last year, Mr Bessire finished a big plate of fajitas, rice and beans, congratulated the workers on another good week and headed back to the trailer that served as his office - just as the refinery's nearby isomerisation unit was being restarted.

Some of the operators in the unit, designed to boost the octane rating in petrol, had been working 12-hour days for 30 days in a row, several with two-hour commutes. Alarms and gauges were broken and a key piece of equipment, the blowdown drum, was not only outdated but undersized. A proposal by BP engineers to upgrade to safer technology in 2002 had been turned down because of cost pressures.

Restarting the unit was a fairly routine event: it had been shut for maintenance and fired up again 19 times in the previous five years. But the use of the blowdown drum meant it vented directly to the atmosphere instead of to a flare, which would have burnt off fumes. During the start-up that Wednesday, the drum became overfilled with highly flammable liquid hydrocarbons. The accompanying fumes spread out over the refinery - until they found a spark.

Some 500ft away in his trailer,Mr Bessire felt a shock wave and knew the isomerisation unit was going to blow. He rushed out just as an explosion ripped through the plant, forcing a door and window out of their frames and into him, knocking him down.

As the flames spread, hundreds of workers ran to the barbed wire fence surrounding the refinery trying to get out, but they could not climb over it without shredding their hands. Mr Bessire backed a truck up to the fence so that people could clamber on it to jump over. He ripped off his coverall and laid it over the barbed wire as protection for those fleeing, then he ran back to find something else to wear. He spent four hours helping people out of the refinery. By then, 15 people were dead and 500 injured in and around the facility. He ruptured two discs that would have to be replaced with metal plates, limiting mobility in his neck, and damaged nerves would leave him with chronic pain on his right side.

It was the worst US industrial accident in more than a decade. Lord Browne, BP's chief executive, flew in the next day to take responsibility, setting the tone for talks with what would eventually become 1,000 claimants seeking the $1.6bn (£820m, €1.2bn) that BP allotted for compensation.

Not all BP executives displayed great contrition, however. A friend e-mailed John Manzoni, head of BP's refining and marketing, suggesting that he should travel to the refinery. Mr Manzoni's reply was terse and he appeared perturbed when Lord Browne ordered him to interrupt his vacation to go to Texas City: "I arrived in Texas City at 3am - along with Lord Browne and we spent the day there - at the cost of a precious day of my leave." BP declined to comment on this e-mail.

The US Department of Labor's Occupational Safety and Health Administration (Osha) uncovered more than 300 "egregious, wilful violations" in Texas City - BP's biggest refinery. BP did not admit guilt but agreed to a maximum allowable $21m fine and said it would spend $1bn improving and maintaining the refinery over the next five years.

Many of the problems at the 70-year-old plant had, no doubt, been inherited by BP when it acquired the refinery in 1998 as part of its purchase of Amoco. Before the blast, the Texas City site had in 30 years suffered 23 fatalities - four since BP took over. But instead of making the investments needed to improve safety, BP in 1999 ordered a 25 per cent cut in fixed costs.

Federal investigators would later conclude that these budget cuts caused a progressive deterioration in safety: "At an ageing facility like Texas City, it is not responsible to cut budgets related to safety and maintenance without thoroughly examining the impact on the risk of a catastrophic accident," said Carolyn Merritt, chairwoman of the US Chemical Safety Board (CSB), an independent federal agency that investigates industrial chemical accidents. "They had all the symptoms of a failed safety culture."

Ronnie Chappell, a BP spokesman, responded that the cuts were not a "directive" but rather a "challenge" to achieve the target without compromising safety or the long-term viability of the business unit. Nor did the cuts cause the blast, he added: "Our investigation team found no evidence that previous budget decisions were a critical factor in the terrible tragedy." Indeed, he said, spending at the facility had increased significantly in the years prior to the explosion and was by some measures higher than the industry average. Nonetheless, workers said they were certain BP was underspending and that this had put the refinery at risk of the type of explosion that took place that day.

Mr Bessire said: "I always worried about the safety of being in that refinery. Every time you drove up to the gate and 'badged in', you worried; there is not a person who works in that place that does not worry." It was hard not to: near the refinery entrance, workers for a time passed a billboard commemorating two colleagues scalded to death by boiling water after a pipe ruptured on September 2 2004.

John McLemore, fire chief at the site, estimated in a deposition for one of the many civil lawsuits against BP that the refinery had suffered an average of a fire a week over the past 10 years. The isomerisation unit had recorded eight other releases of vapour from the same blowdown drum from 1994 to 2004 - two of them under BP's watch. Of the total, six had included vapour clouds that Ms Merritt concluded could have had "catastrophic consequences, but for the absence of an ignition source" and two resulted in fires.

Ms Merritt said she doubted that the poor safety culture existed solely within the confines of the barbed wire fence at Texas City: "It's rare that you are going to have one facility that is so far off the mark in having a good culture in an organisation. An errant facility would not be able to continue on a bad path."

Indeed, an investigation by the Financial Times has shown BP allowed the refinery to deteriorate, in spite of all the red flags. Moreover, it was not the only BP operation in the US that was permitted to do so. BP Alaska has suffered a string of damaging safety lapses over the past five years and there have been smaller incidents in other states - all hinting at a broader problem with BP's safety approach in the US. Yet Texas City was in particularly bad shape - and, according to US regulators, senior executives in London knew that.

"BP's global management was aware of problems with maintenance, spending, and infrastructure well before March 2005," the CSB's report said. "BP did respond with a variety of measures aimed at improving safety. However, the focus of many of these initiatives was on improving procedural compliance and reducing occupational injury rates, while catastrophic safety risks remained."

Prior to the blast, a BP safety presentation on Texas City had opened with the statement: "Texas City is not a safe place to work." Texas City's safety business plan for 2005 said the death of a worker within 12 to 18 months was a "key risk". Even further back, BP executives had been aware of problems. On August 16 2002, James Hay, BP business unit leader for chemicals, e-mailed David Pierpoline, the group's director of health, safety, security and environmental compliance for the western hemisphere, to note that Mike Hoffman, vice-president for refining, had asked him to follow up on how Texas City had fallen into "such a poor state" and expressed concern that other sites should not be allowed to deteriorate to that extent.

But not much changed and, by late 2004, Texas City workers had grown so fearful of a massive accident that the local union contacted colleagues in Alaska for help in engaging the services of Chuck Hamel, a longtime campaigner for oil workers, to publicise their plight.

Around the same time, Don Parus, the refinery's site manager, tried to get a handle on the depths of the problems by commissioning an independent safety audit. Telos Group, a Texas-based consultancy, surveyed more than 1,100, or 60 per cent, of Texas City employees. Mr Parus said in a deposition he was unsurprised by the findings. Employees in the 338-page report, completed on January 21 last year, tell of broken alarms, thinned pipe, chunks of concrete falling, bolts dropping 60 ft and staff being overcome with fumes. Staff rated "making money" BP's number one priority and "people" its lowest, at number nine.

"The history of investment neglect, coupled with the BP culture of lack of leadership accountability from frequent management changes, is setting BP Texas City up for a series of catastrophic events" was one of many ominous warnings. Geoffrey Gioja, co-author of the Telos report, said he was astounded: "We have never seen a site where the notion 'I could die today' was so real . . . This had a profound impact on us all. It also causes asolidarity, especially amongst the hourly employees, that seemedakin to being in a war together."

The Telos report contained something even more disturbing, however: evidence that the numbers of reported safety incidents were being kept low by pressure being brought to bear on the victims. While BP pointed out that the Texas City refinery in 2004 had the lowest injury rate in its history - and nearly one-third the average for the oil refining sector - BP's internal 2005 safety business plan, a copy of which has been obtained by the FT, listed under key risks a "site not reporting all incidents in fear of consequences".

Telos quoted numerous workers at the plant complaining of pressure not to report injuries and safety violations. "I have been hurt and had management punish me and make a fool of me. Need I say more?" asked one worker cited in the report. A second said: "The employee is always at fault - and required to sign [a] statement that he committed an unsafe act."

"They made fun of me," said a third. And a fourth: "Now when we get hurt, you drag yourself out the gate, if you're able, and say it happened at home."

"There are senior managers here who have allowed the site to accept a completely inappropriate amount and level of risk, who have allowed criminal levels of non-compliance," concluded a fifth.

Mr Chappell countered that the Telos report "does not report the 'objective' truth about safety performance or conditions" but rather "is an accurate representation of the attitudes, perceptions and statements made by survey participants". Nonetheless, he said, BP had been moving to address the concerns expressed in the report when the refinery exploded. "There had been a comprehensive effort by Texas City refinery leadership to drive continued safety improvement, encourage the reporting of injuries and near-misses and ensure the thorough and complete investigation of injuries and incidents at the refinery."

In spite of a heightened sense of urgency about the state of Texas City in internal e-mails after the report, then confidential, was circulated among management, BP kept the plant open. "When they got the Telos report, BP had a choice: embrace safety and do it the right way, or just keep profits and production going," said John Eddie Williams Jr, managing partner at Williams Bailey, a law firm that handled 145 of the civil cases arising from the blast. "They made the conscious decision to keep running this plant instead of doing a safety stand-down."

With limited other employment chances for the largely low-skilled workers at the plant, they in general hung on - even after the disaster. "A lot of people are stuck here because there is no place else they can get money to pay for their families," said the wife of one man who stayed on. Though the explosion had shaken their nearby house and thrown their toddler a foot into the air, they had agreed to risk the husband's continuing at the refinery for another year, at $25 an hour, to save up enough to move away. "This is a working man's town. Those without education can always get a job in the plants because of the dangers of the chemicals," said the woman.

Ms Merritt of the CSB urged BP to set up an independent review of its other US operations for lapses. The company agreed, appointing a panel led by James Baker, former secretary of state. The results of that probe were originally due last month but Mr Baker has pushed that deadline back twice, citing the scale of the review, and has set a new release time of early January. In the meantime, according toBP's Mr Chappell, the company has done its own assessment and identified problems at each of its refineries that, while not as broad or deep as those found at Texas City, are being addressed.

In the months following the disaster, BP's various operations in Texas suffered another explosion, a fire and a spill. On July 20 this year a contract worker was crushed to death at Texas City when, in operating a motorised hoist, he became wedged between a beam and the control panel. BP's safety record elsewhere in the US has also been troubled. Last month two contract drillers were killed in separate accidents in Alaska and Oklahoma, suffering head injuries in what BP called "the course of normal activities".

The deaths followed regulatory and legal battles elsewhere in the US. In April, Osha fined BP $2.4m for unsafe operations at its Ohio refinery. In May, BP ended a legal battle by agreeing to increase oil-spill prevention efforts and fund a $1m study of spill risks at its refinery in Washington state. In Illinois, BP is embroiled in a lawsuit arising from the sale of a chemical plant in 2004 that Flint Hills Resources, the buyer, says "required tens of millions to comply with environmental laws and permits" - charges BP denies.

The state of California has sued BP in recent years both over air pollution violations and a failure to make required upgrades to safeguard water supplies from unseen leaks. The company has settled the suits with agreements to spend millions of dollars in penalties and improvements. Amid all this, the US federal government this summer accused BP's traders of having tried to manipulate the propane market in 2004. Last week, regulators told BP the company was under investigation for manipulating the unleaded petrol futures market, a charge it denies.

Mr Chappell insists the incidents are one-offs, denying Ms Merritt's charge of a problem with BP's safety culture: "While it is natural for people to look for patterns, recent events in the US are not linked. They are each very different from each other in terms of immediate cause, location, business unit. There are lots of BP businesses in the US doing a world-class job of managing their operations."

But Mr Hamel, the campaigner for oil workers, disagrees, noting the striking similarity of complaints about BP processes coming out of Texas and Alaska, its two biggest trouble spots: "They are both identical - defer, defer, defer maintenance - and operate systems and facilities to failure as a money-saving programme." These similarities became public on August 6 when BP Alaska admitted discovering such "severe corrosion" in pipelines, following government-mandated checks after a big spill, that it shut half its oilfield.

Five years earlier, BP had received what it considered an "extremely negative" assessment of its anti-corrosion programme by an independent consultant. Its response was to press the consultant to revise the criticism. Documents obtained from Mr Hamel show the company persuaded Coffman Engineers to change the report, with the final version being shorter and softer on BP.Mr Chappell says the "first generation of the report contained errors, and we pointed them out as part of the normal review process. Simple as that."

But this year, BP was forced to admit it had failed to perform "pigging" corrosion checks for up to 14 years on oil transit lines, relying on cheaper, less reliable checks from the exterior, slotting in metal "coupons" and using ultrasonic equipment, instead of sending a probe through the line itself.

BP said it did not suspect microbial bacteria in its transit lines - which turned out to be the cause of the corrosion and which "pigging" would have cleaned out. But experts say this is not credible. "Any prudent operator is going to be sure it does not have MIC [microbial bacteria] and is going to periodically run cleaning pigs to sweep out colonies if they do form," says Rick Kuprewicz, president of Accufact, a pipeline energy consulting firm. "MIC is not something that space science invented last year."

The company's reputation took another hit when, during the BP Congressional hearings this year, Richard Woollam, former head of corrosion monitoring for BP Alaska, refused to testify, citing his constitutional right to avoid self-incrimination. Steve Marshall, at the time BP Alaska president, said BP had transferred Mr Woollam after finding evidence that his inspection team had felt intimidated.

Following the hearings, John Dingell, a senior member of the House of Representatives committee on energy and commerce, told the FT: "What is most troubling is that, to this day, it is not clear if BP truly understands what went wrong with either Texas City or Alaska . . . It will be far too easy to repeat these failures if BP does not first understand the problems that led to them." Since then both Mr Marshall, the former BP Alaska head, and Maureen Johnson, who managed the Prudhoe Bay oil field, have been reassigned.

The Department of Justice has grand juries in both Alaska and Texas exploring whether to bring criminal charges against the company and/or its officers. Mr Bessire has meanwhile been left to fend for himself. BP gave him a settlement he is not allowed to reveal but, at age 53, he readily admits he could have earned twice what he received had he been able to work another 10 years.

Now the pain from his injuries keeps him up at night, leaving him exhausted and, with his limited mobility, too much of a risk to hire. Worse, he cannot get health insurance. "Medical bills eat up everything that everybody's got. Now I worry every day, 'Can I spend a dollar? What if I need it down the road?'" He wants Lord Browne to provide the victims with health insurance. "He can't wash his hands . . he owes that to us."

Options Backdating Frequent, Report Says (AP)

AP, December 19, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - About 1,400 corporate directors received option grants whose timing was manipulated, according to an academic study released Monday.

Of all options grants to directors, about 9 percent were received at "lucky" times -- when the stock price was equal to a monthly low, according to a Harvard Law and Economics paper released Monday.

After studying the period form 1996 to 2005, academics at Harvard Law School, Cornell University and INSEAD in France estimated that about 800 lucky grant events were the result of opportunistic timing.

Options give the recipient a right to buy a stock at a fixed "strike price," generally set at the stock's market price the day of the grant and options holders benefit if the stock rises above the strike price. In the backdating scandal, companies have dated option grants to days when the stock was at a low, enhancing the potential benefit.

According to the study:

_Director grants were more likely to be manipulated when potential gains were larger.

_Grants were more likely to be manipulated when the company had more provisions protecting insiders from risk of removal.

_Directors' grants were more likely to be lucky when executives, and especially the CEO, also received a grant on the same date.

_Grants were more likely to be manipulated when the board did not have a majority of independent directors.

The report was written by Lucian Bebchuk at Harvard, Yaniv Grinstein at Cornell and Urs Peyer at INSEAD.

At least 189 companies have disclosed Securities and Exchange Commission, Department of Justice or internal investigations related to backdating, according to an Associated Press review.

Doubt Cast On Stock Options Of Directors (LAT)

By Kathy M. Kristof, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 18, 2006

A study suggests that hundreds of board members may have gained from backdating.

Nearly 1,400 corporate board members appear to have profited from the manipulation of stock option grant dates over a 10-year period, according to a study being released today.

The analysis raises the possibility that hundreds of board members were aware that options were backdated to boost their value to themselves and company executives. That could be seen as a conflict with their role as advocates for all company shareholders.

"Rather than merely failing to notice or stop the manipulation of executives' grants, many outside directors have received manipulated option grants and thus directly benefited from the manipulation practices," according to the study by Harvard professor Lucian Bebchuck and two other scholars.

Stock options are rights to buy company shares at a set price in the future. The option price generally is set at the market price on the grant date. The lower the price on that date, the more likely the recipient would be to profit.

The study reviewed 29,000 stock option grants from 1996 to 2005 to so-called outside directors, or board members who are not executives of the company.

About 9% of the time, options were granted on days when the stock price was at a monthly low — a coincidence that suggests the date may have been picked in hindsight, or backdated, to ensure maximum benefit.

Corporate watchdogs said the 9% figure was significant, even though it suggested that the timing was not suspicious for the overwhelming majority of grants. That's because board members are supposed to be looking out for average investors, not using their positions for self-profit, these critics say.

"It's appalling," said Claudia Allen, chairwoman of the corporate governance practice at Chicago law firm Neal, Gerber & Eisenberg. "Directors are fiduciaries for all stockholders; to act in their own self-interest is a breach of loyalty. It's the cardinal sin."

The study did not name any companies, nor did it offer any hard evidence that directors played a direct role in the backdating of options.

It did conclude that backdating occurred across a wide range of industries. The one exception was the utilities sector, which issues few options to directors.

The backdating scandal emerged this year after academic research by Erik Lie of the University of Iowa, leading to resignations and investigations at scores of companies.

Most of the focus has been on corporate executives, who make far more in option grants than board directors. But the study's authors and others say the role of directors deserves scrutiny.

"It seems less significant because there is less money involved, but the betrayal of trust is far greater," said Paul Hodgson, senior research associate at Corporate Library, a governance research firm based in Maine.

Questionable grants were sometimes given to executives and directors on the same date, according to the study, coauthored by Yaniv Grinstein of Cornell and Urs Peyer of the University of Chicago.

At other times, directors were given options on dates that executives did not receive them, the study found. In those cases, 71% of the options granted appeared to involve some kind of date manipulation.

Bebchuck said suspicious grants were far more likely to happen at companies that had management structures that tended to give chief executives more power. These include provisions for staggered terms of board members, weakening their clout, and so-called poison pill measures and other defenses against hostile takeovers.

Lie of the University of Iowa said the new study underscored the important role directors should play in guarding against management abuses.

"It's hard for shareholders to understand what's going on in a company because you can't be there," Lie said. "That's why you delegate the responsibility to a few people, the directors, who represent you. You have to have trust in those people and they have to act in a trustworthy manner."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Violent Crime Is Up For 2nd Straight Year (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

A surge in violent crime that began last year accelerated in the first half of 2006, the FBI reported yesterday, providing the clearest signal yet that the historic drop in the U.S. crime rate has ended and is being reversed.

Reports of homicides, assaults and other violent offenses surged by nearly 4 percent in the first six months of the year compared with the same time period in 2005, according to the FBI's latest Uniform Crime Report. The numbers included an increase of nearly 10 percent for robberies, which many criminologists consider a leading indicator of coming trends.

The results follow a 2.5 percent jump in violent crime for 2005, which at the time represented the largest increase in 15 years.

The latest numbers suggest that those results were not an anomaly but rather part of the first significant uptick in violent crime since the early 1990s, according to criminal justice experts.

DOJ_NMG_0107563

Many communities, particularly those in urbanized areas, may be headed into a period of sustained crime increases, they said. While no one is certain of the causes, experts cited an increase in the number of young men in their crime-prone years, diminished crime-fighting assistance from the federal government, fewer jobs for people with marginal skills and even the ongoing growth in methamphetamine use in some places.

The numbers come amid heightened criticism of the federal government from many police chiefs and state law enforcement officials, who complain that the Bush administration has retreated from fighting traditional crime in favor of combating terrorism and protecting homeland security. Justice officials dispute those contentions and pointed yesterday to an ongoing study designed to identify solutions to the rise in violent crime.

"This confirms what law enforcement has been seeing and saying on a more anecdotal level: that crime is on the way up," said David A. Harris, a law professor at the University of Toledo who studies crime trends. "While it's still too early to be sure, you've certainly got things pointing in one direction."

One positive piece of news came in the category of car thefts and other property crimes, which dropped 2.6 percent overall. Even that portion of the report contained some bad tidings, however: Burglaries, another key indicator, rose 1.2 percent nationwide.

Homicide and assault rates rose by more than 1 percent overall, while the number of reported rapes dipped slightly.

The FBI's six-month report does not include statistics for the District, which reports crime statistics to the FBI only on an annual basis, officials said. Baltimore's overall violent-crime rate remained unchanged, the report showed. Data for individual states were not part of the analysis.

Rising homicide rates have prompted particular concern among law enforcement officials, and a surge in killings and other violent attacks in the Midwest played a significant role in driving up rates in 2005. But Alfred Blumstein, a criminologist at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh, noted that, unlike 2005, homicide rates plunged in many smaller and medium-size cities for the first half of 2006.

"Obviously these big cities are accounting for a big piece of the action in this report," he said.

The increase was especially dramatic in many cities of 500,000 residents or more, the FBI report showed, including a 28 percent increase in Houston that appears attributable in part to an influx of residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina in 2005. Homicides in New Orleans, whose population was greatly reduced after the storm, plunged by more than 60 percent in the same time period.

The numbers are certain to increase pressure on the Bush administration, whose detractors say local police concerns have been slighted by the focus on homeland security and counterterrorism.

The Justice Department inspector general's office has reported sharp declines in the number of FBI agents and investigations dedicated to traditional crimes since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. In addition, the International Association of Chiefs of Police says that law enforcement programs at the Justice Department have been cut by more than $2 billion since 2002 and that overall funding for such programs has been reduced to levels of a decade ago.

"We've been looking at some pretty discouraging numbers, and we've always been concerned that as funding decreases, crime rates will increase," said Gene Voegtlin, the association's legislative counsel.

James Alan Fox, a criminologist at Northeastern University in Boston who has been critical of the Bush administration's crime-fighting strategies, said the overall rise in violent crime should be expected given dramatic cuts in assistance to local police and simultaneous increases in the population of males in their teens and 20s.

"We have many high-crime areas where gangs have made a comeback, where police resources are down and where whatever resources there are have been shifted to anti-terrorism activity," Fox said. "It's robbing Peter, and maybe even murdering Peter, to pay Paul."

Justice Department officials have repeatedly rejected such criticism, arguing that the causes and trajectory of the crime increase is still unclear. Nonetheless, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales has launched a series of anti-drug and anti-gang initiatives at Justice, and he acknowledged at a crime conference in Boston last week that local police are struggling with "increased responsibilities" since Sept. 11, 2001.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said yesterday that the department's ongoing study of crime trends in 18 cities will help determine "what is causing this increase" and "which crime-fighting efforts are most effective."

"We are encouraged by the drop in property crime seen in most areas around the country, but we are again concerned about the increase in violent crime in some cities and towns," Roehrkasse said.

FBI Reports Rise In Violent Crime (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 19, 2006

Murders, robberies grow in the first half of 2006, more evidence that a long decline is over.

WASHINGTON — The number of murders and robberies in the U.S. continued to grow during the first half of this year, fresh evidence that violent crime is on the upswing after more than a decade of decline, the FBI said Monday.

From January to June, violent crime increased 3.7% compared with the first six months of 2005, the bureau reported. The number of robberies increased 9.7%, while murders rose 1.4%. Aggravated assaults increased 1.2%; forcible rape offenses declined less than 0.1%.

The increases, which occurred nationwide, follow an overall jump of 2.3% for violent offenses in 2005 and portend another year of rising violent crime, experts said. In 2005, violent crime posted its largest overall increase since 1991.

Though criminal justice experts were cautious about drawing conclusions from six months of data, they found the report worrisome and said the country could be in a new period of slowly rising crime.

A number of different explanations have been offered for the increase, including cutbacks in federal funding to state and local law enforcement agencies, which has led to fewer police on the street in large cities, and demographic factors, including an increase in the number of males from age of 14 to 24.

The trend also has kindled a debate over whether the country is spending enough for crime fighting and prevention at a time when growing numbers of federal dollars are being targeted toward terrorism and domestic security.

If the trend of rising crime continues, it could become a political issue in the 2008 election. Violent crime peaked in 1992 before beginning an extended decline to its lowest level in three decades.

"Violent street crime did not go away on Sept. 11," said James O. Pasco Jr., executive director of the Fraternal Order of Police, the nation's largest police union. Though "the same or additional resources are needed to fight those crimes," in many cases less money is being spent, he said.

The increases in violent crime were felt in all regions. The West had the largest increase: 4.7%.

The situation in California was mixed.

In Los Angeles, the number of violent crimes declined 2.6% to 14,961 from 15,367. The number of murders declined to 227 from 249. But robberies rose 7.5% to 7,042 from 6,552.

Violent crime in Oakland surged 37.9% to 3,665 from 2,657; the number of murders there increased to 66 from 37.

The FBI said the number of reported robberies was up in cities of all sizes. The largest increase — 12.8% — occurred in cities with populations of 10,000 to 24,999. But robberies also increased in metropolitan counties — 8.4%.

Cities of populations of 500,000 to 999,999 reported the sharpest increase in murders — 8.4%. In metropolitan counties, murders were up 3.1%.

The data are based on reports of more than 11,000 state and local law enforcement agencies.

Experts said the crime upsurge reflected an increase in gang violence, particularly in midsized cities, and a growth in gun crimes, including robberies and homicides.

"We have gone backward in our ability to deal with the illegal gun market," said James Alan Fox, a criminal justice professor at Northeastern University in Boston.

He said the problem had been compounded by the fact that the number of police on the street in large cities had dropped almost 10% since 2001.

The crime problem, he said, "is not going down unless we make some major changes in what we are doing."

DOJ_NMG_0107565

Federal aid to state and local police declined to about $890 million in 2006 from $2.5 billion in 2001. Police departments are being squeezed by growing domestic security duties at a time when federal agencies such as the FBI are focusing more on preventing terrorism than assisting local departments fighting traditional crimes.

"We have seen some pretty dramatic cuts" in grant programs, said Gene R. Voegtlin, a spokesman for the International Assn. of Chiefs of Police, an Alexandria, Va., trade group for police department executives. "They are having an increasingly difficult time in effectively trying to combat crime and provide for safer communities. It has been a struggle."

FBI: Violent Crime Still On Rise In 2006 (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

WASHINGTON - Murders and robberies continued to rise across the country during the first six months of 2006, preliminary FBI data released Monday show, indicating that the lull in crime between 2001 and 2004 appears to be over.

Violent crime figures are on pace for a second straight annual increase. Based on statistics for all of 2005, violent crime rose 2.2 percent nationally - the first increase since 2001.

"This is a concern we've been focused on," said Gene Voegtlin, legislative counsel for the International Association of Chiefs of Police, which represents an estimated 20,000 law enforcement officials and has been pushing for more crime-fighting funding. "A lot of (police) agencies are really stretched thin when it comes to the budget and their ability to aggressively combat crime."

From megapolises to small cities, violent crime rose 3.7 percent between January and June compared to the first six months of 2005. Twenty-eight more people were murdered during that period 2006 in New York City, for example, while the college town Norman, Okla., saw its total number of homicides jump from zero to three.

The early data show:

-Murders rose by 1.4 percent, felony assaults by 1.2 percent and robberies by a whopping 9.7 percent in 2006, compared to the first six months of 2005. The number of rapes decreased by less than one-tenth of 1 percent.

-Burglaries increased by 1.2 percent. But car thefts dropped by 2.3 percent and other stealing incidents by 3.8 percent.

-Arsons rose by 6.8 percent.

The FBI's twice-yearly report comes as the Justice Department studies 18 cities and suburban regions for clues on why the national violent crime rate is increasing. Justice researchers have not yet visited all of the cities, and it is not clear whether the government will make more federal funding available to the worst-hit.

The Bush administration has asked for $1.2 billion in crime-fighting grants and assistance programs this year - what Voegtlin described as at least a $1 billion hit from funding levels a decade ago.

Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department is encouraged by a 2.6 percent drop in property crimes - such as auto theft and other larcenies - as outlined in the FBI report. But "we are again concerned about the increase in violent crime in some cities and towns," he said.

The data is based on crime reports from 11,535 police and other law enforcement agencies nationwide. The total number of actual crimes reported was not immediately available.

Violent Crimes On Rise, Especially In West, An F.B.I. Report Says (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

HOUSTON, Dec. 18 — Driven by a surge in robberies, violent crimes nationwide rose 3.7 percent for the first half of 2006, with the West leading the increase, the F.B.I. reported Monday. But property crime was down 2.6 percent.

Robberies reported to the authorities were up 9.7 percent, murders were up 1.4 percent and arson was up 6.8 percent, the Federal Bureau of Investigation said in its summary. Rape was largely unchanged.

Reflecting a surge in crime in Texas after the dislocations of Hurricane Katrina, Houston recorded a sharp increase in homicides, to 202 for the first half of 2006, up from 158 in the comparable prestorm period last year. Three Texas cities ranked among the nation's top 10 in crimes per capita.

Homicides in Dallas were down to 101 from 106 but it still ranked as the nation's most crime-ridden big city, with 3,985 overall crimes per 100,000 population, followed by Houston with 3,444. After Phoenix with 3,436, San Antonio was 4th with 3,422. Los Angeles ranked 8th with 1,730, and New York was 10th with 1,187.

Lt. Vernon Hale, a spokesman for the Dallas Police Department, said the rankings were subject to differences in how cities classified crimes, adding, "We overreport." Through November, he said, overall crime in Dallas compared with last year was down nearly 10 percent, with violent crime down nearly 3 percent. "We think things are getting better," Lieutenant Hale said.

In New York, where homicides were up to 266 from 238 last year, Paul J. Browne, the chief police spokesman, said a dozen or more killings were actually "reclassifications" of old crimes that became homicides when the victims died this year. Overall crime in the city was down 7 percent and violent crime down 3 percent for the first half of the year, Mr. Browne said.

The oldest and largest police chiefs' organization said the figures proved that law enforcement agencies were stretched too thin.

"They all have new responsibilities since 9/11," said Gene Voegtlin, legislative counsel for the group, the International Association of Chiefs of Police, in Alexandria, Va. He said that since 1997, federal grants to local police agencies had decreased to $890 million from $2.4 billion.

"There are some disturbing indications" in the half-year figures, Mr. Voegtlin said, but cautioned, "It's hard to draw general conclusions."

Violent crime for the period had been on a downward trend: 3.1 percent in 2003, 2 percent in 2004, and half a percent last year.

The West led the increase in violent crime, up 4.7 percent. Much of that was driven by robbery, up 14.6 percent, nearly three times the increase in the Northeast.

The Northeast had the smallest increase in violent crime, 2.9 percent. The South led in homicides, up 3.3 percent.

Many cities showed increases in homicides: Miami was up to 30 from 23; Indianapolis to 68 from 44; Boston to 37 from 29; and Detroit to 186 from 169.

FBI Reports Rise In Violent Crime In First Half Of '06 (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, December 19, 2006

Violent crime nationwide increased by 3.7 percent in the first six months of this year, but property crime dropped by 2.6 percent, the FBI said yesterday.

The FBI's Preliminary Semiannual Uniform Crime Report, based on statistics submitted by 11,535 law-enforcement agencies, showed increases in murders (up 1.4 percent), robberies (up 9.7 percent) and aggravated assaults (up 1.2 percent) over the same period in 2005. Forcible rapes dropped 0.1 percent.

Last year, the number of violent crimes increased by 2.5 percent, the largest gain in 15 years, and the Justice Department pledged to determine why the crime numbers were continuing to increase. A report on the matter has not yet been completed.

Washington was not included in the FBI report, but Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey has declared progress in a renewed fight against violent crime in the city, which spiked in July -- prompting the declaration of a citywide crime emergency.

Only two area cities reported data to the FBI for the report: Baltimore, which recorded declines in the reported incidents of murder (137 to 133), rape (79 to 77) and aggravated assaults (3,498 to 3,257), and Alexandria, which reported increases in the number of murders (1 to 6), robberies (88 to 109) and aggravated assaults (111 to 114).

According to the FBI report, the largest increases in the reported number of violent crimes, 12.8 percent, occurred in small cities with populations of 10,000 to 24,999, while cities with populations of 500,000 to 999,999 had the most marked increase in reported murder offenses, up 8.4 percent.

In the property-crime category, according to the report, the number of larceny-theft offenses decreased 3.8 percent nationwide for the six-month period, while reported motor vehicle thefts declined 2.3 percent. Only burglary offenses showed an increase, up 1.2 percent from the 2005 level.

Though reported property-crime offenses as a whole were down in all of the nation's population groups, the report said the number of reported burglary offenses was up in all of the population groups with the exceptions of cities with 1 million or more inhabitants, where they declined by 1.5 percent, and the nation's nonmetropolitan counties, down 3.7 percent.

According to the report, reported property crimes were down in three of the four regions. The Midwest was the only region to show a cumulative increase in the volume of reported property crimes, up 1.7 percent overall with increases of 5.8 percent for burglary, 0.7 percent for larceny-theft and 0.3 percent for motor vehicle theft.

The report said that arson offenses, which are tracked separately from other property-crime offenses, increased 6.8 percent nationwide.

BAY AREA Violence On Rise In Some Cities FBI Report -- Oakland, S.F. Part Of Bigger Trend (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, December 19, 2006

Driven by a surge in armed robberies, violent crime rose in the Bay Area and around the country during the first six months of this year, the FBI said Monday in a report that raised concern that the drop in crime that started in the 1990s has turned around.

Oakland witnessed a 38 percent increase in reported violent crimes -- homicides, rapes, robberies and assaults -- from the first half of 2005, the biggest uptick among 63 California cities with populations of at least 100,000 people.

Double-digit increases were also tallied by Hayward, San Francisco and Antioch, according to the FBI's preliminary Uniform Crime Report, which was compiled using numbers from 11,535 law enforcement agencies.

Nationally, violent crime increased 3.7 percent, with robberies up 9.7 percent. The bump in violent crime was biggest in cities with populations of 500,000 to 1 million residents, at 8.4 percent. And it followed a 2.3 percent increase nationally from 2004 to 2005.

On a positive note, nonviolent property crimes -- burglary, theft and arson -- were down 2.6 percent nationally, the FBI said.

"We are again encouraged by the drop in property crimes seen in most areas around the country, but we are also concerned about the increase in violent crime in some cities and some towns," said Brian Roehrkasse, a U.S. Justice Department spokesman.

He said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales had dispatched teams to 18 cities to study recent crime increases. The Justice Department will suggest new anti-crime programs after receiving those teams' reports, Roehrkasse said.

Roehrkasse said Justice Department officials could not explain the rise in robberies. In the Bay Area, Santa Clara recorded a jump of 82 percent, from 17 to 31, in the first half of the year. Big gains were recorded from San Francisco (37 percent) to Antioch (19 percent).

Antioch Police Chief James Hyde said his officers are seeing younger criminals as well as more women and out-of-towners committing robberies and other violent attacks.

The motive, he said, usually relates to drugs, particularly methamphetamine. Robbers rip off dealers, steal prescription drugs from pharmacies and pull off street heists to get money for a quick drug fix, he said.

"Instead of one or two, you're seeing four to five people" in a robbery crew, Hyde said. "They tend to be parolees along with probationers learning the robbery trade, if you want to put it that way. You're seeing a more mobile and sophisticated robbery crew."

Hyde said the government had a hand in the problem by cutting financial support for community policing in favor of anti-terrorism grants.

"That limited our ability to work closely with neighborhoods and have a higher officer-to-citizen ratio," Hyde said. "Many departments have become more reactive than proactive."

Roehrkasse, however, said the increases do not appear to be related to federal spending, which he said has never totaled more than 4 percent of state and local law enforcement agencies' budgets.

Franklin Zimring, a professor at UC Berkeley's Boalt Hall School of Law, said criminologists are "nibbling their nails" at the new data because there were no solid answers for why crime decreased drastically in the 1990s and held relatively flat during the first half of this decade.

Zimring recently completed "The Great American Crime Decline," a book that attacks prevailing explanations for the decline -- including economic prosperity, prison expansion and a decrease in at-risk youth due to abortion legalization.

"Any indication that the arrow can turn up alerts us to the possibility that the trend can turn against us," Zimring said. "If we had a stronger sense of what held crime down, we'd have less to worry about with small blips."

Nationally, homicides increased 1.4 percent and aggravated assaults went up 1.2 percent in the first half of this year. Rapes decreased by less than 0.1 percent.

Oakland saw a 78 percent jump in homicides, from 37 to 66 in the six-month span, and a 48 percent increase in robberies.

"I don't think it lends itself to a simple solution," said Officer Roland Holmgren, a spokesman for the Oakland Police Department. "And it's not going to take one thing to fix it."

He said factors in Oakland's crime increase include poverty, the greater availability of guns and a lack of problem-solving skills among young people, who increasingly settle disputes with guns rather than fists.

Fremont experienced the greatest increase in property crimes, at 13 percent, among large California cities. Many other Bay Area cities showed declines, including Antioch, where property crime dropped 24 percent.

Hyde said he believes people are "target-hardening" their homes and cars with alarms and other measures, in part because of fear that they might be victimized.

Dayton Follows National Trend In Violent-crime Rise (DAYDN)

By Ken McCall

Dayton (OH) Daily News, December 19, 2006

DAYTON — Mirroring a nationwide trend, newly released FBI data showed violent crime increased by 6.4 percent in the city of Dayton during the first six months of 2006.

The preliminary crime data released Monday show homicides and robberies continued to rise across the country during the first half of this year, on pace for an increase in violent crime for the second straight year.

The nationwide 3.7 percent uptick in violent crime between January and June comes amid a still-incomplete Justice Department study of 18 cities for clues on why criminal activity is increasing.

The numbers reflect what police across the country have been saying for months: that the lull in crime between 2001 and 2004 appears to be over.

Of the 228 cities with a population of at least 100,000 listed in the data, six of 10 showed an increase in violent crime. Dayton's 6.4 percent increase ranked 93rd on that list.

The three other large Ohio cities listed in the data all showed increases: Columbus, 8.8 percent; Cleveland, 6.8 percent; and Cincinnati, 1.2 percent.

Dayton Police Maj. Mitchell Davis, superintendent of investigations, said the national numbers generally reflect the city's experience.

"There does seem to be an increase in violent crime," Davis said. "Our homicide rate has gone back up."

But Davis said the most recent crime statistics show declines in several categories. The numbers for the year through Dec. 17 show decreases of 5 percent in felonious assaults, 12 percent in rapes, and 1 percent in robberies.

Those decreases are offset, however, by a 31 percent increase in homicides, Davis said.

The city has 42 homicides this year so far, compared with 34 for all of 2005.

But Davis said the city is safe for those who aren't involved with drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0107569

"All of our murders, the victim and the murderer seem to know each other," he said. "And a very large percentage are related to the use and sale of drugs.

Dayton Director of Police Julian Davis said he had no explanation for the increase.

"Nobody knows," he said. "It could be cyclical. Even the FBI said they could not explain it."

Violent Crime Rises In U.S. (RTD)

Richmond Times-Dispatch, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A recent rise in violent crime accelerated in the first half of 2006, the FBI reported yesterday. The data provide the clearest sign yet that the nation is in the midst of a prolonged increase in murder, assaults and other violent offenses.

The results follow on the heels of a 2.5 percent increase in violent crimes for 2005, which marked the highest rate of increase in 15 years.

Violent crime reports rose by nearly 4 percent in the first six months of 2006 when compared with the same time period a year earlier, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Report.

The numbers reflect what police across the country have been saying for months: that the lull in crime between 2001 and 2004 appears to be over.

But in the metro Richmond area, the picture is not as bleak. In the first six months of 2006, Richmond saw a 14 percent decline in violent crime, despite a two-man killing spree that started the year.

Some of the surrounding counties got off to a rocky start, with violent crime increasing 9 percent in Henrico and 13 percent in Chesterfield during the first six months.

Hanover County saw a 29 percent drop in violent crime during that period.

The second half of the year has been more peaceful in Henrico and Chesterfield, which have had seven and 12 homicides, respectively, this year.

Hanover has had two, which is fewer than the number experienced by places such as Dinwiddie County and Hopewell.

Nationally, the recent crime increases have prompted widespread criticism by police chiefs and state law-enforcement officials around the country, who complain the federal government has retreated from providing money and other help to localities in favor of programs focused on counterterrorism.

Justice Department officials have argued that federal policies play a limited role in combating local crime.

One senior Justice official called the 2005 statistics a "yellow flag" that did not represent a trend.

At the same time, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales increasingly has focused on combating violence and gang crimes in public appearances, and the department has launched a study to find explanations for the crime increase.

The early data show:

Murders rose by 1.4 percent, felony assaults by 1.2 percent and robberies by 9.7 percent in 2006, compared with the first six months of 2005.

The number of reported rapes decreased by less than one-tenth of 1 percent.

Burglaries increased by 1.2 percent. But car thefts dropped by 2.3 percent and other stealing incidents by 3.8 percent.

Arsons rose by 6.8 percent.

The data are based on crime reports from 11,535 police and other law-enforcement agencies nationwide.

The total number of actual crimes reported was not immediately available.

Group To Duke: Join Bid For DA Inquiry (DURHS)

By Ray Gronberg

Durham Herald Sun, December 19, 2006

DURHAM -- Supporters of the three Duke lacrosse rape defendants on Monday asked university officials to join U.S. Rep. Walter Jones in calling for a federal civil-rights investigation of District Attorney Mike Nifong's handling of the case.

The group Friends of Duke University said that while that wouldn't force Duke President Richard Brodhead or other administrators to take a position about the guilt or innocence of the accused men, it would support "the undeniable proposition that public information suggests there is a sufficient likelihood of civil-rights violations" to merit U.S. Department of Justice scrutiny.

Speaking up is also imperative because the public-relations damage the case has inflicted on Duke is damaging the school's standing with potential applicants, the group said in news release posted on its Web site, friendsofdukeuniversity.blogspot.com, and e-mailed to reporters.

Noting that Duke's early-admission applicants dropped by 20 percent this fall, the group said "any prospective parent would have to think twice about sending a son or daughter to an institution whose leadership has stood aside as a local prosecutor targets students through procedurally improper actions."

Duke officials reacted by issuing a statement from Brodhead that repeated that his stance that the legal process has to run its course.

"Under American law, the legal system is the place to establish the facts and bring a case to a just resolution," Brodhead said. "For that reason, it is of the essence that everyone involved in the legal system act fairly in pursuing the truth and protecting the rights of the individuals involved."

He noted that he'd also said that when the case "goes before a judge and jury, the DA's case will be on trial just as much as our students will be," and that until a jury says otherwise, the defendants must be presumed innocent.

Asked specifically whether Duke would link itself to calls for a federal civil-rights investigation, university public-relations chief John Burness said, "I don't think we're planning to do that at the moment."

A spokesman for Friends of Duke University, Maryland lawyer and Duke alumnus Jason Trumpbour, criticized Brodhead's statement.

The president's response "contains absolutely nothing new, and it studiously avoids the central issue," Trumpbour said. "It speaks on one hand of a belief in the system, and yet the fundamental problem we and others have been pointing out is that the system has not been working. You can't have it both ways. You can't express your belief in the system and at the same time ignore substantial and compelling evidence that the system isn't working."

Trumpbour's group issued its request four days after Jones, a Farmville Republican, asked the Bush administration to intervene.

The congressman said Nifong may have denied defendants David Evans, Collin Finnerty and Reade Seligmann their rights by directing Durham police to show their accuser a photo lineup that only included Duke lacrosse players, and by making prejudicial comments to the press.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told Fox News over the weekend that Jones' request "is being evaluated" by the Department of Justice, but he declined to say whether the agency might launch an investigation.

Trumpbour's group said the revelations late last week that prosecutors withheld DNA test results from the defense highlighted an additional violation of the defendants' constitutional rights. The results in question showed that the accuser had the DNA of several men -- uncharged and unconnected to the case -- on or in her underwear and body cavities.

In addition to wanting a federal investigation, the group wants Nifong removed from the Duke case and replaced with a special prosecutor, Trumpbour said.

It believes the accuser's allegations were false and "would never have been handed over from police to the prosecutors" absent Nifong's intervention, he said.

Nifong didn't return a phone call seeking his reaction to Brodhead and Trumpbour's comments. He's rarely answered media inquiries about the lacrosse case since the late spring.

Witness: New Orleans Cops Shot Man In Back As He Ran Away (CNN)

By Drew Griffin, James Polk And Kate Albright-Hanna

CNN Online, December 18, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Louisiana (CNN) -- New Orleans police lined up "like at a firing range" and fatally shot an unarmed man in the back as he fled from them in the days after Hurricane Katrina swept ashore, a witness to the shooting told CNN.

DOJ_NMG_0107571

It marks the first time a witness has come forward publicly with information about the shooting of Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally retarded man whose death has sparked a police investigation and a grand jury probe into what happened in and around the Danziger Bridge that day.

"He just fell like he was collapsing," Kasimir Gaston told CNN. "Like something just wiped him out."

Gaston was one of many flood refugees living on the second floor of the Friendly Inn, a low-income motel on the city's east side. On Sunday, September 4 of last year, he says he woke up and stepped onto the balcony of the motel and saw a man running, hands outstretched and being fired upon.

Initial police accounts said that Madison reached for his waistband and turned on police, but Gaston said Madison did not appear to have a weapon and that he was running away from police "hands out, full speed" when he was shot.

Police declined CNN's request for an interview.

After the shooting last year, police said officers had responded to reported gunshots on the Danziger Bridge and that a running gunbattle ensued with six suspects.

One teenager was killed near the base of the bridge and three other people were wounded, according to police reports.

A police department press release from October 4, 2005, said Madison, described as an unidentified gunman, was "confronted by a New Orleans Police officer. The suspect reached into his waist and turned toward the officer who fired one shot, fatally wounding him."

When asked if Madison had a gun, Gaston said, "I didn't see any on him."

No gun was found on Madison's body.

An autopsy obtained previously by CNN and verified by the Orleans Parish Coroner said Madison suffered five gunshot wounds to his back and two in his shoulder.

'What I saw with my own eyes'

Gaston said he came forward now because he is still troubled by what happened. He said he decided to break his silence after watching a "CNN Presents" documentary, "Shoot to Kill," about the days after Katrina hit the Gulf Coast on August 29, 2005.

CNN has visited the room where Gaston was staying. From that balcony, it is about 100 feet to where Madison was shot and killed.

The police department has said the shooting has been thoroughly investigated. But Gaston said no officer or detective approached him about what he saw. He was not asked for his name or phone number, Gaston said.

Gaston said his only contact with police on that day was when officers told him not to touch Madison's body, which was lying behind Gaston's truck, parked in the motel entranceway.

CNN has obtained a newspaper photo taken that Sunday morning that shows where the body fell. The back of a truck with a rusted trailer hitch and broken tail light can be seen in the photo. The photo appears to be Gaston's truck, which now sits in a parking lot in Dallas, Texas, where he now lives.

"They notified me that I had two bullet holes in the passenger side," he said. Two bullet marks can be seen at the right rear of the truck today.

Mary Howell, an attorney suing New Orleans police on behalf of the dead man's family, says there were several potential witnesses living at the Friendly Inn at the time of the shooting. She has accused police of violating procedures by failing to even write down their names.

Howell said Ronald Madison and his older brother, Lance Madison, were trying to avoid the shootout between police and others that day when they ran up the Danziger Bridge, toward the other side of the Industrial Canal.

Lance Madison has said a policeman pointed what looked like a rifle or shotgun at his brother and shot Ronald near the top of the bridge. Lance said he helped carry his wounded brother to the entrance of the motel and left him there while he ran for help. After being arrested, Lance was brought back to the motel where, he says, he first saw his brother was dead.

Howell said police, in the chaos after Hurricane Katrina, failed to properly investigate the fatal shooting and are now trying to put everything behind them.

"There's a lot of things that have been washed away with this hurricane," Howell said. "We are doing everything we can to make sure this is not one of them."

DOJ_NMG_0107572

While the family of Ronald Madison presses on with its lawsuit, a grand jury in New Orleans is investigating the case. Gaston said he is willing to testify before the grand jury if it will help get to the truth.

"I'm not trying to say nobody did this and nobody did that," Gaston said. "I'm just saying what I saw and being truthful and honest about what I saw with my own eyes."

Kan. Inmate Charged With Mailing Bomb To Va. Court (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

A prisoner at the famed high-security Leavenworth prison was charged yesterday with fashioning a letter bomb and mailing it to the federal courthouse in Richmond, authorities said.

Rodney Curtis Hamrick, who has a long history of threatening public officials, sent "an operable explosive device that had the capability to cause death," prosecutors said as they announced the charges. It was sent to the offices of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit and addressed to the clerk but was diverted to a basement mailroom and later detonated by police, authorities said. No one was injured.

Hamrick was an inmate at the U.S. Penitentiary in Leavenworth, Kan., when he mailed the bomb in October 2005, along with a letter several days later that contained a powdery substance labeled "anthrax," federal law enforcement officials said. Tests indicated that the substance was not anthrax.

Traci Billingsley, a spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons, said she could not comment on how Hamrick allegedly managed to construct and mail a bomb from prison.

An attorney had not been appointed yesterday for Hamrick, 41, who was charged in a seven-count indictment and faces up to life in prison if convicted. He has since been moved to Colorado's notorious "supermax" federal facility that houses terrorists and other violent felons.

Chuck Rosenberg, the U.S. attorney in Alexandria, said Hamrick's actions had presented "a grave threat to the United States courthouse and to the people who work inside, and we will prosecute it accordingly."

Hamrick has made threats to public officials and mailed dangerous devices from jail before, court records show. In 1987, from a state prison, he mailed letters threatening to kill President Ronald Reagan. While serving a prison term for that offense, he threatened to blow up a West Virginia courthouse, a United Airlines flight and NAACP headquarters, court records show.

Hamrick then constructed a bomb while an inmate at a county prison in West Virginia, according to a 1995 4th Circuit Court decision. The bomb "comprised a nine-volt battery as a power source, steel wires, three butane cigarette lighters as the explosive, and an unidentified pink substance speculated to be lip balm, which was to serve as the detonator," the appellate court wrote.

Hamrick was later convicted of mailing an envelope containing the bomb to William A. Kolibash, the U.S. attorney in West Virginia. Kolibash opened the envelope in his office, realized it contained a homemade bomb and fled. The bomb, which had scorched the packaging in which it was mailed, was disarmed, the court said.

A three-judge panel of the 4th Circuit initially reversed Hamrick's conviction for the attempt to kill Kolibash, but the full court overturned that ruling and reinstated the conviction in a 1995 decision.

Pat Connor, the 4th Circuit Court clerk, praised the quick action security officials took when the bomb Hamrick is now accused of sending was received. "The response was one that would make those receiving the package feel safe," she said.

Going Too Far (WP)

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

CREATING BETTER conditions for the reentry and rehabilitation of offenders is a worthy goal, and not just for the men and women released from prison. The community's interest is served if ex-offenders build crime-free lives. But two measures being considered by the D.C. Council to help offenders, no matter how well-intentioned, are cause for serious concern and, if approved, would undermine public safety.

Most problematic is an effort by council member Marion Barry (D-Ward 8) to amend the city's Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination in employment or housing based upon an arrest or conviction record. The bill adds a criminal record to such cherished protections as those for race, religion, sex and age. Here's what it could mean: A couple with small children couldn't refuse to rent the apartment in their duplex to a convicted sex offender; a bank couldn't disqualify a job seeker who served time for embezzlement as long as it didn't happen in the previous 10 years. Those simply using good judgment could be sued for punitive damages. No one is against giving people a second chance, but this bill goes too far.

The other measure would greatly expand the conditions for expungement, or sealing, of criminal records. (In full disclosure, The Washington Post testified against the measure in committee because the newspaper values access to complete and accurate criminal records.) The legislation builds on the thoughtful work of the Council for Court Excellence, which makes a compelling argument that there are instances (such as actual innocence) in which it is only right that a person not be burdened with the life-long stigma of a criminal record. The District lags behind a majority of states, including Virginia and Maryland, in allowing individuals to clear their records when appropriate. Yet again this proposal -- which would permit expungement of arrest records and even of certain conviction records -- goes too far. As Patricia A. Riley, special counsel to the U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia, testified, it "tips the scales too far against the public interest and public safety."

More should be done to help the 2,000 offenders returning to the city each year. Mr. Barry's idea to establish a city commission to coordinate and monitor services for ex-offenders has the potential to do good. By contrast, the other measures pose too great a risk.

CIVIL LAW:

Abramoff Opts For Self-Defense In Latest Suits (LAW)

By Anna Palmer

Law.com, December 19, 2006

After paying for a high-priced criminal defense by Chadbourne & Parke's Abbe Lowell in the government's corruption probe, former uber-lobbyist-turned-jailbird Jack Abramoff is taking a different approach in two lawsuits filed against him by Indian tribes.

This time around, Abramoff is representing himself against former client Louisiana Coushatta Tribe and the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas.

So far, Abramoff has piggybacked on motions filed by lawyers for former Christian Coalition head Ralph Reed and former Abramoff associate Michael Scanlon in the Texas case. Lowell did not return calls.

Abramoff may be using the law library from the minimum-security federal prison in Cumberland, Md., where he is serving almost six years for a fraud conviction separate from the corruption probe.

It's extremely rare for prisoners to defend themselves pro se, according to the American Civil Liberties Union's National Prisoner Project. The logistics could get tricky with Abramoff unable to travel for depositions. But the tactic could get him out of prison chores like kitchen duty or carpentry while he is doing legal research.

"It's Jack Abramoff. What else can you say? The guy believes in himself," says Barbara Van Gelder of Wiley Rein & Fielding, who represented David Safavian, the former White House official convicted in June in connection with Abramoff.

A Creative Flair Rising In Lawsuit Settlements (LAW)

By Peter Geier, The National Law Journal

Law.com, December 19, 2006

In March 2005, Eva Rowe's parents, James and Linda, were killed in a BP refinery explosion in Texas City, Texas -- a disaster that killed 13 others and injured 170.

She sued the company on behalf of herself and the estates of her parents. Last month, her attorney struck a settlement that has a rare twist: More than $32 million is not going to Rowe.

BP Products North America Inc. pledged $32 million to five medical and educational institutions. The deal also includes as much as $6 million in additional matching funds. Arenazas v. BP Products North America, No. 05-CV-0337 (Galveston Co., Texas, Dist. Ct.). Rowe received a confidential settlement.

Civil actions ending in creative settlements that do more than put money into the pockets of plaintiffs and their lawyers are unusual, but attorneys are starting to see more of them.

In October, for instance, an accidentally paralyzed plaintiff, his family and lawyers in Tampa, Fla., pledged all of a medical malpractice jury's $100.1 million punitive damages award -- part of the largest med-mal verdict in state history -- to the Miami Project to Cure Paralysis at the University of Miami Leonard M. Miller School of Medicine. Navarro v. Austin, No. 02-6154 (Hillsborough Co., Fla., Cir. Ct.).

Lawyers involved in settling cases that result in charitable donations acknowledge that parties in some instances gain in improved public relations and financial benefits such as tax breaks. They also note that the prospect of a defendant's gaining any such advantage can discourage plaintiffs from charitable settlements.

Typically, a plaintiff is trying to find an acceptable resolution of a traumatic event, according to René M. Haas of Perry & Haas, a boutique practice in Corpus Christi, Texas, which, she said, now handle four to 10 cases a year involving people killed or maimed in industrial accidents.

"Most of the time, what we end up working with is a client who really wants something good to come out of a bad situation," said Haas, who is also a former Texas district judge.

One of Haas' clients, a widow who lost her husband in an oil refinery accident, set aside $1 million of her confidential settlement -- and counsel set aside its fee on that portion -- to help fund a plant safety academic program and a scholarship at Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi, she said. Wright v. Citgo Petroleum Corp., No. 99-4396-C (Nueces Co., Texas, Dist. Ct. 2002).

In another case -- a post-trial settlement in which a refinery worker who was permanently disabled by a blast won a $30 million punitive damages award against an oil company -- the client agreed to forgo the punitive damages award if the company instituted a new safety program, Haas said. The program will be paid for by the company but monitored independently to ensure compliance. Caballero v. Esenjay Petroleum Corp., No. 95-6629-A (Nueces Co., Texas, Dist. Ct. 1997).

PUNITIVE DAMAGES PLEDGED

The $100.1 million donation in the Tampa medical malpractice case in October came at the end of a trial in which a jury had already returned a $116.7 million compensatory damages award in favor of Allan Navarro, whose misdiagnosed stroke resulted in his paralysis.

C. Steve Yerrid of the Yerrid Law Firm in Tampa, one of Navarro's lawyers, said that Navarro decided before the jury returned its punitive damages verdict to give the full amount of whatever the jury awarded to an institution that serves people with neurological and spinal cord injuries.

Jeffrey M. Goodis of Thompson, Goodis, Thompson, Groseclose & Richardson in St. Petersburg, Fla., a lawyer for the defendants, declined to discuss a case pending appeal. But he pointed out that in pledging the punitive damages award, the plaintiffs are "donating something they don't have."

Goodis said that an extra motivation for plaintiffs to agree to these creative settlements is that they must pay full taxes on punitive damages, as must the attorney on his or her 25 percent to 40 percent contingency fee.

Yerrid said that in questioning a grievously injured plaintiff's motives, the defense "deals in an area of thought that I cannot even begin to engage in." He said the judge in the Navarro case has already denied all of the defense's post-trial motions. The defendants' last chance is the state appeals court.

"We have a judgment I think that's pretty valid, though of course there's always the problem of collecting a judgment," Yerrid said.

In another case Yerrid handled, the family of a man who died when surgeons operating on a cancerous kidney accidentally cut his aorta and vena cava agreed that, in addition to a confidential cash settlement, the hospital would fund a pair of $5,000 nursing scholarships for minority candidates for 20 years. Greenway v. St. Joseph's Hospital, No. 03-11667G (Hillsborough Co., Fla., Cir. Ct.).

Roland J. Lamb of Morgan, Lamb, Goldman & Valles in Tampa, who represented the hospital in the Greenway case, confirmed that the scholarships were part of the settlement but declined to comment on it.

DOJ_NMG_0107575

Dan D. Kohane, president of the Tampa-based Federation of Defense & Corporate Counsel and a partner at Buffalo, N.Y.'s Hurwitz & Fine, said that he is seeing more of these kinds of settlements, especially in lower-profile cases.

Insurance companies and self-insured defendants would rather contribute to a public good than pay money to an individual.

But the public seldom hears about the contributions because defendants do not want their payments to appear to be admissions of liability, which they are not, Kohane said.

"Sometimes you can find a creative solution or a remedy that is not just money in someone's pocket," Kohane said. "It can be any kind of thing: an apology or a change of character, a scholarship, a park, putting up a statue, a drunk driving program," he said.

The outcome of the BP case had a lot to do with the client, said attorney Brent W. Coon of Brent Coon & Associates in Beaumont, Texas, who represented Eva Rowe.

"The client in this case was the difference -- some clients just want to take the money offered and put the case behind them," said Coon, adding that he has made "small charitable deals in other cases, but nothing anywhere near the magnitude of this."

MORE CASES SCHEDULED

Ronnie Chappell, a spokesman for BP America, would say only that the company "is deeply sorry for the loss that Ms. Rowe and others suffered from this terrible industrial accident." He added that BP is working to ensure that it does not happen again, and is committed to avoiding long and protracted litigation and to resolving all claims in a fair way.

The case settled last month as jury selection was beginning in what would have been the first group of cases to be tried. Coon noted that he has settled less than a third of the total of 150 to 175 BP refinery explosion cases that he has. His next trial group of five cases is set for trial in February 2007.

The amount BP paid in fees to Rowe and Coon is confidential.

The company will donate $12.5 million to the Truman G. Blocker Burn Unit at University of Texas Medical Branch at Galveston; $12.5 million to the Mary Kay O'Connor Process Safety Center at Texas A&M University; and $5 million to the College of the Mainland in Texas City for safety and process technology training for refinery and chemical plant workers, all in memory of the 15 people who died.

The company also has pledged a potential $6 million in matching funds for donations to each of these institutions made in the six months following the settlement, up to $2 million per institution.

BP also earmarked $1 million donations to two other institutions that Rowe designated in her parents' memory, according to Coon's office.

In another element of the settlement, BP has agreed to the release of documents and deposition testimony related to the case, which will be posted on the Web site www.texascityexplosionmedia.com, Coon said.

CASES 'UNDER THE RADAR'

Richard W. Mithoff of the Mithoff Law Firm in Houston said that he does about one settlement a year "for a client who really wants to make a difference in a way besides just trying to recover money."

"I've had clients set up scholarship funds, clients who lost a child in an accident and were awkward about recovering money for a dead child," he said. He also represented a surgeon in a medical malpractice case in which the surgeon was injured.

"Part of the settlement required the hospital to set up a teaching/research fund in [the surgeon's] name. He was in his 60s when he sustained the injury, well respected and not in need of money. He and the hospital had a real interest in a teaching fund and scholarship fund," Mithoff said, declining to identify his cases.

"Medical cases are not headliners. A lot of it's under the radar screen because a lot of cases are settled confidentially, though hospitals are happy to set aside money for scholarships and research funds," he said.

Automating The E-mail Discovery Process Proves Fruitful For Transatlantic Reinsurance Co. (LAW)

DOJ_NMG_0107576

By Edward Kelley

Law.com, December 19, 2006

Any attorney or in-house counsel who relies on e-mail for evidence or litigation support knows that e-mail discovery is among the most mind-numbing, inefficient processes that enterprises face. And in today's highly regulated business climate, e-mail messages have become one of the most scrutinized and sought after categories of business records.

Transatlantic Reinsurance Company, Inc. better known as "TRC," is one of the largest publicly traded reinsurers in the industry, and like all other players in that industry, we face increasing oversight over business transactions -- particularly relating to e-mail. As a result, our legal and IT teams are responsible for searching through and reviewing tens of thousands of messages to find pertinent e-mails related to inquiries. These examinations are almost always subject to fairly tight deadlines.

THE PERSISTENCE OF E-MAIL

The challenge with e-mail is that retention policies are difficult to police at best, and e-mail never really goes away.

As a result, companies like TRC have ended up with literally millions of messages stored on multiple servers.

Prior to automating our retrieval and analysis process, our IT team spent between one and three days processing each keyword inquiry.

Depending on the number of "hits" returned, our lawyers then had thousands of e-mails to review for relevance and privilege.

Each time a regulator returned with a new keyword request, an entirely new search had to be initiated. In instances where historical data were needed from tapes or other long-term media, the IT department would inevitably need to add at least another week to the process. Once the search was complete, we had to cull the duplicate hits caused by getting the same e-mail from any number of recipients. As a result, our legal personnel ended up spending days organizing and analyzing the results. In one instance, a review of 11,000 messages generated by a keyword search determined that approximately 50 percent were duplicates and another 40 percent were spam or irrelevant. In the end, less than 10 percent were actually relevant.

This immense workload and the difficulty of coordinating these activities between multiple departments put a constant strain on our legal and IT group. The result was inefficiency for both departments. Like most other companies that experience this same challenge, we spent so much time locating e-mails, we found ourselves short on time when it came to the more important job of analyzing the results. To maintain our competitive edge, we needed to free up our time and streamline the back and forth process between all groups. This would enable us to draw intelligent, accurate conclusions instead of looking at a pile of seemingly random messages. That's when we made the strategic decision to automate our retrieval and analysis process.

INTELLIGENCE MAKES THE DIFFERENCE

By automating our e-mail discovery process with the Clearwell E-Mail Intelligence Platform, we've extended our search capabilities with technology that provides a much deeper level of analysis. This type of intelligence has enabled us to identify, extract and deliver actionable content from our e-mail systems. Now, we have a single view into multiple, globally based e-mail stores (including exchange servers, archives and PSTs), and by streamlining our e-discovery efforts we are able to quickly and accurately retrieve and analyze the results. Our new process took the headache out of e-discovery, and has empowered our legal department to autonomously revise inquiries for specific mail threads, reducing the burden placed upon IT and saving countless hours searching for e-mails. Our department now spends more time and attention analyzing evidence with a level of intelligence previously unavailable with manual searches.

By utilizing a dedicated e-mail analysis product, one of the biggest challenges we've been able to overcome is identifying duplicate messages, which often added unnecessary complexity to the onerous process of responding to e-mail inquiries. When we factored in the number of e-mail communications sent to multiple people (other recipients in the "To", "CC" or "BCC" fields), we ended up with a lot of duplicate e-mails. Using a standard keyword search yielded thousands of unrelated e-mails including many spam and junk e-mail messages. In contrast, our new process automatically eliminates duplicate and irrelevant messages from the results, saving us countless hours of filtering and organizing searches with no redundancy. E-mail intelligence is really the best way to describe our new approach.

The technology we now employ is sophisticated -- using advanced weighting algorithms to help index our e-mail-specific metadata and accurately establish e-mail rank, giving each e-mail a relevancy score. By automatically linking messages together into threads, we can view critical discussions, pinpoint when messages were sent and identify key contributors instantly, visually displaying who knew what and when. Topic analysis made it quick and easy to locate exactly the right message threads without manually reading through thousands of e-mails. Capabilities such as e-mail ranking and discussion threads also have been an enormous help in reducing the headache of e-mail analysis for both our legal and IT teams.

MORE TIME FOR THE REAL ISSUES

By reducing our e-mail review time, as a company we can respond even more rapidly and confidently to regulatory inquiries. This resource has freed up our legal team to respond faster and move on to more strategic work. Additionally, we can now apply our resources to support a greater number of TRC's customer-focused initiatives, like structuring effective reinsurance programs and building solutions that help our clients.

Some of the other benefits we've seen include faster e-mail analysis through relevant search results, discussion threads and de-duplication; reduction in IT and legal dollars spent on e-mail review and analysis; and minimal product training and rapid user adoption from a simple, intuitive user interface. That's No Bull: Damages Reduction Leads To Attorney Fee Cut (LAW)

By Mary Alice Robbins, Texas Lawyer

In a unanimous decision, the Texas Supreme Court has ruled for the first time that two legal principles appellate courts use to limit or overturn damage awards also can be applied to attorney fees.

On Dec. 1, the Supreme Court affirmed the 1st Court of Appeals' decision to significantly reduce the damages awarded in Barker and Barker v. Eckman, a suit involving the distribution of proceeds from the sale of bull semen collected, stored and sold under a bailment agreement. The high court concluded that the Houston appeals court was correct when it held that the statute of limitations barred breaches of the agreement that occurred more than four years before Walter Eckman sued Emzy and Ava Barker.

However, the Supreme Court reversed the 1st Court's affirmation of the attorney fees awarded in Barker and remanded the case to the 151st District Court in Houston for a new trial on the fee issue.

The Supreme Court held that the Barkers are entitled to a meaningful evidentiary review of the jury's finding regarding the attorney fees awarded to Eckman in light of the 1st Court's decision to reduce the damages awarded.

In his analysis finding that the Barkers are entitled to a meaningful evidentiary review of the attorney fees awarded, Supreme Court Justice Phillip Johnson, author of the opinion, cited 1996's Saenz v. Fidelity & Guaranty Insurance Underwriters. The Supreme Court made it clear in Saenz that a court of appeals must conduct a meaningful review to determine whether sufficient evidence supports a jury's award of mental anguish damages.

As Johnson noted in Barker, the 1st Court's review of the jury's finding as to the attorney fees could not provide the Barkers the meaningful factual sufficiency evidentiary review to which they were entitled because the damages amount, or "results obtained," on which the jury based the attorney fee was incorrect. The jury charge listed the results obtained as one of the factors the jurors were to consider in determining a reasonable attorney's fee, according to the opinion.

In Barker, the high court also for the first time applied to attorney fees the "presumptive harm" rule that it annunciated in 2000's Crown Life Insurance Co. v. Casteel and subsequent cases. The court concluded in Barker that an appellate court will presume harm and must reverse the attorney fees awarded unless it can be reasonably certain that the jury's fee award was not significantly affected by the error in the damages award.

Because the statute of limitations had run on most of Eckman's claims, and the correct damages in Barker were one-seventh of the erroneous damages, "we are not reasonably certain that the jury was not significantly affected by the error" when calculating the attorney fees, Johnson wrote in the opinion.

"This is the first time they've applied that kind of logic to attorneys' fees," says J. Brett Busby, the attorney for the Barkers, owners and operators of a Central Texas business that collected, stored and sold semen from Brahman bulls and distributed the proceeds to the bull owners.

Busby, a partner in Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw in Houston, says the ruling shows the Supreme Court may be willing to extend the Casteel presumptive-harm rule to other kinds of cases.

Pete Schenkkan, an attorney for Texans for Lawsuit Reform (TLR), which filed an amicus curiae brief with the Supreme Court, says the opinion shows that in a fee-shifting-statute case such as Barker, one of the most important factors a jury must consider when determining a fee is the results obtained.

According to its amicus brief, TLR exists to advocate sound public policy on civil litigation issues. TLR contended in the brief that Barker presents an important legal issue within the litigation system -- how to ensure that statutory fee-shifting awards are, as required by the Legislature, reasonable.

OBJECTION WAIVED

In the opinion, the Supreme Court sets out the following facts: The Barkers owned Brushy Creek Custom Sires, where they boarded and provided other services for Brahman bulls. Between 1981 and 1995, the Barkers boarded bulls that Walter Eckman co-owned with two other persons. The Barkers collected, stored and sold semen from the bulls and distributed the proceeds to Eckman and his co-owners, according to the interest each owned in the animals or semen.

Eckman became convinced that Brushy Creek had breached its agreement with regard to the sale of the semen, the handling of proceeds from those sales and an accounting to Eckman for his shares of the semen. In an Oct. 25, 1995, letter, Eckman demanded that the Barkers deliver the semen he owned to a different storage facility, compensate Eckman properly for his share of prior sales and repay overcharges for semen storage. The Barkers delivered the semen as requested but did not agree to Eckman's monetary demands.

Eckman sued the Barkers in May 1997 in the 151st District Court, alleging that the Barkers breached their bailment agreement in a number of ways.

As noted in the Supreme Court's opinion, the Barkers contended at the trial in 2000 that Eckman's claims were barred by the four-year statute of limitations.

But the jury found the Barkers failed to comply with the bailment agreement and awarded Eckman $111,983 in damages. The jury also found that Eckman's attorney fees totaled $244,500 for trial preparation and the appellate process.

After the trial court denied their motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict, the Barkers appealed to the 1st Court.

In 2003, the 1st Court ruled that the Barkers had waived their statute of limitations argument. But, acting on the Barkers' motion for rehearing, the appeals court did an about face, holding in 2004 that the bailment agreement between the Barkers and Eckman constituted a contractual relationship and that the statute of limitations barred the claims on all but $16,180 of the damages the jury had awarded.

However, the 1st Court affirmed the jury's findings as to the attorney fees awarded to Eckman. The appeals court held that the Barkers had waived an objection to the award of attorney fees because they failed to object to the jury instruction or submit a question asking the jury to segregate the fees for Eckman's attorney fees according to the various services rendered.

Eckman and the Barkers subsequently filed petitions for review with the Supreme Court. Eckman argued that the 1st Court erred in reducing his damages on the basis of the statute of limitations because the cause of action for all of his damages accrued in October 1995 when he sent the Barkers the demand letter. The Barkers contended that the 1st Court erred when it affirmed the award of attorney fees that was based on the jury's incorrect amount of damages.

LIMITATIONS FIGHT

In his brief to the Supreme Court, Eckman argued that a cause of action for breach of a bailment agreement does not accrue until the person whose property was being held makes a demand upon the person holding the property. Eckman further argued that if there is no demand or an ineffective demand, the statute of limitations does not begin running until the bailor has notice that the bailee's conduct is inconsistent with the bailor's rights.

The Barkers argued in their brief to the high court that the $244,500 in attorney fees that the 1st Court affirmed bore no reasonable relationship to the $16,180 in damages that the appeals court determined Eckman should recover. As the Barkers noted, the record in the case does not provide a factually sufficient explanation of why the nature and circumstances of the case support such a grossly disproportionate award.

The Supreme Court agreed with Eckman that a cause of action for breach of a bailment agreement can accrue when the bailee refuses to comply with the bailor's rightful demand for return or disposition of the bailed property or when the bailee does something clearly inconsistent with the bailor's rights. But that does not preclude accrual of an action at an earlier time if the bailee breaches the agreement at an earlier time, the court held.

"We do not see that bailment contracts differ from contracts in general to the extent that the rule as to when a party has the right to sue for breach of an agreement should be altered for them," Johnson wrote for the court.

The court held that Eckman's claims for the various breaches accrued when each individual breach occurred.

Robert L. Ketchand, Eckman's attorney and a shareholder in Houston's Boyer & Ketchand, says it's significant that the Supreme Court has held that a bailment case should be treated just like any other contract case for purposes of limitations.

"I think that is a major departure from historical rules regarding statute of limitations in bailment cases," Ketchand says.

With regard to the court's decision on the attorney fees, Ketchand says, "The way I read it, we could go back and get more attorney's fees."

Ketchand says he thinks the most significant thing about Barker is the fact that the Supreme Court did not establish a rule for proportionality as urged by TLR.

TLR argued in its brief that when an appellate court substantially reduces compensatory damages, "common sense suggests a presumption of a remittitur proportionately reducing the corresponding fee-shifting award."

Schenkkan, TLR's attorney and a shareholder in Austin's Graves, Dougherty, Hearon & Moody, says that when the 1st Court reduced the actual damages, that required a recalculation of the amount of attorney fees. TLR suggested a presumptive, not automatic, proportionate remittitur as a way to do the recalculation without a remand, Schenkkan says.

The Supreme Court declined to take that approach.

Gov. Wants Death Penalty Procedure Corrected (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, December 19, 2006

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today directed his administration to fix problems with the state's procedure to execute prisoners.

Schwarzenegger acted in response to a stinging decision issued Friday by U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose, who said the state's system "is broken, but ..can be fixed."

"I am committed to doing whatever it takes to ensure that the lethal injection process is constitutional so that the will of the people is followed and the death penalty is maintained in California," Schwarzenegger said in a prepared statement. "My administration will take immediate action to resolve court concerns which have cast legal doubt on California's procedure for carrying out the death penalty."

In his ruling, Fogel, who visited the death chamber in San Quentin and held a four-day hearing in September, said the state's current procedures involving lethal injection violates the Constitution's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Fogel gave state officials 30 days to let him know what they planned to do and he urged the governor to get involved.

Fogel listed a number of problems with how the death penalty is implemented in California, including inconsistent and unreliable screening of execution team members, poorly trained staff, inconsistent and unreliable record keeping of drugs used in the process, improper mixing, preparation and administration of drugs administered by the execution team, overcrowded conditions and poorly designed facilities in which the execution team must work. He also blasted state personnel involved in the process for a "pervasive lack of professionalism."

In a prepared statement released today, Schwarzenegger said his top legal and correctional officials "will lead an effort to implement a screening process and undertake a comprehensive training program for execution team members, create standardized record-keeping, recommend how to improve the death penalty facility and identify the best experts in other states to advise the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation on lethal injection and its implementation."

Schwarzenegger said he had asked his legal affairs legal Andrea Lynn Hoch to work with the Corrections Department to in the next 30 days take the following five steps:

• Establish a screening process for selection of execution team members and periodic review process for team members.

• Establish a comprehensive training program for all members of the execution team so all are familiar with the drugs being used, their preparation and the risks associated with the drugs.

• Develop standardized record-keeping to ensure that there are complete and reliable records of each execution.

• Recommend how to improve the death penalty facility at San Quentin, which was switched from a gas chamber to a lethal injection chamber, to ensure there is adequate equipment, lighting, and space for the execution team members to perform their functions.

• Identify the best experts in other states to advise the Corrections Department on the lethal injection protocol and its implementation.

Judge Fogel's ruling was in response to a lawsuit filed earlier this year by condemned inmate Michael Morales, who has been on death row for more than 20 years after he was convicted of murdering Lodi teenager Terri Winchell.

ANTITRUST:

FCC Official Declines To Vote On AT& T Deal (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

Federal Communications Commissioner Robert M. McDowell announced yesterday that he would disqualify himself from voting on AT&T's proposed purchase of BellSouth on ethical grounds, depriving the FCC of a potential swing vote that could have broken the stalemate among its Democratic and Republican members.

McDowell, saying he felt compelled to silence speculation over whether he would take part in the vote, accused his colleagues of failing to negotiate in good faith over conditions for approving the $86 billion merger proposed seven months ago.

"It appears that the lingering question of my involvement is being used as another excuse for delay and inaction," he told reporters.

McDowell has said for months that he would not vote because he previously worked as senior vice president for Comptel, an association that lobbied on behalf of companies competing with AT&T and BellSouth. But despite his concern about a possible conflict of interest, the FCC's general counsel, Samuel Feder, ruled this month that McDowell could take part because of an overriding government interest in breaking the deadlock.

McDowell rejected that reasoning and criticized Feder's opinion, saying it overlooked important facts and legal considerations. In particular, he said the opinion did not address the ethics agreement reached during his Senate confirmation process this year in which he pledged not to participate for a year in any matter in which Comptel had been involved.

"While I expected the legal equivalent of body armor, I was handed Swiss cheese," McDowell said.

FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, who asked Feder to issue the opinion, has been urging McDowell to take part in the considerations. Late yesterday, Martin said his aim had been to make sure the commission considered the merger in a timely fashion.

DOJ_NMG_0107581

"With Commissioner McDowell having made his decision, I will continue to try to work with my colleagues to bring our consideration of this merger to conclusion," Martin said in a statement.

He also said he respected McDowell's decision to abstain. Though both men are Republicans, their relations have been strained since McDowell joined the FCC.

Martin has been an advocate of approving the merger without conditions. But the two Democratic members have insisted that the deal, which would create a telecommunications giant, include safeguards to ensure competition and protect consumers.

The FCC has repeatedly postponed acting because of the stalemate, and no vote is scheduled.

Amid Twists At FCC Review, AT&T Hurdles Loom (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- AT&T Inc.'s $86 billion bid to buy BellSouth Corp. could face a variety of unwanted conditions after a Federal Communications Commission member said he won't vote on the deal because of ethical concerns.

The decision yesterday by Robert McDowell, a telecommunications lawyer, to abstain from voting was an unwelcome development for the companies, which had been counting on the Republican to break the impasse that has paralyzed the agency's review of the deal.

The FCC's review had broken down during the past few weeks amid partisan bickering, with the two Democrats on the five-member commission pushing for certain conditions and the two remaining Republicans opposing them. Mr. McDowell's decision to step aside increases the likelihood that AT&T will be forced to accept some conditions involving "net neutrality," or the idea that all Internet traffic should be treated equally. However, it also sweeps away uncertainty about who will vote, which has slowed negotiations on merger conditions.

Mr. McDowell has expressed concern about whether he could vote since the merger was announced in March, shortly after he was nominated for the FCC job. Mr. McDowell previously lobbied on behalf of CompTel, a trade group that represents smaller phone companies and has energetically opposed the deal. Mr. McDowell must abstain from voting on matters that involve the group for a year.

Even without Mr. McDowell's vote, there is little question the FCC will approve the deal. But his abstention will change what conditions might be imposed.

The FCC's two Democrats are demanding that AT&T abide by net-neutrality conditions, which would require the company to treat all Internet traffic equally. The FCC's two Republican members, notably Chairman Kevin Martin, agree with AT&T that such a condition would hinder its ability to manage its network and roll out new services for consumers. Mr. McDowell had publicly sided with his Republican colleagues on the net-neutrality issue, which is one reason he was being pressed to vote on the deal.

Democrats want nondiscrimination rules to apply on AT&T's lines all the way to the company's Internet backbone. AT&T has so far been willing to agree to apply those rules to portions of the network, but not all of it.

Another potential merger condition will center on the pricing of wholesale high-volume data lines used by corporate customers. Wireless phone companies and corporate customers have complained that consolidation of those high-volume lines will lead to significantly higher prices. Similar concerns were raised during the merger of SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.'s acquisition of MCI Corp. In those mergers, the Justice Department required limited divestitures in some cities, and the FCC required limited price caps for those lines.

The Justice Department approved the AT&T-BellSouth transaction in October without any conditions.

Mr. McDowell's decision ended a week of drama and hand-wringing about whether he should vote. The angst began about 10 days ago, when the FCC's general counsel, in a memo, gave legal justification for Mr. McDowell's participation. It didn't make as strong a case as many thought it would. Instead, it detailed concerns by the head of the Office of Government Ethics, who suggested Mr. McDowell shouldn't vote.

DOJ_NMG_0107582

"While I expected the legal equivalent of body armor, I was handed Swiss cheese," Mr. McDowell said yesterday. The Virginia Bar Association, of which Mr. McDowell is a member, also cautioned him on voting on the deal. "They did not encourage me to go forward," he said.

For a week, Mr. McDowell remained quiet about his intentions, while privately pressing his colleagues to jump-start the merger talks in hopes of their reaching a deal. Those efforts proved fruitless, however, and Mr. McDowell decided to step aside now, an FCC official said, rather than get involved in the merger talks and either vote or abstain at the last minute.

Congressional Democrats immediately applauded Mr. McDowell's decision. Democratic FCC Commissioner Michael Copps said it provided clarity that "should give some juice to our ongoing discussions."

Washington politicians' recent debate about propriety and ethics -- which helped Democrats retake Congress -- appears to have played a role in Mr. McDowell's decision. Mr. McDowell's concerns about protecting his integrity -- and avoiding becoming a punching bag for Democrats on Capitol Hill for the next two years -- appear to have won out over merger proponents who wanted the deal approved with minimal conditions.

One reason for the FCC's delay in approving the merger has been the continued uncertainty about whether Mr. McDowell would participate. FCC board members negotiated but never came close to cutting a deal while Mr. McDowell's involvement remained an option. Negotiations ended about two weeks ago, FCC sources say, when Mr. Martin suggested that he was only willing to go so far on the net-neutrality issue.

"The chairman has continued to be committed to working with his colleagues and acting on the merger. But the sticking points are still very sticky," said an FCC official close to the negotiations. "We're not sure how quickly this merger can be approved."

In a statement, AT&T said it would continue to work with the FCC to get the deal approved. "We will -- as we have always done -- do our part to bring the merger review to a bipartisan completion as quickly as possible," said an AT&T spokesman.

FCC Member Officially Bows Out Of Voting On AT& T Deal (USAT)

By Leslie Cauley

USA Today, December 19, 2006

NEW YORK — Robert McDowell, the third Republican on the Federal Communications Commission's five-member panel, said Monday that he will not vote on AT&T's $80 billion purchase of BellSouth.

His decision leaves intact a deadlock between the two Democrats who want to impose several conditions on the deal, and the other two Republicans, including Chairman Kevin Martin, who favor no conditions.

McDowell, who joined the FCC in June, initially abstained from participating in the AT&T-BellSouth case because he used to lobby for CompTel, a trade group that represents small carriers that oppose the deal.

He also cited ethical concerns of the Virginia Bar Association.

Earlier this month FCC general counsel Sam Feder said that McDowell could vote on the deal.

McDowell said he had hoped Feder's recommendation would provide him with the "legal equivalent of body armor." Instead, he said, "I was handed Swiss cheese."

After conferring with several advisers, including the executive branch's Office of Government Ethics, McDowell decided to "follow my own personal sense of ethics" and "disqualify myself from this matter."

Referring to the crush of ethics scandals that have consumed headlines over the past year, McDowell said Americans often "have been disappointed by those who hold public office. I hope this is one instance where they are not disappointed."

Martin said in a statement that he appreciated McDowell's "thoughtful consideration," adding that he would "respect his decision to abstain." The FCC cannot compel a commissioner to vote.

The BellSouth deal just needs the FCC's approval to close. It already has been approved by the Department of Justice, which imposed no conditions.

The two Democrats, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, are pushing for conditions in two areas.

They want "net neutrality," which is the idea of making sure high-speed broadband lines are available on fair terms for all comers.

DOJ_NMG_0107583

The second area is "special access." They want AT&T to reduce the rates it charges rivals to lease the large-capacity data lines that are a staple in business.

AT&T has so far refused to agree to any conditions that might limit its ability to manage its new high-speed broadband network, which is costing the carrier billions to construct. It is also reluctant to agree to conditions that might curb profitability in the special-access segment.

Yet with McDowell out of the picture, AT&T will be forced to work out a deal with the Democrats.

"This is a setback for AT&T," says Gene Kimmelman, public policy director of Consumers Union, which opposes the deal.

AT&T "clearly expected that they were going to get a vote from McDowell that rubber-stamped the deal," he says. "It was a miscalculation."

Stifel Nicolaus analyst Blair Levin agrees.

On the day the Justice Department approved the merger with no conditions, "You could practically hear the champagne corks popping" at AT&T, Levin recalled.

The lesson? "As Yogi Berra used to say, it ain't over till the fat lady sings."

On a positive note, Levin says negotiations between AT&T and the FCC should kick into high gear now that the McDowell question has been settled.

"It's sort of like the NBA," he says. "Nobody really plays hard until the fourth quarter."

AT&T closed at $35.47, down 19 cents, while BellSouth fell 72 cents to $45.33.

Virtuous Neutrality (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 19, 2006

What an FCC commissioner's recusal means for AT&T and BellSouth -- and millions of Internet users.

IT'S UNCLEAR WHETHER he acted out of principle or obligation, but Robert M. McDowell made the right choice Monday. McDowell, a Republican appointed earlier this year to the Federal Communications Commission by President Bush, recused himself from the FCC's decision on whether to approve AT&T's proposed acquisition of BellSouth.

His decision leaves the FCC deadlocked, with the two other Republicans resisting demands by the commission's two Democrats for more restrictions on the merged company. But that may be just as well, at least for consumers, if it leads the commission to compromise on the one issue that could most affect Internet users: something called "Net neutrality."

Democrats Michael J. Copps and Jonathan S. Adelstein want to bar AT&T's high-speed Internet service from offering special treatment to data from websites or online services that pay extra for it. AT&T and other broadband suppliers have resisted the Net neutrality requirement, while Google, Amazon and other Web-based companies have lobbied hard for it.

McDowell used to be a lobbyist for a trade group that opposes the merger. The FCC's general counsel recently cleared him to vote despite the apparent conflict, but McDowell opted Monday to stay out. His move increases the chances that his old employer will prevail — that AT&T and BellSouth will be forced to accept numerous restrictions or abandon the deal. At the same time, McDowell has publicly called for fewer regulations and has questioned the need for Net neutrality rules. No matter. At least McDowell got to act principled — in announcing his decision, he used the words "ethics" or "ethical" 33 times in five pages.

The Justice Department has already signed off on the merger, but AT&T can't complete the purchase without the assent of the FCC. That means Copps and Adelstein, who are more skeptical about the deal's benefits for the public, have an unusual amount of leverage as long as McDowell stays out of the picture.

And that's a good thing, at least as far as Net neutrality is concerned. This merger is less troubling than it would have been a decade ago, with Internet service providers, cable TV and wireless companies all offering alternatives to the local phone companies' copper lines. There is far less competition, however, in high-speed Internet service. In many parts of the country, consumers may have only one or no alternative to the DSL service to be offered by AT&T/BellSouth.

That's why the merger should not be approved unless there is a guarantee that AT&T will offer a level playing field to websites and online services, at least until their customers have more choices for high-speed Internet connections.

Benefit Firm Attempts To Outbid CVS For Caremark (WP)

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

Pharmacy-benefit manager Express Scripts yesterday attempted to outbid retail pharmacy giant CVS for Caremark Rx with an offer of $26 billion in cash and stock, joining a flurry of year-end mergers and acquisitions.

The proposal stunned many investors and marked the first shot in what could become a protracted battle over who gets to be the nation's leading filler of drug prescriptions.

In other deals announced yesterday, several private-equity firms said they planned to acquire a variety of companies, including the parent of both Century 21 and Coldwell Banker, as well as Harrah's casinos and a maker of hip and knee replacements, continuing a record year for private-equity buyouts.

Caremark and CVS last month agreed to what was characterized as a merger of equals, with CVS offering Caremark shareholders $22.5 million in stock. The combination of Caremark, the nation's second-largest pharmacy-benefit manager, and CVS, the second-largest pharmacy retailer, would create the biggest private-sector buyer of prescription drugs, responsible for managing more than 1 billion prescriptions a year.

Pharmacy-benefit managers are hired by employers to negotiate lower prices from drugmakers and to determine what employees are required to pay. Some companies, such as Caremark, also compete with retail pharmacies by buying and distributing drugs through the mail.

Caremark and CVS have said the size of the new company would give it better leverage with drug companies to demand lower prices, which would ultimately be passed onto consumers.

Express Scripts chief executive George Paz made similar predictions yesterday about a merger between his company and Caremark, even though Express Scripts is half the size of Caremark.

"Buying the company and putting this together allows us the opportunity to take advantage of the additional scale and size and to become bigger and stronger," he said.

Unlike CVS, Express Scripts is offering Caremark shareholders cash and a 15 percent premium based on the closing price of Caremark's shares last Friday. Express Scripts would have to borrow about $13 billion to pull off the deal, analysts estimated, and has lined up financing commitments from Citigroup Corporate and Investment Banking and Credit Suisse.

Caremark, based in Nashville, said its board would review Express Scripts' offer. Express Scripts said if rebuffed by Caremark's board, it would take its case directly to shareholders.

Shareholders have filed several lawsuits against Caremark, challenging the proposed merger with CVS and alleging the deal was designed to advance the interests of directors and insiders.

Some analysts yesterday predicted CVS would make a counteroffer. But the Woonsocket, R.I., company said in a statement that it had not yet reviewed Express Scripts' offer.

Express Scripts' play for Caremark came alongside a frenzy of acquisitions.

Apollo Management agreed to buy Realogy, the parent of Century 21 and Coldwell Banker, for $9 billion, Realogy said yesterday. Apollo plans to take on about $1.6 billion in debt and $750 million in other liabilities.

Apollo and another private-equity firm, Texas Pacific Group, were also reportedly close to buying Harrah's Entertainment yesterday for an estimated $16.7 billion.

The two deals highlighted the growing role of private-equity firms in the current buyout boom.

Buoyed by low interest rates, more access to financing and investors seeking bigger returns, several funds have raised more than $10 billion, topped by Blackstone, which raised $20 billion. Firms have also pooled money, allowing them to go after large public companies and take them private.

The result has been deals on a scale not seen since the heyday of leveraged buyouts in the late 1980s, said Colin Blaydon, director of the Center for Private Equity and Entrepreneurship at Dartmouth's Tuck School of Business. "Basically this year has been a record-setter for capital raised by private-equity funds and capital invested by private-equity funds," Blaydon said.

Blackstone, for example, partnered with Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Goldman Sachs Capital Partners to buy Biomet, a Warsaw, Ind.-based maker of hip and knee replacement products, for about $10.9 billion. In the deal announced yesterday, the firms plan to use a combination of their own cash and money borrowed from Goldman Sachs Group and Bank of America.

The pace of deal-making is likely to proceed into next year, Blaydon said.

"Right now, the economy is sufficiently strong and the debt market sufficiently robust that it will keep on going," he said.

Express Scripts' Bid For Caremark Could Trigger Fight (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, December 19, 2006

Express Scripts' unsolicited $26 billion bid for rival Caremark may force a bidding war for the pharmacy benefits manager.

While investors may think the Express Scripts cash-and-stock offer is more attractive than the $21 billion CVS all-stock deal, management at Caremark and CVS may be convinced that theirs is the better long-term move, says Merrill Lynch analyst Tom Gallucci in a research note to investors.

"We would anticipate that this deal will not go away without a fight," Gallucci wrote.

Analyst Robert Willoughby at Bank of America wrote in his note Monday about the Express Scripts bid that Caremark's board will be "hard-pressed to credibly thwart such an offer."

CVS, which said in a statement that it has not had a chance to review Express Script's offer, now has to decide if it wants to counteroffer.

Express Scripts CEO George Paz, in a letter to Caremark, says that his company's offer is the superior one and that the firm is willing to go directly to shareholders. "We are prepared to solicit proxies against approval of your proposed merger with CVS," he wrote.

If the bid is successful, Express Scripts, the third-largest pharmacy manager behind Caremark and Medco, would leap to first place. The combined company would control about 26% of all prescriptions filled, based on adjusted figures for 2006, says Willoughby's report. Medco would have about 16%.

The bid comes amid increasing pressure on the drug industry from government and employers to rein in drug costs. Adding to the pressure: recent moves by Wal-Mart and other big-box retailers to cut the cost of some generic drugs to as little as $4 a prescription.

Pharmacy benefit companies negotiate drug prices with drugmakers, wholesalers and pharmacies, passing some savings along to their insurer and employer clients. They sometimes also help draw up lists of drugs available to insured patients.

Express Scripts says the deal would result in cost savings of up to $500 million. Paz pointed to the company's effort to encourage the use of generic drugs as one way to reduce costs.

He says the firm saved clients $100 million this year by taking cholesterol treatment Lipitor off of its list of covered drugs, encouraging patients to take alternative Zocor instead, then switching them to generic Zocor when that came on the market.

The company may have to make the cost-savings case to antitrust regulators, because its proposed deal would reduce the number of big benefits managers from three to two.

"It's going to get close review," predicts Andrew Klevorn, a partner who specializes in antitrust law for Eimer Stahl law firm in Chicago. "When markets become more concentrated, that can lead to higher prices."

Express Scripts shares rose 1.9% Monday to $69.97, while Caremark's rose 10.5% to $55.58. CVS fell 1.7% to $30.01.

CVS Isn't Yet Out Of The Running In Race For Caremark (DOW)

By James Covert

Dow Jones Newswires, December 18, 2006

NEW YORK (Dow Jones)--CVS Corp. (CVS) isn't yet out of the running as a potential suitor for the pharmacy-benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc. (CMX).

Express Scripts Inc. (ESRX), a St. Louis-based pharmacy benefits manager, offered Monday to acquire its rival Caremark Rx for $26 billion in cash and stock. Express Scripts said its offer represents a 15% premium over retail pharmacy giant CVS's all-stock offer.

Nevertheless, analysts say CVS, of Woonsocket, R.I., could sweeten its bid, which had been perceived as low by Wall Street. In addition to its healthy balance sheet, CVS, in acquiring Nashville-based Caremark, could use the target company's strong cash flow to pay down debt it might take on to fund a bigger price tag. Analysts add that a deal with CVS would likely be more attractive to regulators, as an Express Scripts deal risks greater antitrust concerns.

"We do not regard this as a deal breaker for CVS' proposed merger of equals with Caremark," Goldman Sachs analyst John Heinbockel wrote in a Monday research note. Heinbockel noted that CVS could "modestly sweeten its offer" to as much as $25 billion by switching a portion of its all-stock offer to cash, and could do so without "meaningfully" reducing benefit that CVS expects the acquisition would add to its 2008 earnings.

"Caremark shareholders may prefer a combination with CVS, at a somewhat lower price, if they view the deal as truly transformative," Heinbockel says.

In a Monday conference call with analysts, Express Scripts executives said they had discussed the idea of buying Caremark with officials at the Federal Trade Commission, and that the company is confident it can overcome regulatory hurdles. In a Monday research note, Merrill Lynch & Co. added that a tie-up between Express Scripts and Caremark is "arguably more straightforward" than a deal with a retailer.

Yet a CVS deal still stands to be viewed more favorably by big drug customers, including the government and the drug-benefits programs it runs, according to Scott Mushkin, an analyst at Bank of America Securities in New York. That's because a CVS deal would eliminate a significant amount of channel conflicts between retailers and pharmacy-benefits managers, "driving down costs significantly," Mushkin says. That would contrast favorably to the "horizontal domination" that would likely result in a merger between Express Scripts and Caremark, he adds.

Indeed, an acquisition by Express Scripts would create a giant with a 40% share of the market in pharmacy-benefits management, according to John W. Ransom, an analyst at Raymond James & Associates. Meanwhile, Ransom says the strategic benefits are greater in a CVS deal. While Express Scripts would benefit from added scale and market share, CVS could use its increased scale to wring lower prices from suppliers, and enhance its range of offerings to consumers. CVS also would gain a better cushion against legislative cuts in average wholesale prices for drugs, Ransom says.

Another point in CVS's favor: the $600 million breakup fee it has secured in its agreement with Caremark. With or without the acquisition of Caremark, CVS is poised to benefit from increased drug sales at it continues to add prescription customers from the Medicare Part D drug-benefits program and elsewhere, Ransom says.

However, if CVS elects to sweeten its bid, the result wouldn't be good for CVS's debt profile, Gimme Credit said in a Monday research note. The company has been slow repaying debt from its acquisition of the Eckerd drugstore chain, and recently spent more than $4 billion to buy the drugstore operations of Albertson's Inc., which Gimme Credit called "mediocre performers."

"We can't fault the long-term strategy but clearly management is willing to sacrifice credit quality in the interim," Gimme Credit said.

None of the above-mentioned analysts reported conflicts related to CVS, Caremark or Express Scripts. But investors should assume their firms are pursuing investment-banking relationships with the companies.

"We have not yet had an opportunity to review this offer carefully," CVS said in a written statement Monday in response to the Express Scripts offer. "However, we note that we have a definitive agreement with Caremark... We believe the prospects for completing that transaction are excellent and we remain confident in the long-term strategic value of our combination as well as the benefit to shareholders of CVS and Caremark."

Caremark shares surged 11.6% on the news, recently trading at $56.12, up $5.82 from Friday's close. Shares of Express Scripts were up 57 cents, or 0.8%, early Monday afternoon at $69.23. CVS shares fell 27 cents, or 0.9%, to $30.25.

Biomet Agrees To Buyout, Reports Option-Dating Problems (NYT)

By Barnaby J. Feder

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

Biomet, a major manufacturer of artificial hips and knees, said today that it had agreed to be acquired by a private investment consortium for $10.9 billion.

The buyout bid came from affiliates of the Blackstone Group, Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and TPG.

DOJ_NMG_0107587

Biomet said in a news release that the private investment group is also expected to include Dane A. Miller, one of the founders of Biomet, who served as its chief executive until he resigned last April over disagreements with the company's board of directors.

The company also announced today that a board committee's review of the company's options-dating practices back to 1996 had uncovered numerous cases of option grants backdated to create immediate profits for the recipients, as well as shortcomings in the company's records.

Biomet, a 29-year-old company based in Warsaw, Ind., said that it had notified the Chicago office of the Securities and Exchange Commission about the options findings, and that it would not announce earnings for its second fiscal quarter as scheduled on Wednesday. It declined to predict how long it would take to sort out its books and report the figures.

The company said that senior executives, whom it did not name, had been aware of the backdating, "though they may not have been aware of the accounting and legal ramifications of this practice."

While the accounting irregularities have prevented a final tally of profits for the quarter, Biomet did say that sales were $520.3 million, a 5 percent increase over the comparable period a year earlier. That fell short of Wall Street's average forecast of $527 million.

The buyout bid works out to $44 a share, slightly less than the highest prices that have been bandied about in recent speculation suggesting that Biomet would merge with Smith & Nephew, a British orthopedics company. Smith & Nephew, which confirmed in November that the two companies were in talks, said today that those discussions had ended.

Biomet and the investor group said that the buyout could be completed by next October. In Nasdaq trading today, Biomet's shares fell 41 cents, or 1 percent, to close at $41.59, reflecting a belief that no competing bids are likely to emerge and that investors will have a relatively long wait before receiving their proceeds from the buyout, which represents a 4.8 percent premium on Friday's closing price of $42.

"You are talking about a very small return for a 10-month wait," said Raj Denhoy, who follows the orthopedics sector for Piper Jaffray & Company.

Smith & Nephew's shares, by contrast, surged on the news. Its American depository receipts gained $3.43, or 7.3 percent, to close at $50.58 on the New York Stock Exchange. Many investors in the company had been afraid that the British company would overpay for Biomet.

Smith & Nephew's rise may also be fueled by speculation that private equity investors might now buy that company, too, and perhaps combine them.

"This isn't a lot of money for this investment group," Robin Young, an orthopedics industry consultant and market researcher who publishes the Orthopedics This Week newsletter, said of the Biomet buyout. "They could turn right around and go after Smith & Nephew."

Even so, there has been no indication so far that the British company is for sale. Biomet, on the other hand, said publicly in April that it was considering all its strategic options and had hired Morgan Stanley to advise it; that was when Mr. Miller stepped down from his executive post. Daniel P. Hann, who was the company's general counsel, has served as interim president and chief executive since then, while Mr. Miller has served as a consultant to the company.

Many analysts had suggested that a combination of Biomet and Smith & Nephew made sense, because it would be roughly the same size in orthopedics as the three largest players — Zimmer Holdings, Stryker, and the DePuy division of Johnson & Johnson.

Biomet Agrees To Be Acquired For $10.9 Billion (WSJ)

By Susan Carey And Jonathan Vuocolo

The Wall Street Journal, December 19, 2006

Orthopedic-devices maker Biomet Inc. agreed to be acquired by a private-equity group for $10.9 billion, but investors failed to lift its shares to the asking price after the company disclosed problems with backdating stock options that could affect its financial results for the past decade.

DOJ_NMG_0107588

The Warsaw, Ind., company said that if its shareholders agree to the deal, they will receive $44 a common share from a private-equity group that includes affiliates of Blackstone Group, Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Texas Pacific Group.

The price represents a 27% premium to the stock's closing price in early April, a few days before Biomet said it had hired Morgan Stanley to help it look at strategic alternatives. That move came a week after the resignation of Dane Miller, Biomet's co-founder and its chief executive officer for 29 years. Mr. Miller is expected to be an investor in the new private company once the deal closes in October 2007.

With a market capitalization of about $10.2 billion and the fourth-largest share of hip- and knee-replacement devices by revenue world-wide, Biomet looked like a good candidate for another medical firm. It even held preliminary merger talks with United Kingdom competitor Smith & Nephew PLC, a fact Smith & Nephew disclosed in early November.

Private-Equity Advantage

But these days, private-equity firms, armed with low-cost capital and increasingly on the prowl for acquisitions, can often outbid potential strategic buyers.

DEALS MONDAY!

Deals valued at tens of billions of dollars were unveiled Monday. • Express Scripts Offers $26 Billion for Caremark Rx1

• Icos Accepts Lilly's Sweetened $2.3 Billion Offer2

• Private-Equity Firms Invest $3.4 Billion in Delphi3

• Apollo, Texas Pacific Set to Win Harrah's4

• Statoil, Norsk Hydro to Merge Oil, Gas Operations5

That is in contrast to the conventional wisdom of previous cycles when strategic buyers would pay more because there were more synergies and opportunities to cut costs. Also, most companies aren't comfortable with the levels of debt that private-equity firms put on their target companies. And the giant investment firms don't always face potential antitrust hurdles.

The Biomet deal is one of a flurry of deals this month. Even before December's frenetic activity, buyouts have risen 60% this year, according to data from J.P. Morgan Securities. And there is little indication that the credit markets have lost their enthusiasm for financing private-equity firms as investors remain hungry for yield in a world where interest rates remain low and may soon go lower.

Health-care companies have become one of the most popular areas for private-equity firms this year in the wake of the buyout of HCA Inc.

Matt Miksic, an analyst who follows medical-technology stocks for Morgan Stanley, said the leveraged buyout of Biomet endorses his view that companies in this sector "throw off a lot of cash and are attractive businesses." He had Biomet rated at the equivalent of a "buy" before the deal was announced, despite the disappointing performance of its spinal-product business. "Hips and knee implants have been clicking along pretty well," he said. Mr. Miksic doesn't own any Biomet stock, but Morgan Stanley has an investment-banking relationship with the company.

When news of the Biomet-Smith & Nephew talks came out, analysts at J.P. Morgan expressed caution about a possible tie-up, saying any deal would face challenges such as product and sales-force overlap, integration and valuation. "In our view, a going-private transaction makes the most sense for Biomet -- being outside the glare of public scrutiny could allow the company to make some tough decisions with respect to its cost structure, business portfolio and management," the analysts said in a research note.

While that scenario now has materialized, Biomet shares slipped 41 cents to $41.59 yesterday in 4 p.m. composite trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market. Volume was 11.8 million shares traded, compared with the daily average of 2.1 million.

Biomet said yesterday that it will postpone reporting its fiscal second-quarter results -- previously expected to be announced tomorrow -- while it continues an internal investigation that already has found that the company may have improperly "backdated" a substantial number of options granted to employees to purchase about 20 million Biomet shares in the past decade.

Options-Backdating Issues

Biomet said correcting errors in how these stock options were accounted for may have a material effect on its historical and/or current financial statements. Moreover, the company's unaudited sales of $520 million for its second quarter ended Nov. 30, while up 5% from a year ago, were below Wall Street's average view of $527 million.

Cowen & Co. analyst Dhulsini De Zoysa said she thinks investors are fretting that the stock-options review could have a material negative impact on Biomet's results, which could trigger the company's private-equity buyers to reprice their offer.

"Theoretically, that's the concern, I think," she said. But "without knowing the magnitude [of the potential impact] it's impossible to say" if the scenario is likely to unfold. The analyst doesn't own Biomet shares.

Biomet Agrees To $10.9 Billion Buyout (AP)

By Deanna Martin, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 19, 2006

A group of private investors that could include a founder of Biomet Inc. has offered $10.9 billion in cash for the Warsaw, Ind.-based orthopedics maker as they seek to capitalize on baby boomers who want to turn back the clock.

The consortium offered $44 per share, 27 percent more than Biomet's closing price on April 3, the last trading day before the merger talk began. The offer is $1 per-share higher than what one analyst said would be justified last week.

Wall Street greeted the news with skepticism. Biomet shares fell 41 cents, or 1 percent, to close at $41.59 in trading Monday on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

But Linda Varoli, vice president of merger research with the New York-based Wall Street Access, said the $10.9 billion purchase price — which will be paid with cash and loans — reflects the potential of the industry, which has been rattled recently by antitrust concerns.

In June, Biomet and three other orthopedics makers announced they had received subpoenas stemming from possible criminal violations in the manufacturing and sale of orthopedic implant devices.

"They wouldn't be making the investment if they didn't see some definite future growth in the company, and most likely in the industry in general," Varoli said of the consortium.

Monday's announcement ended merger speculation brewing since Biomet disclosed in April that it had hired Morgan Stanley to explore "strategic alternatives." The company recently had discussions with British rival Smith & Nephew LLC.

Biomet, established in 1977, is one of three orthopedics companies based in Warsaw, about 40 miles west of Fort Wayne. DePuy Orthopaedics Inc. and Zimmer Holdings Inc. also have operations there.

Orthopedic companies are counting on growth as the nation's 76 million baby boomers reach the age when knees, hips and shoulders sometimes need replacing.

Zimmer Holdings Inc. projects its 2007 sales to top $3.82 billion, an increase of about 10 percent over 2006.

"The number of people who will be in the age category that's typical of joint replacement will be continuing to grow for quite some time," said company spokesman Brad Bishop.

Baby boomers want to remain more active than past generations, said Christopher Kaeding, interim chairman of the Department of Orthopaedics at Ohio State University. "They don't just want to sit there in a rocking chair," Kaeding said. "They have higher expectations of what they want to do in terms of physical activity."

Biomet's buyers include Blackstone Group, Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and the Texas Pacific Group. Biomet founder Dane A. Miller, who resigned as CEO in March, also could join the deal, the company said.

Biomet's board voted in favor of the deal, which is subject to shareholder approval and antitrust clearance. Biomet officials said in a statement they expect the acquisition to be completed by Oct. 31. The company's stock would be delisted from the Nasdaq once the deal closed.

Company officials did not return messages left by The Associated Press.

"This transaction offers shareholders the ability to realize substantial value from their investments in Biomet and provides important benefits to our customers, team members and other stakeholders," interim President and Chief Executive Daniel P. Hann said in a statement.

Biomet, which has about 6,300 employees total, including 1,350 workers in Indiana, will remain in Warsaw.

Also Monday, Biomet said a review found that a substantial number of stock option grants made from 1996 to 2006 — issued on different dates than when they were granted to take advantage of a lower stock price — "were not well documented."

The practice, known as "backdating," is not illegal, but it must be properly accounted for.

Senior executives were aware of the practice, according to Biomet but were not necessarily aware of the legal ramifications.

The company said it has yet to determine the effect of the accounting errors on past financial results. Biomet said it would delay releasing its second-quarter earnings as a result of the investigation.

Preliminary results showed that sales increased 5 percent to $520.3 million for the quarter ended Nov. 30. Reconstructive device sales rose 9 percent worldwide to $368.1 million.

Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial estimated sales of $526.8 million for the second quarter.

Apollo To Acquire Realogy For $6.65B (AP)

AP, December 19, 2006

Apollo Management LP to Acquire Realogy for About $6.65 Billion in Cash

NEW YORK (AP) -- The parent of Century 21 and Coldwell Banker real estate brokerages said it is being acquired by an affiliate of private equity firm Apollo Management LP for about $6.65 billion in cash.

The buyout of Realogy Corp. includes about $1.6 billion in debt and other liabilities of roughly $750 million, the brokerage said late Sunday. Realogy also owns Sotheby's International Realty.

Realogy stockholders will receive $30 per share in cash at closing, an 18 percent premium over the stock's closing price of $25.50 on the New York Stock Exchange on Friday.

Realogy can entertain other proposals from third parties until Feb. 14, the announcement said.

Its shares rose $4.90, or 19.22 percent, to close at $30.40 on the New York Stock Exchange. Realogy's stock will no longer list on the NYSE after the deal is completed.

Realogy was spun off from Cendant Corp. on July 31, along with Wyndham Hotels & Resorts, as the New York-based company was broken up into four pieces. In August, private equity group Blackstone completed its purchase of the Travelport travel unit, leaving just the Avis and Budget rental car business. Analysts have said Wyndham is also a potential acquisition target for private equity.

Realogy Chairman and Chief Executive Henry R. Silverman is expected to stay in his current positions until his contract expires on Dec. 31, 2007. He is expected to be succeeded by Realogy Vice Chairman and President Richard A. Smith.

The transaction is scheduled to close during the spring of 2007, subject to a shareholder vote, antitrust and insurance approvals, and other customary closing conditions.

Merck Cleared To Buy Stake In Serono (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, December 19, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium — EU regulators on Monday cleared Germany's Merck KGaA to buy Swiss biotechnology company Serono SA.

The European Commission cleared the deal automatically after identifying no antitrust problems and receiving no complaints from rivals within a deadline of 25 working days.

After losing a bid to acquire Schering AG earlier this year, Merck announced in September that it had bought a majority stake in Serono as part of a 16.6 billion Swiss franc (euro10.5 billion; US$13.31 billion) takeover, expanding its range of drugs and increasing its share of the global biotechnology market.

Merck bought the 64.5 percent stake held by the Bertarelli family and will make a public tender offer for the rest of the shares after its deal with the family has closed in January, Chief Financial Officer Michael Becker told reporters in October.

DOJ_NMG_0107591

He also said that, as of Sept. 30, Merck had acquired Serono shares on the market, paying euro455 million (US$571.3 million), and planned to buy more.

The deal will give the Darmstadt-based pharmaceutical maker, whose products include the cardiovascular treatment Concor and cancer drug Erbitux, access to new markets thanks to Serono's partnership with Pfizer Inc. to market the multiple sclerosis drug Rebif.

Analysts said the deal is part of Merck's strategy to stay competitive. Many mid-sized drug companies have looked at combining their operations and research with others in an attempt to keep pace.

Merck's Pharma Ethicals division will be combined with Serono to create Merck-Serono Biopharmaceuticals. The headquarters of that business will be in Geneva, while its U.S. base of operations will be in Boston.

The new group is forecast to have pro forma sales of euro7.7 billion (US$10.1 billion), of which euro3.6 billion (US$4.7 billion) will be biopharmaceutical sales.

Merck, founded as a pharmacy in 1668, is the oldest pharmaceutical business in the world. It has been entirely separate from New Jersey-based Merck & Co. since the end of World War I and employs some 29,000 people.

Plaintiffs' Law Firm Removed From Antitrust Case (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

Milberg Weiss & Bershad, the law firm accused of paying plaintiffs to bring class-action lawsuits, was removed yesterday as one of the lead firms in an antitrust case against carmakers over Canadian imports.

Federal District Judge D. Brock Hornby in Maine granted a request by the carmakers to remove Milberg Weiss as the vice chairman of the plaintiffs' executive committee. The law firm and its lawyers can continue to represent individual plaintiffs if they can show these plaintiffs are not being paid, the judge said in the ruling filed in federal district court in Portland, Me.

"Although I was urged to deny the motion to disqualify because the firm is not in immediate jeopardy, I conclude that a fiduciary would not wait," Judge Hornby said in his ruling.

Milberg Weiss and two of its partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman, were indicted in May on charges they paid clients to sue companies for securities fraud. The firm and the two partners pleaded not guilty in July. Federal prosecutors in Los Angeles said at a hearing last month that they may bring additional charges. Mr. Schulman resigned from the law firm Dec. 8.

The firm has faced leadership challenges in other suits since its indictment.

In New Jersey, a pension fund has challenged Milberg's role in a suit seeking tens of billions of dollars from the drugmaker Merck. In June, Milberg lost its lead role in a suit against medical-device maker Medtronic, because it had not told the judge it was under investigation.

The consolidated lawsuits in Maine were brought by consumers who said that carmakers and dealers colluded to keep new vehicles that were bought in Canada out of the United States.

Toyota Motor Sales USA Inc. has agreed to settle the claims for $35 million, according to yesterday's ruling.

Marina Ein, a spokeswoman for Milberg Weiss, did not immediately return a call to her office after business hours.

US States Sue Bush Administration To Lower Soot Levels (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, December 19, 2006

(AP) - ALBANY, New York-More than a dozen states sued the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency on Monday to lower soot levels from smokestacks and exhaust pipes, a move state officials argue would save thousands of lives.

DOJ_NMG_0107592

The states argue that the Bush administration is ignoring science and its own experts in refusing to slightly reduce the allowed threshold for soot.

The lawsuit is the latest salvo against the Bush administration, which has repeatedly come under fire for what some states and environmentalists have said is its lack of commitment to environmental issues.

Most notably, California, striking out on its own, has signed a global warming technology sharing agreement with Britain and has enacted a new law that imposes the first statewide limit on greenhouse gases. It seeks to cut emissions by 25 percent and drop them to 1990 levels by 2020

In bringing the lawsuit, the states argued that the "fine particulate matter" in soot contributes to premature death, chronic respiratory disease and asthma attacks, said New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. The pollution also leads to more hospital admissions and other public health costs, he said.

Officials from California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Maine, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont and the District of Columbia joined New York in the action filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington.

"It is unfortunate that this coalition of states must resort to legal action to get the EPA to do its job - protect the environment and the public health," said Spitzer, the Democratic governor-elect.

The EPA said it considered new research cited by the state officials. But the agency decided research that prompted a previous reduction was more reliable and did not justify a further cut, according to EPA statements. The agency said it will consider the new studies in the next five-year review.

"Where the science was clear, we took clear action," said EPA spokeswoman Jennifer Wood. "EPA significantly strengthened the previous daily standard - by nearly 50 percent."

"EPA has not followed the clean air law," countered New Hampshire Attorney General Kelly Ayotte, a Republican. "My office will work in conjunction with ... other concerned states to ensure that EPA takes appropriate action."

The emissions, described as much smaller than a grain of sand, come from automobiles, power plants, factories and wood fires.

The states want to reduce the current limit of 15 micrograms of soot allowed per cubic foot of air. States say even a reduction of 1 microgram would save as many as 11,000 lives. They don't agree on a specific amount to cut the limit.

The federal Clean Air Act requires a review every five years to determine if air pollution standards should be adjusted. The states argue this compels the EPA to act. The states want the federal court to find the EPA failed to obey its "Congressional mandate to protect the environment and the public health," according to a statement from Spitzer's office.

Last week, a group called Earthjustice, which includes the American Lung Association, the American Medical Association and Environmental Defense, sued the EPA over the same issue.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Richard K. Ruminski (MJS)

By Gina Barton

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 19, 2006

Head of local FBI office says bureau more proactive after 9-11

Richard K. Ruminski, the latest special agent in charge of the Milwaukee office of the FBI, has been with the bureau for 20 years, working in Washington, D.C., Chicago, and Richmond, Va., among other places. He has worked foreign counter-intelligence, counter-terrorism and criminal investigations, including the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the D.C. sniper investigation. Ruminski, who arrived in Milwaukee in mid-August, recently took five questions from reporter Gina Barton.

Q. What do you think of Milwaukee?

A. I was born and raised in Chicago, so I like being back in the Midwest. I like the fact that at the FBI office here, I've got just an office full of dedicated employees that are happy to be here, which you don't find everywhere.

Q. What's the most interesting case you've worked on?

A. Probably the issues surrounding 9-11. There were plenty of smaller cases that were interesting, but that one - coupled with the anthrax investigation - was just so global and there were just so many leads coming out of every direction.

Q. How have things in the FBI changed since 9-11?

A. We've completely changed our focus from being mainly a criminal investigative agency that also worked counter-intelligence matters. We are now in a status where we're trying to be much more proactive. We went from a reactive agency to much more proactive because of our newest responsibility of detecting and preventing terrorism, which is a very difficult task.

Q. In the past, the FBI, particularly in Milwaukee, has had a hard time recruiting agents of color and Arabic speakers. How's that going?

A. We will always be trying to get a diverse work force, but what you're drawing your work force from is the particular area you're in. You try to recruit at colleges and different institutions. We do the best we can to get a diverse work force. It's hard to get Arabic speakers. There's a very big push right now to get Arabic speakers, and we are doing just about all we possibly can to recruit them, but we haven't had a tremendous amount of luck here in the Milwaukee area.

Q. Sen. Herb Kohl recently asked the national FBI director to send more crime-fighting resources to Milwaukee. Do you think the FBI needs to get more involved in solving Milwaukee's crime problem?

A. We have been extremely involved in the violent crime area. We work gangs, we work narcotics investigations, but we work them in task force settings. We had numerous arrests here of gang members several weeks back. . . . I have been deputizing local law officers, and the sheriffs of the counties have been deputizing agents to give them local authority. We address some of the more complex (criminal) enterprise organizations . . . in a task force setting.

FBI Tries To Retool For Post-9/11 World (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), December 19, 2006

The prototypical FBI agent in the J. Edgar Hoover days was a lawyer or accountant. Today's ideal candidate is more likely to be a computer whiz who is fluent in a second language.

Finding new agents with that kind of background can be challenging, especially since they must also pass a background check, lie detector test and physical fitness trial, as well as survive a written test, an oral interview and 18 weeks of training at Quantico, Va.

Former Special Agent Craig Dahle was in charge of recruiting for the Mobile field office until his retirement last month. In that role, he was one of the men and women responsible for trying to achieve the agency's national recruiting goal of 1,000 new agents for the fiscal year that ended in September.

The bureau fell short of that target, hiring 791 agents.

"A thousand is extremely ambitious because the process of getting hired as an FBI special agent is unlike any other job, I'd dare say," Dahle said.

In addition to all of the rigorous hurdles applicants must clear, successful candidates face one more sacrifice once they get the job: They must move to another city. Long-standing FBI rules require new agents to be assigned to a field office outside of their home area.

Dahle said the rule is meant to ensure agents avoid any entanglements that might present conflicts of interests.

The relocation was the hardest part for Teresa Higgins, a new FBI agent who arrived in Mobile in October.

"It was kind of hard for me to adapt and move somewhere where I have no family," said Higgins, a native of Johnson City, Tenn.

Higgins, 29, is among the 15 percent or so of FBI agents who came to the agency with traditional law enforcement backgrounds. She said she became attracted to the profession as a teenager, when she participated in a local Explorer program at the Police Department.

After spending almost a decade chasing street thugs as a police officer in Johnson City, Higgins said, she wanted a new challenge. "After eight years of swing shifts, I was ready for a change," she said.

Higgins said she started the application process in 2003, stopped after her husband resisted moving and then re-applied when she managed to change his mind.

Assigned to the Mobile field office's counter-terrorism unit, Higgins had no trouble identifying why she gravitated toward the FBI. "It's the premier law enforcement agency," she said.

Remaking the FBI

The FBI has aggressively stepped up its hiring since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, taking on an average of 873 agents a year since 9/11 compared with an annual average of 632 in the five previous years.

The hiring binge has been aimed both at replacing retiring agents and increasing the overall work force as the bureau has tried to shift its focus from law enforcement to counter-terrorism and intelligence. About a third of the FBI's 12,603 agents have been hired since the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The FBI also has hired 4,886 support staff since 9/11, Dahle said. These include analysts and computer experts, he said. The Mobile field office, which includes branch offices throughout the southern portion of the state, has 58 agents and 60 support staff members.

"There's been a lot of hiring in that area that would not have happened had 9/11 not happened," he said.

Keeping pace has been a challenge, though. The impending retirement of baby boomers that is looming over the entire country already has hit the government sector, according to experts.

Work force consultant Robert Morrison said the average age of federal government workers is 47 or 48, compared with 40 for the American work force as a whole. The FBI is no exception, said Morrison, executive director of the Concours Group.

"Like many government agencies, the average age is above average. Their people are older," he said.

Morrison, co-author of "Workforce Crisis: How to beat the Coming Shortage of Skills and Talent," said the FBI has an added burden because of its mandatory retirement age of 57.

"Somebody like the FBI is really shooting themselves in the foot, because they're causing it to happen faster than it would," he said.

Special Agent Deanne Lindsey, who graduated from Quantico in August and arrived in Mobile last month after a two-month stint at the FBI headquarters in Washington, has one of those "critical skills" the agency is aggressively seeking. A physical therapist by training, she has a science background, which Dahle said the FBI covets.

The 36-year-old Georgia native said her step-father was chief of security at the state Capitol in Atlanta, and her uncle works for the Bibb County Sheriff's Office in Georgia. But she said she did not consider a law enforcement career for herself until her experience in physical therapy opened her eyes to Medicare fraud.

"I witnessed so much of that being a physical therapist. .... The people who really end up being overcharged are the patients," said Lindsey, who investigates violent crimes in Mobile.

'Sowing of seeds'

Despite the recent focus on "critical skills" like computers and foreign language, the FBI still has plenty of stereotypical G-men. About 1,500 agents have law degrees and another 1,500 have accounting backgrounds, Dahle said.

"We have a wide variance of backgrounds, and that's really the strength of the bureau," he said.

At Quantico, agents rank all 56 field offices in order of where they most want to be assigned. Higgins said she selected Charlotte, which was closest to her home, and then ranked the rest in reverse order of cost of living. Mobile was her 14th choice.

Recent hires also can expect to be transferred within a few years, Dahle said.

Finding new recruits is more art than science, Dahle said. He said he spent much of his time speaking on college campuses. With a requirement that agents have at least three years of full-time work experience, few students are even eligible to apply immediately. But Dahle called it a "sowing of seeds" in hopes that those students five or 10 years later decide to give the FBI a try.

"Word of mouth remains the best recruiting tool," he said.

For Higgins, it was the persistent encouragement of a retired FBI agent who taught her when she was a student at a community college.

"He pushed and pushed and pushed it," she said.

Dahle said external events often influence applications. After the "The Silence of the Lambs" came out in 1991, he said, a great many people applied to the FBI with dreams of becoming a profiler like Jodie Foster's character.

"It's hard to say exactly what triggers it," he said. "Perceptions do matter. Popular culture does matter."

Two Suspects Make Court Appearance In ATF Shooting (MACT)

The Macon Telegraph, December 19, 2006

DECATUR - Two suspects in the shooting and wounding of two federal agents have made their first court appearance.

Chardriguez Durden, 23, of Stone Mountain is charged with six counts of aggravated assault on a police officer and violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act.

Paul Thompson Jr., 19, of Covington is charged with violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act.

The two appeared before a judge Sunday night.

The two were jailed following the shooting of two agents with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives on Friday as the agents attempted to serve a warrant at an apartment complex in Lithonia.

The agents were treated at DeKalb Medical Center and released.

Report Calls Marijuana California's Biggest Cash Crop (KESQ)

KESQ-TV, December 18, 2006

A new report out says, marijuana is California's number one cash crop, worth some 14-billion dollars a year. That's despite an all-out crack-down campaign by the feds against the drug. Medicinal marijuana advocates say it's California's number one cash crop simply because it's illegal.

It's now been called California's biggest cash crop, worth an estimated 13.8 billion dollars. And it's illegal.

At least, that's what the federal government says.

That's the reason for statewide DEA raids on pot fields and, medicinal marijuana dispensaries, like CannaHelp and Palm Springs Caregivers here in the Coachella Valley.

Despite this, the report claims California's marijuana production rocketed 10-fold in the last 25 years.

Nationwide, pot is worth about 35 billion dollars.

Anti-prohibition advocates say classifying marijuana as illegal is the problem.

"Agriculturally, it's worth the same as alfalfa, which is six cents a pound right now, which would make the total crop, if it wasn't illegal, about 1.3million as opposed to 35 billion."

The report was done by Medicinal Marijuana Advocates.

All-time High For Homegrown As Pot Becomes Top Cash Crop In US (GUA)

Guardian Unlimited, December 19, 2006

Marijuana is now the biggest cash crop grown in the US, exceeding traditional harvests such as wheat, corn and soy beans, says a new report.

The study shows that 10,000 tonnes of marijuana worth $35.8bn (£18.4bn) is grown each year; the street value would be even higher. This dwarfs the $23bn-worth of corn grown, $17.6bn-worth of soybeans and $12.2bn-worth of hay. Marijuana is the biggest cash crop in 12 states, with the value of pot grown outstripping peanuts in Georgia and tobacco in North and South Carolina. In California, the biggest producer, it is worth $13.8bn.

Article continues

The report, Marijuana Production in the US, by DrugScience.org, which wants marijuana to be reclassified, says the drug is listed as a Schedule 1 drug, deemed to have no medicinal value and a likelihood of abuse. Other such drugs include heroin.

The author, Jon Gettman, says the figures show the war on drugs is not working: "Illicit marijuana cultivation provides considerable unreported revenue for growers without corresponding tax obligations to compensate the public for the social and fiscal costs related to [its] use."

His suggestion that the crop be legalised and taxed was rejected by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, which pointed to countries with large drug cash crops, notably Colombia and Afghanistan.

The report says output in the US has grown tenfold in the last 25 years.

The boom in domestic production has in part been fuelled by tougher border controls after 9/11. As smuggling from Mexico has become more difficult the drug cartels have moved their operations into the US, often creating plantations in remote national park land.

Backer Says Pot Is Largest U.S. Cash Crop (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, December 18, 2006

A California advocate for decriminalizing marijuana claims U.S. statistics prove the plant has become the country's largest cash crop.

Marijuana public policy analyst Jon Gettman told The Los Angeles Time his study used figures in a 2005 U.S. State Department report estimating U.S. cannabis cultivation at more than 22 million pounds.

He said he gave it a conservative value of about $1,600 a pound compared to the $2,000- to $4,000-a-pound street value often cited by law enforcement agencies after arrests.

The report claims the $35.8 billion marijuana harvest exceeds corn ($23 billion), soybeans ($17.6 billion) and hay ($12.2 billion), the Times reported.

Gettman advocates removing marijuana from the federal list of hard-core Schedule 1 drugs and treating it like tobacco and alcohol by legalizing and reaping a tax windfall, while also controlling production and distribution to better restrict use by minors.

Tom Riley, a spokesman for the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, disagreed, and said coca has plagued Colombia and opium poppies are a disaster for Afghanistan.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigrant Labor Or Machines? (WSJ)

By June Kronholz

The Wall Street Journal, December 19, 2006

SALINAS, Calif. -- Why don't U.S. employers just automate the low-skilled jobs that now attract illegal immigrants?

Steve Scaroni's lettuce harvester provides part of the answer. At the height of the lettuce season here, the romaine harvester that Mr. Scaroni designed and built at an out-of-pocket cost of $1 million sat in the shop, idled by a design flaw that allowed too many lettuce heads to roll back into the field.

Mr. Scaroni's company, Valley Harvesting & Packing Inc., harvests a million pounds of lettuce daily. Even when it's working, the harvester -- a bandsaw, sweeper and conveyor belt on tank-like tracks -- cuts Mr. Scaroni's labor needs by only a quarter. And with a delicate crop like lettuce, the machine causes too much bruising for anything except bagged salad mixes.

With the country deeply divided over immigration, some economists and policy makers are suggesting that technological innovations could offer a way out of the economy's reliance on illegal workers. But as Mr. Scaroni's troubled lettuce harvester shows, it's unlikely that mechanization will reduce the demand for illegal immigrants anytime soon. For most of the jobs they do, there's no easy high-tech substitute.

Illegal immigrants make up an estimated 5% of the U.S. work force, but more than one-quarter of the people who pick crops, hang drywall, shingle roofs and process food. Those jobs are drawing 500,000 low-skilled workers to the U.S. each year.

Immigration restrictionists, among others, point to the success of mechanical tomato harvesting when the Bracero guest worker program for seasonal Mexican farm workers ended in 1964. Since then, harvests of tomatoes that go into processed foods have quadrupled, while labor use has dropped by 72%, says the Western Growers Association, a California trade group.

Some other industries that rely on low-skilled labor also have mechanized. The poultry industry now uses machines to catch, kill, pluck and eviscerate chickens. The housing industry is moving more work onto factory assembly lines.

But labor economists say that's not much headway. "What struck me was how few examples there were of employers thinking ahead," says University of California at Davis economist Philip Martin, who spent a month last year looking for innovations that lessen U.S. reliance on illegal, low-skilled labor, and found almost none.

Much of the problem, he says, is that guest worker proposals circulating in Washington are "sending the signal that the supply of unskilled labor will continue" to be high. That has largely dissuaded government and industry from investing in research and development, he adds.

The Agriculture Department -- which helped pay for the tomato-harvest research at UC Davis -- ended all funding for mechanization in 1979 after unions representing agriculture workers sued the university for endangering their jobs.

Salinas's lettuce farmers began mechanizing a decade ago, using machinery with a broad blade to mow whole fields of young spinach. But the head lettuces pose a bigger challenge than greens, which are packaged whole and sold as "spring mix." Mr. Scaroni's romaine workers cut and core each head as they move through a field, slice off bruised leaves, rinse the core to prevent discoloration and toss the lettuce onto a conveyor belt, which deposits it into huge plastic-lined boxes.

Mr. Scaroni, 49 years old, needs 1,500 workers to meet his harvesting contracts in the summer season and 700 in the winter, when he moves his operation to the U.S.-Mexico border to work the lettuce crop there. Last year, he says, he began to worry that political pressures to cut illegal immigration would leave him without a work force. Federal law requires that he ask his workers for identification and U.S. work authorization, although he's not obliged to assess their authenticity, and the use of forged documents is widespread in the agriculture industry. Mr. Scaroni says that to the best of his knowledge he doesn't employ any illegal workers.

Under current law, there's almost no way for an unskilled worker to legally immigrate on a work visa. Meanwhile, Mr. Scaroni says, his longtime legal-immigrant workers are leaving the fields for skilled jobs in his company, or for higher-paying construction work.

Working with two engineers at a Salinas fabricating shop, Mr. Scaroni spent two months designing his lettuce harvester on a computer last winter and another four months building a prototype. This past summer, he moved his finished harvester into the fields.

The machine slices off the romaine heads a few inches above the ground and sweeps them onto an inclined conveyor belt. A driver maneuvers it through the field, and a half dozen workers sit on a platform at the top of the belt, trimming the lettuce before it is tipped into boxes.

The machine cuts human contact with the lettuce and is washed with chlorine nightly, making it potentially safer than hand-picked methods that could spread disease, he says. But the angle of the conveyor belt was too steep, and adjusting that flaw cost $50,000 and took the harvester out of service for two weeks. In addition, mechanization tends to bruise the lettuce.

Working without industry or university help, "we had no way to validate the design," sighed Mr. Scaroni.

Mr. Scaroni's machine reduces labor only 25% because much of the trimming and inspection that otherwise would be done in the fields has now been moved inside a processing plant. "Cutting the lettuce is easy," says Mr. Scaroni, but "someone's still got to put their eyes on it."

That problem stymies mechanization of other crops. With the development of new plant varieties, a lettuce field now matures uniformly, which means that laborers can harvest it in one pass.

But other crops mature progressively -- laborers now go through a cantaloupe field up to 10 times to cut produce as it ripens. Automating that harvest would require robots that can distinguish colors and leave green fruit behind. California citrus growers have a small robotics research project, says Jim Thompson, a UC-Davis agricultural engineer. But a prototype robot will cost $6 million, and without research grants, "they're not getting there very fast," he adds.

Even where machine harvesters have been developed, the damage and bruising they cause excludes their use on fresh foods like apples, table grapes and salad tomatoes.

With an immigration bill far from passage, the Western Growers and some other farm groups have turned their attention to an upcoming farm bill. They want some of the money that now goes into grain subsidies to be used for fruit and vegetable research, including mechanization. But that bill is still at least a year away.

So Mr. Scaroni has begun shifting some of his operation to central Mexico -- and with it, some of the business he once gave to Salinas merchants. Consumers want lettuce, "and somebody's got to cut it," he says.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senator Removes His Block On Federal Court Nominee (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 18 — Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, who blocked the confirmation of a woman to the federal bench because she attended a same-sex commitment ceremony for the daughter of her long-time neighbors, says he will now allow a vote on the nomination.

Mr. Brownback, a possible contender for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, said in a recent interview that when the Senate returned in January, he would allow a vote on Janet Neff, a 61-year-old Michigan state judge, who was nominated to a Federal District Court seat.

Mr. Brownback, who has been criticized for blocking the nomination, said he would also no longer press a proposed solution he offered on Dec. 8 that garnered even more criticism: that he would remove his block if Judge Neff agreed to recuse herself from all cases involving same-sex unions.

In an interview last week, Mr. Brownback said that he still believed Judge Neff's behavior raised serious questions about her impartiality and that he was likely to vote against her. But he said he did not realize his proposal — asking a nominee to agree in advance to remove herself from deciding a whole category of cases — was so unusual as to be possibly unprecedented. Legal scholars said it raised constitutional questions of separation of powers for a senator to demand that a judge commit to behavior on the bench in exchange for a vote.

Mr. Brownback said that he believed Judge Neff's attendance at the 2002 ceremony merited further investigation, but that he had not meant to set any precedent with his proposal. "It was the last day of the session and I was just trying to provide some accommodation to see if we could make this thing go forward," he said.

He said that "this is a big hot-button issue" and that Judge Neff had not made it clear that her presence at the ceremony did not mean she could not rule without bias in deciding cases involving same-sex unions. "I'd like to know more factually about what took place," he said.

On Oct. 12, Judge Neff answered a long list of written questions from Mr. Brownback. In her letter, she said she would decide any cases that came before her according to the law and the Constitution and would not be guided by her personal views. That is the same pledge that several conservative Republican judicial nominees made when asked whether their blunt personal statements opposing abortion rights and same-sex marriages would affect their performance on the bench.

Mr. Brownback, a member of the Judiciary Committee who supported those other nominees, has tried to put himself forward as the Republican presidential contender who best represents the interests of the nation's conservative religious community.

In her letter, Judge Neff said she had attended the ceremony in Massachusetts as a guest, not as a presiding jurist. As the ceremony occurred before Massachusetts's highest court approved same-sex unions, it did not have any legal validity.

One of the women in the ceremony, Judge Neff wrote, was the daughter of a family who had lived next door for 26 years. She said the families were so close that the woman was, in effect, a part of her family and was like a big sister to her own daughters. She said that she had delivered a homily at the ceremony and that "it was no different than being asked by my own daughters to be part of an important event in their lives."

Charles Fried, a Harvard Law School professor and leading conservative scholar, said Mr. Brownback's actions were improper. "First of all, people go to parties for all sorts of reasons," Professor Fried said, and how one would rule on a case should not be inferred from that private activity.

Further, he said, "It would be inappropriate for the judge to recuse herself from any such case because it is a judge's duty to sit on cases" unless there is a clear conflict of interest. There would be a genuine conflict of interest, he said, if the judge had a financial interest in a case's result or had been associated with one of the parties in the case.

"For her to agree to any such restriction in this case would be wrong," said Professor Fried, who has been both a judge and the solicitor general of the United States.

Judge Neff's nomination was included in a package of more than a dozen nominees whose confirmation had been agreed upon by both Democrats and Republicans. Mr. Brownback's objections held up the whole roster of nominees.

Mr. Brownback said that when Judge Neff was renominated in January, he would insist only that the nomination not be approved in a voice vote, but one in which each senator is obliged to record a personal vote.

Outsourcing Ethics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 19, 2006

Congressional mores could certainly use an upgrade, but it pays to beware of reformers promising to clean up politics by letting someone else do the dirty work. Exhibit A is the strange new enthusiasm for an "independent" office of public integrity for Congress.

One warning sign is that the proposal is being marketed by the same folks who gave us "independent counsels" such as Lawrence Walsh and Ken Starr for the executive branch, as well as the glories of "campaign finance reform." Instead of the current practice of having complaints against Members vetted by the House and Senate Ethics Committees, the idea is to create a new outside body to do the work for Congress. To her credit, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi hasn't let the browbeating by the usual goo-goo editorial pages intimidate her, and has suggested a task force to study the idea.

A better name for such an "independent" ethics body would be the office of public buck-passing, because it would allow Congress to spare itself the heavy political lifting of judging colleagues. Handing over that duty to outsiders would make Congress less politically accountable, not more, while creating a whole new set of political problems and disputes.

Supporters argue that only an outsider can hold Congress accountable because the Members won't discipline their colleagues. And true enough, sometimes Members don't. We can recall that long before Tom DeLay tried to stack the House Ethics Committee in 2005, Democrats slow-rolled the investigation into then-Speaker Jim Wright in the early 1990s. The Senate also tried to protect its own amid the Keating Five scandal of the 1980s, until Democrat Henry Gonzalez blew the whistle by holding public hearings.

But all three episodes created the opportunity for political opponents to turn ethics into a fruitful campaign issue. In the most recent case, as many as 10 Republicans who lost their seats last month did so in part because of ethics or corruption complaints. Losing a Congressional majority is the ultimate accountability moment, and it was just administered by a genuine group of "independent" outsiders" -- namely, the voters.

Meanwhile, the Justice Department is still around and doing its job of probing public corruption. Duke Cunningham is already in jail and Bob Ney seems headed there. Jack Abramoff is also sitting in a federal prison, doing penance for his bribery schemes. Several other Congressmen are under investigation, including Democrats William Jefferson (Louisiana) and Alan Mollohan (West Virginia). The voters just returned the latter duo to Washington, in part because the GOP was under greater public scrutiny this time around. But in the new Congress, Democrats will have to show if they can do better than the GOP at disciplining their own.

By outsourcing ethical oversight, the Democrats would let themselves off the hook. They'd also be creating the potential for politicizing ethics without accountability because it is a fantasy to believe that any outside investigator or panel will be without political baggage. That's what reformers also said about "independent counsels" in the executive branch. Anyone who takes the job will himself be subject to political and media pressure, and will inevitably be accused of partisan motives. He'd also be accountable to no one for his decisions, however wise or foolish they might be. At least the Members of the Ethics Committee are accountable first to their colleagues and ultimately to the voters.

Another reason Members find this kind of "independent" ethical dodge so attractive is because it deflects attention from their own bad habits. The source of much recent corruption in Congress has been the proliferation of spending "earmarks," or special favors for friends or political allies. Duke Cunningham went to jail for trading them for personal financial gain; others may follow. But reducing earmarks, or making them more transparent to the press and public, would reduce Member clout. It is so much easier to call for an "office of public integrity" and hope the press corps forgets all that earmarking stuff.

Like campaign finance reform, the proposal to outsource ethics oversight is about the appearance of virtue. It would let the Members pretend to come clean while lifting the burden of actually enforcing their own standards of conduct.

Incoming Senate Powerhouse: Time To Rev Up FOI Laws (EDPUB)

By Mark Fitzgerald

Editor & Publisher, December 18, 2006

CHICAGO The senator who will oversee the powerful Judiciary Committee as a Democratic majority takes the chamber next month says strengthening open government and citizen privacy laws will be its priority.

In a little-noticed speech last week at Georgetown University Law Center, U.S. Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) lamented the recent congressional acquiescence to the Bush administration's secrecy, and promised to restore the constitutional balance between the executive and legislative branches of government.

"Unfortunately, open, informed government has been under assault by the first administration in modern times that is explicitly hostile to the public's right to know," Leahy said. "By using ideology to trump science, gagging government scientists and experts, reclassifying public documents and undermining important tools like [the Freedom Of Information Act], this government has displayed a dangerous disdain for the free press and the public."

He said he will work to strengthen open-government laws, and to provide more congressional oversight of the White House.

"Congress has a solemn duty to protect the rights of the American people and to perform meaningful oversight to make sure the laws are followed," Leahy said. "Real oversight makes government more accountable and more effective in keeping us safe."

Leahy charged that the Bush administration "has rolled back open government laws and systematically eroded Americans' privacy rights," while "brazenly" refusing to answer "the legitimate oversight questions of the public's duly elected representatives."

Congressional oversight of the FBI and the Department of Justice "will again be one of my highest priorities when I take the gavel once more as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee," Leahy said. He said that under his previous chairmanship of the committee, oversight was a bipartisan affair, and that he expected to revive that tradition in the incoming Congress.

"I came to the Senate during the ebb tide of Watergate and Vietnam," Leahy said. "In my 32 years since then in the Senate, I have never seen a Congress so willfully derelict in its duties as during this Administration. This has been an unfortunate chapter in Congress's history, a time when our Constitution was under assault, when our legal and human rights were weakened, when our privacy and other freedoms were eroded. This election was an intervention. The American people rose up to take away Congress's rubber stamp, and to demand a new direction with more accountability."

The Bush administration, Leahy added, has done "real damage ... to our system of government" in the last few years.

Leahy's speech was first reported by the alternative Burlington (Vt.) Free Press, which put the complete text on its Web site.

Leahy called for new privacy laws to preserve rights at a time when, he said, the Bush administration is spawning new databases but refusing to explain what they are and why they have been created.

"Privacy rights belong to the people, not to the government," he said. Bush White House officials "need to stop treating the privacy of ordinary Americans as an expendable commodity."

Leahy suggested he would revive legislation first proposed two years ago by him and Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) that establishes stronger penalties for identity theft.

DOJ_NMG_0107601

Another priority will be oversight of the billions in development aid sent to Iraq. "Rarely if ever has so much money been funneled so fast to so many unsupervised contractors, with so few safeguards," Leahy said, noting that many Iraqis go without basic services while watching "billions of dollars being siphoned off by unsupervised contractors."

He said he intends to revive the blocked "War Profiteering Prevention Act" to make easier prosecution for abuse and waste of aid.

Leahy also said he plans to establish a new "Human Rights and the Law Subcommittee" that would focus attention on protecting human rights worldwide, and on curbing American violations.

The Smoky Bomb Threat (NYT)

By Peter D. Zimmerman

New York Times, December 19, 2006

London

THE exotic murder-by-polonium of the former K.G.B. spy Alexander Litvinenko has embroiled Russia, Britain and Germany in a diplomatic scuffle and a hunt for more traces of the lethal substance. But it also throws into question most of the previous analyses of "dirty bombs," terrorist attacks using radioactive isotopes wrapped in explosives (or using other dispersion techniques) to spread radioactive material in crowded areas.

Essentially all analysts, myself included, played down the possibility of using alpha radiation — fast-moving helium nuclei ejected during the radioactive decay of certain isotopes, such as of polonium 210, the substance that killed Mr. Litvinenko — as a source of dirty bombs. We concentrated instead on isotopes that emit penetrating gamma rays, which are basically super-powered packets of light, hard to shield and effective at a yard or more.

The alpha radiation from polonium can be easily shielded — by a layer of aluminum foil, a sheet or two of paper, or the dead outer layer of skin. And so, the reasoning went, alpha radiation could not hurt you as long as the source stayed outside your body. Exactly. Mr. Litvinenko was apparently killed by polonium that he ate or drank or inhaled. That source was so physically small that it was hard to see, perhaps the size of a couple of grains of salt and weighing just a few millionths of a gram.

Dirty bombs based on gamma emitters, analysts have learned, can't kill very many people. Mr. Litvinenko's death tells us that "smoky bombs" based on alpha emitters very well could.

Polonium 210 is surprisingly common. It is used by industry in devices that eliminate static electricity, in low-powered brushes used to ionize the air next to photographic film so dust can be swept off easily, and in quite large machines placed end-to-end across a web of fabric moving over rollers in a textile mill. It is even used to control dust in clean rooms where computer chips and hard drives are made.

It may be difficult to get people to eat polonium; it isn't hard to force them to breathe it. The problem for a radiological terrorist is to get his "hot" material inside people's bodies where it will do the most harm. If the terrorist can solve that problem, then alpha radiation is the most devastating choice he can make. Precisely because alphas emit their nuclei so quickly, they deposit all of their energy in a relatively small number of cells, killing them or causing them to mutate, increasing the long-term risk of cancer.

The terrorist's solution lies in getting very finely divided polonium into the air where people can breathe it. Without giving away any information damaging to national security, I see several fairly simple ways to accomplish this: burn the material, blow it up, dissolve it in a lot of water or pulverize it to a size so small that the particles can float in the air and lodge in the lungs.

It would be unwise for me to dwell on the details of just how one goes about getting a hot enough fire or breaking polonium into extremely fine "dust." In the end, however, the radioactive material will appear like the dust from an explosion, or the smoke from a fire. My point is to demonstrate the urgent need for new thinking in the regulatory arena, not to give away important information.

Air containing such radioactive debris would appear smoky or dusty, and be dangerous to breathe. A few breaths might easily be enough to sicken a victim, and in some cases to kill. A smoky bomb exploded in a packed arena or on a crowded street could kill dozens or hundreds. It would set off a radiological emergency of a kind not seen before in the United States, and the number of people requiring life support or palliative care until death would overwhelm the number of beds now available for treating victims of radiation. First responders dashing unprotected into the cloud from a smoky bomb might be among the worst wounded. Fire and police departments around the country will need alpha radiation detectors, since the counters they carry now cannot see alphas.

Some of the steps involved with making a good smoky bomb from polonium would be dangerous for the terrorists involved, and might cost them their lives. That, unfortunately, no longer seems like a very high barrier.

What can we do to stop them? We must make it far less easy for them to acquiring polonium in deadly amounts. Polonium sources with about 10 percent of a lethal dose are readily available — even in a product sold on Amazon.com. Only modest restraints inhibit purchase of significantly larger amounts of polonium: as of next year, anyone purchasing more than 16 curies of polonium 210 — enough to make up 5,000 lethal doses — must register it with a tracking system run by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. But this is vastly too high — almost no purchases on that scale are made by any industry.

The commission (and the International Atomic Energy Agency as well) is said to be considering tighter regulations to make a repeat of the Litvinenko affair less probable. There is talk that it might tighten the polonium reporting requirement by a factor of 10, to 1.6 curies. That's better, but still not strict enough.

The biggest problem is that the regulatory commission's regulations do not restrict the quantity of polonium used in industry. This may make it quite easy for terrorists to purchase large amounts of one of the earth's deadliest substances. A near-term goal should to require specific licensing of any person or company seeking to purchase alpha sources stronger than one millicurie, about a third of a lethal dose. A longer-term goal ought to be eliminating nearly all use of polonium in industry through other technologies.

That is a technical challenge and would cost some money, but it would certainly be less expensive than coping with the devastation of a smoky bomb.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Prosecutors Drop A.C.L.U. Subpoena In Document Fight (NYT)

By Adam Liptak
The New York Times, December 19, 2006

Federal prosecutors in New York yesterday withdrew a subpoena to the American Civil Liberties Union that had sought to retrieve all copies of a classified document.

In an opaque and defensive four-page letter to the judge in the case, the prosecutors said they were acting "in light of changed circumstances" and their determination that "the grand jury can obtain the evidence necessary to its investigation from other sources."

Another factor may have played a role. A transcript of a closed hearing in the case that was unsealed yesterday suggested the government was going to lose.

Anthony D. Romero, the A.C.L.U.'s executive director, sounded jubilant in describing the development. "The government blinked in this standoff," Mr. Romero said. The subpoena was unusual in that it sought not only to gather evidence but also to confiscate all tangible traces of the information in the document, apparently with the goal of preventing its distribution.

The document itself, declassified Friday and released by the A.C.L.U. yesterday, was not obviously confidential. An "information paper" dated Dec. 20, 2005, it was marked "secret" at the top and bottom of each of its four pages. The A.C.L.U. said it received the document in an unsolicited e-mail message in October.

The document collected a number of policies concerning photographs of enemy prisoners of war. Journalists, the document said, "are generally permitted, and to some extent even encouraged, to photograph" prisoners "from point-of-capture throughout the entire detainment process," though they are discouraged from showing recognizable faces.

The document was dated almost two years after photographs of abuse at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq were first made public and during the debate over the Detainee Treatment Act, which included an amendment introduced by Senator John McCain prohibiting the cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment of detainees. President Bush signed the bill 10 days later.

A lawyer for the A.C.L.U. said that the document was potentially embarrassing, but that its release hardly endangered the national defense.

"If you read between the lines," said the lawyer, Charles S. Sims, a First Amendment specialist at Proskauer Rose, "what it really says is that we want to exploit group photos of detainees." The implicit instruction in the document, he said, was this: "If pictures of detainees can help sell the war, go for it."

The effort to retrieve all copies of the document was a novel and, according to many legal experts, improper use of a grand jury subpoena. The subpoena cited a provision of the espionage laws that requires people in possession of some sorts of national security information to return it to the government if asked. But the A.C.L.U. said that the document at issue did not qualify and that, in any event, a subpoena was the wrong way to enforce the law.

In a transcript of a closed hearing in the case on Dec. 11 that was unsealed yesterday, Judge Jed S. Rakoff of Federal District Court in Manhattan seemed to indicate grave reservations about the tactic.

"What's the authority for saying that a subpoenaed party can't keep a copy of any document that they produced to the grand jury?" Judge Rakoff asked Jennifer G. Rodgers, an assistant United States attorney. Ms. Rodgers did not provide a direct answer, and yesterday's letter withdrawing the subpoena did not address the question.

Later in the hearing, Judge Rakoff compared the situation to the Nixon administration's effort to stop The New York Times and The Washington Post from publishing a secret history of the Vietnam War.

"There seems to be a huge difference," Judge Rakoff said, "between investigating a wrongful leak of a classified document and demanding back all copies of it, and I'm old enough to remember a case called the Pentagon Papers."

In yesterday's letter, Ms. Rodgers suggested that the A.C.L.U. had set up the government, creating a fight that could have been resolved informally.

"The government has attempted to pursue its investigation and its request for the document at issue in as amicable, cooperative and unobtrusive a manner as possible," she wrote. The A.C.L.U. filed a motion to quash the subpoena, she wrote, even though "the matter might be something the parties could negotiate without litigation, which always remained the government's strong preference."

In an interview, Mr. Sims said of Ms. Rodgers's letter, "Virtually every factoid in that presentation is entirely false."

Judge Rakoff, too, in last week's argument, appeared unconvinced by the government's contention that it thought the matter could have been resolved short of litigation.

"It's not easy to believe," Judge Rakoff said, "that the A.C.L.U., despite its history, would be cooperative. Well, hope springs eternal."

Mr. Romero, the A.C.L.U.'s executive director, said the case would have a lasting impact. "It certainly helps the press and whistle-blowers to resist the strong-arm efforts of the government," he said.

For ACLU, A Victory In Standoff With U.S. (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

Federal prosecutors yesterday dropped their demand that the American Civil Liberties Union turn over all copies of a "secret" document the organization had obtained, after the government was roundly criticized for using a grand jury subpoena in an attempt to seize the material.

The government's unprecedented legal move demanded "any and all copies of the document" in an apparent attempt to keep the ACLU from using the information. It was part of a broader grand jury investigation into leaks of classified information that, in this case, included the Army directive about photographing enemy prisoners, federal prosecutors confirmed yesterday.

The ACLU hailed the government's retreat as a victory. "This was a legal standoff with enormous implications for free speech and the public's right to know, and today the government blinked," said ACLU Executive Director Anthony D. Romero. "The Bush administration's attempt to suppress information using the grand jury process was truly chilling and is unprecedented in law and in our history as an organization."

But the Justice Department said, in effect, that the ACLU had instigated the fight and had told the government that filing the subpoena would be the first step toward the ACLU turning over the document.

In a letter to U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff of New York, prosecutors said the government issued the demand based on "what it believed to be the ACLU's representation, through counsel, that the ACLU was requesting a subpoena in lieu of voluntary cooperation."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department had tried to handle the matter in a way that was as "amicable, cooperative and as unobtrusively as possible."

Charles S. Sims, who represented the ACLU in the case, called the government's contention "the most preposterous thing I've ever heard." He said it's "inconceivable" an ACLU lawyer would have ever requested the broad subpoena that the government issued.

The government's demand for "any and all copies of the documents" drew the ire of civil libertarians and newspaper editorial boards, which said federal prosecutors were going far beyond established precedents and were trying to suppress information rather than investigating who leaked the document.

The 3 1/2 -page document, which the ACLU had maintained would be only "mildly embarrassing" to the government, was an "information paper" prepared by a judge advocate for the 101st Airborne Division. It told soldiers not to photograph enemy prisoners of war and detainees.

DOJ_NMG_0107606

The document is dated Dec. 20, 2005, more than a year after the military was scandalized by photos of prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib in Iraq.

Romero said the documents "raise the question of whether the guidelines were in place prior to the Abu Ghraib scandal and if not, why it took more than a year after the scandal to issue a policy."

ACLU lawyer Sims said there was nothing in the document that ever should have been classified, and was indicative of the Bush administration's tendency toward secrecy.

A transcript of last week's closed hearing on the issue, unsealed yesterday, shows Rakoff skeptical of the government's use of a grand jury subpoena.

He said there is a "huge difference between investigating a wrongful leak of a classified document and demanding back all copies of it." He added that he was "old enough to remember a case called the Pentagon Papers," the Supreme Court decision that concerned prior restraint of publication of leaked government documents.

Govt. Cedes In ACLU Fight Over Document (HC/AP)

By Larry Neumeister Associated Press Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, December 19, 2006

NEW YORK — After demanding that the American Civil Liberties Union turn over a classified document it had been given and prove it had destroyed every copy of it, the government agreed Monday to make the document about photographs of detainees public.

The document _ marked "secret" in bold but small print on the top of its first page _ described when and how the military Public Affairs Office permits the media to photograph enemy prisoners of war and detainees in Iraq. It was dated more than a year after the release of pictures of American soldiers tormenting Iraqi detainees at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

"We were in a standoff, and the government blinked," said ACLU Executive Director Anthony D. Romero.

The civil rights group has said that it was handed a grand jury subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan on Nov. 20, nearly a month after the ACLU received the document unsolicited and soon after it refused to comply with a prosecutor's demands to turn it over.

The ACLU fought the request, claiming the government's move was an attempt to discourage scrutiny.

The document says that the news media and the Public Affairs Office are permitted to photograph prisoners and detainees as long as the photography cannot be interpreted as holding the subjects of the photographs "up to public curiosity." It also says U.S. soldiers were prohibited from photographing prisoners and detainees unless that was required as part of a photographer's official duties.

It was declassified Friday, said U.S. Attorney Jennifer G. Rodgers.

In a letter Monday to U.S. District Judge Jed. S. Rakoff, she asked for the subpoena to be withdrawn "in light of changed circumstances," including that the grand jury can get the information it needs elsewhere. She said the subpoena was issued only after the ACLU's attorneys asked for it to establish a "process" for handing over the papers.

U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff said that going forward all court filings in the matter will be "presumptively public" unless he orders otherwise.

Romero said the document was "at best mildly embarrassing" because it might indicate that the government had waited a long time after the Abu Ghraib scandal to strengthen its photography guidelines.

Justice Department Heads Off Legal Battle With ACLU (NYSUN)

By Josh Gerstein

New York Sun, December 19, 2006

The Justice Department has headed off a First Amendment battle with the American Civil Liberties Union by dropping a grand jury subpoena demanding that the group turn over all copies of a document the government said was classified.

The government also declassified the disputed document, which had been marked "secret" but turned out to be a seemingly innocuous directive relating to photography of battlefield detainees by the press and military personnel.

"It has nothing to do with national defense. It's media policy," an attorney representing the ACLU, Charles Sims, said in an interview. The four-page document, which the ACLU said it received unsolicited via e-mail in October, appears to have been drafted by military lawyers at the 101st Airborne Division in Fort Campbell, Ky.

Mr. Sims speculated that the memorandum was classified because it indicates that service members are generally banned from photographing detainees, but under some circumstances members of the press are encouraged to photograph those who have been captured. "The fact they are using detainees as a media opportunity to plug the war is embarrassing and shameful," he said.

After the government subpoenaed "any and all copies" of the document last month, the ACLU filed a motion to quash in federal court. The group argued that a grand jury subpoena was an improper vehicle to, in essence, erase records from the ACLU's files.

The government's decision to relent may have been influenced by comments the judge assigned to the case, Jed Rakoff, made at a hearing last week. "There seems to be a huge difference between investigating a wrongful leak of a classified document and demanding back all copies of it," the judge said, according to a transcript unsealed yesterday. "I'm old enough to remember a case called the Pentagon Papers."

A federal prosecutor, Jennifer Rodgers, said the subpoena was a valid way to investigate what was done or might be done with the document.

"If we were to receive from them in compliance with the subpoena, 1,000 photocopies of this classified document that they had in their possession, then it's possible that that would change the focus of the grand jury investigation to look at what they were planning to do with these documents," she told the judge. In earlier discussions, the prosecutor said the ACLU was not a target of the grand jury but could be violating the Espionage Act or a law that protects so-called communications intelligence.

In a letter to the court yesterday, Ms. Rodgers suggested that the ACLU was eager to turn the dispute into a court fight and filed the legal motion even though she was willing to extend the deadline on the subpoena while the two sides negotiated. The prosecutor also indicated that an attorney for the ACLU indicated that officials at the group disagreed on whether to challenge the subpoena.

Ms. Rodgers did not indicate how the detainee photography policy came to be stamped "secret." She said an investigation is ongoing into "improper dissemination of classified and sensitive documents from a government agency," which she did not identify.

Secrecy And Common Sense (WP)

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

THE GOVERNMENT has wisely backed down from its effort to misuse its subpoena power to force the American Civil Liberties Union to turn over a classified document. The subpoena has been withdrawn and the document released. It turns out to have been an entirely innocuous memo outlining rules about photographing prisoners of war and detainees in Iraq. And that leaves two questions: Why in the world was this document classified in the first place? And why in the world did the government take the unprecedented step of using the grand jury process to try to retrieve "any and all copies" of the memo?

It's commonly accepted that overclassification is rampant, but even so it's hard to make sense of this one. What in this document could justify its previous classification as secret -- meaning, supposedly, that its release could cause "serious damage" to the national security? This episode ought to trigger a reassessment of the reflexive impulse to classify.

Similarly, the notion that federal prosecutors took the extraordinary step of issuing a subpoena to the ACLU to have the document returned raises serious questions of judgment. Either they didn't take the time to examine the document and to question Defense Department personnel about its contents, in which case they were negligent, or they looked at the memo and decided, despite its inoffensive contents, to use their subpoena power to go after it, in which case they were bullying and insensitive to constitutional concerns.

An excessive zeal for secrecy works against the kind of public debate essential in a democracy, but it also works against government's legitimate interest in keeping secrets. Authorities are less likely to be taken seriously in cases where the national security really might be harmed if they are willing to abuse the grand jury process, as in this case, even to conceal a routine memorandum.

Mental Exam Ordered For Terror Suspect (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, December 19, 2006

A federal judge ordered a mental exam Monday to determine whether Jose Padilla — charged with being part of a support cell for Islamic extremists around the world — is competent for trial.

A psychiatrist and a psychologist hired by Padilla's attorneys concluded he is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder and other mental problems stemming largely from his 3 1/2 years in solitary confinement at a Navy brig in Charleston, S.C.

Prosecutors agreed a court-ordered evaluation was necessary.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen accused of being an al-Qaida operative, claims he was tortured in Defense Department custody, a charge repeatedly denied by prosecutors and Pentagon officials. Padilla's lawyers have asked the judge to dismiss the charges against him because of "outrageous government conduct" during his time in the brig.

Padilla and co-defendants Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi have pleaded not guilty to conspiracy and material support charges. The most serious charge carries up to 15 years in prison.

Padilla was added to the case late last year amid a legal battle over President Bush's authority to hold him without charge as an enemy combatant. Padilla was originally arrested in 2002 on suspicion of plotting a radioactive "dirty bomb" attack inside the U.S., but the Miami charges do not mention that.

Trial is set for Jan. 22.

Testing Of Anthrax Vaccine Still On Hold (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

VaxGen said yesterday that it did not meet a federal deadline to begin human testing of its anthrax vaccine.

The Food and Drug Administration has put the clinical trial on hold since November. The Department of Health and Human Services had given the company until yesterday to begin testing or risk losing its contract but didn't say what action it would take.

The FDA continues to have concerns about the vaccine's reliability, according to a company statement. The hold will remain until "sufficient vaccine stability" has been demonstrated, the statement said.

"I don't think we're in a position to make predictions on how long this will take," said Lance Ignon, VaxGen's vice president of corporate affairs. "We continue to believe that with the right kind of commitment, we can develop and deliver a modern anthrax vaccine."

HHS spokesman Bill Hall said no decisions have been made about the contract's fate.

After a recent meeting, the FDA indicated it was interested in having technical discussions with VaxGen about its proposed methods for measuring the vaccine's potency and stability, Ignon said. "We felt that the conversation with the FDA was very productive," he said.

The company's $1 billion vaccine effort, already years behind schedule, is by far the largest component of the Bush administration's Project BioShield, a $5.6 billion plan to counter bioterrorism threats. The project has been marked by delays and operational problems. Congress passed legislation this month to revamp and salvage the BioShield effort, reorganizing its management and providing struggling companies with periodic cash infusions for their research and testing.

But Ignon said the legislation will not address the breakdown in communication that has festered between VaxGen and HHS. "We have repeatedly tried to engage them in what we feel would be productive conversation" about the future of the program, he said. He declined to give specific examples of the proposals the company wants to address.

Hall said that while HHS is not privy to many of VaxGen's conversations with the FDA, there is a formal process in place. "Our contracting staff has regular communication with VaxGen as we do with any company with which we hold a contract," he said.

The contract calls for VaxGen to produce enough of the vaccine for 25 million people, roughly the equivalent of the population in the New York and Washington areas combined.

White House Accused Of Censorship (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 19, 2006

A former CIA analyst says the agency was told to cut parts of his op-ed column.

WASHINGTON — A former National Security Council official said Monday that the White House tried to silence his criticism of its Middle East policies by ordering the CIA to censor an op-ed column he wrote.

Flynt Leverett, a former senior director for Middle East affairs at the National Security Council, or NSC, and a former CIA analyst, said the White House told a CIA censor board to excise parts of a 1,000-word commentary on U.S. policy toward Iran that he had offered to the New York Times.

Leverett, who has criticized the administration for failing to deal directly with Tehran, said the board wanted to remove references to prior U.S. contacts with Iran.

Leverett said the events he wrote about were widely known.

He said the agency's action "was fabricated to silence an established critic of the administration's foreign policy incompetence at a moment when the White House is working hard to fend off political pressure to take a different approach."

DOJ_NMG_0107609

Leverett said that in discussing the case with a CIA official, he was told that "the White House has equities" in the issue, meaning it was concerned about potentially classified material.

Speaking to reporters Monday, Leverett speculated that senior NSC officials, such as deputy national security advisors Elliott Abrams or Meghan L. O'Sullivan, had authorized their subordinates to intervene.

But U.S. officials said the move was taken by lower-level staff members at the CIA and NSC. "There was nothing political here," a White House official said, addressing Leverett's claims.

Tom Crispell, a CIA spokesman, said the agency's review of Leverett's column remained an open case.

He said that in such cases, the writer and the agency can come to an agreement on language that will convey what the writer wants without compromising sensitive material.

Sometimes this can be accomplished by quoting the public comments of officials. "More often than not the issues are worked out," Crispell said.

Leverett said there were two key paragraphs that the CIA board wanted to cut. The first was about U.S. cooperation with Iran concerning Afghanistan about the time of the Sept. 11 attacks in 2001.

The second dealt with an offer by Iran to the United States in early 2003 to discuss the possibility of a "grand bargain" that would settle several disputes between the two countries.

He said both episodes had been publicly discussed by former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell and his former deputy, Richard L. Armitage.

"There is no basis for claiming that these issues are classified and not already in the public domain," he said.

Leverett, who worked at the NSC during President Bush's first term and is now with the New America Foundation, a liberal-leaning think tank, said he had written a lot about Iran and had spoken often about the Middle East since leaving government.

Like other former CIA employees, he is required to submit manuscripts for articles, books and speeches to the agency for review. Until last week, the CIA's review board "had never sought to remove or change a single word in any of my drafts."

He said his op-ed column was distilled from a much longer article that had not been challenged by the agency.

Leverett said the United States lost a promising opportunity to resolve its issues with Iran in 2003, when Tehran made its overture.

He said any deal that Washington made now would be on less favorable terms, because Iran had gained strength in the region and the United States was tied down in Iraq.

Critic Accuses Bush Of Silencing Dissent (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, December 19, 2006

A former senior Bush administration official who has been outspoken in his criticism of US foreign policy accused the White House on Monday of trying to silence him by censoring an article he co-authored that advocated broad engagement with Iran.

Flynt Leverett, a former CIA analyst and director in the national security council, said the White House had threatened him with criminal prosecution if he went ahead and published an opinion piece prepared for the New York Times.

Mr Leverett, an analyst at the New America Foundation, a Washington think-tank, accused the White House of using the pretext of protecting classified information to limit dissent from someone highly critical of its Iran policy.

His allegations come at a particularly sensitive time for the White House, which is under intense pressure to change its whole Middle East strategy following publication of the report of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

Mr Leverett told a news conference that the CIA had already cleared the piece in question, which he was required to submit as a former analyst. He said the White House then intervened and excised material that he had already -published in a recent paper for the Century Foundation, a New York think-tank, and had either been stated in public by US officials or reported by the media.

The offending segments, he said, dealt with Iran's assistance to the US in ousting the Taliban in 2001 and then helping set up a new Afghan government, and an offer Iran made to the US in 2003 – first reported by the Financial Times – to talk about a "grand bargain" that the Bush administration quickly rejected.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said he knew nothing about the case but denied the administration would "falsely silence critics on national security claims".

The White House later confirmed it had suggested deletions to the article because it contained classified information, and then returned the piece to the CIA publications review board.

Speaking at a news conference, Mr Leverett accused his former CIA colleagues of being "spineless" in the face of political pressure. He said the CIA review board told him there was nothing of a classified nature in the article but that they had to bow to the White House.

"This is the state of our intelligence community six years into the Bush administration," he said. He co-authored the piece with his wife, Hillary Mann, also a former official.

Analysts said Mr Leverett was not the only critic to have attracted the administration's disapproval and that the CIA had tightened up its pre-publication review procedures and threatened other former officials with punishment for stating what was already on public record.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Inquiry Falters On Civilians Accused Of Detainee Abuse (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 18 — A Justice Department team responsible for investigating accusations that civilian government employees had abused detainees has decided against prosecution in most of the nearly 20 cases referred in the last two years by the Pentagon and the Central Intelligence Agency, said lawyers who have been officially briefed on the effort.

The prosecution team, which was established in June 2004 at the United States attorney's office in Alexandria, Va., has not brought a single indictment and has been plagued by problems.

The team has been unable to collect forensic evidence or find witnesses needed to bring indictments out of war-ravaged areas of Iraq and Afghanistan. In some cases, the unit has been stymied by the absence of facts in the referrals, the lawyers said. A few investigations remain open, although the lawyers declined to be specific about how many cases fell in that category.

The team was set up in the aftermath of the uproar over abuses at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq; it was to investigate accusations that detainees had been mistreated by civilian personnel. Civilians have worked in large numbers in Afghanistan and Iraq, among them C.I.A. officers, Americans hired by companies under contract with the military as interrogators and translators, and local residents temporarily employed as support workers.

The military justice system, meanwhile, has won convictions against a number of soldiers in cases from Abu Ghraib and elsewhere in Iraq and Afghanistan. In some cases, the Justice Department has declined to prosecute in cases involving the same events in which military lawyers have brought charges against members of the armed services.

Lawyers who have been briefed on the work of the Justice Department unit, initially made up of six federal prosecutors, said problems with evidence and the fragmentary nature of some of the accusations had proved so daunting that prosecutors never even reached the point of grappling with difficult legal issues involving permissive interrogation guidelines. These guidelines, most of them based on Justice Department legal opinions, granted government officials the authority to use harsh tactics in questioning detainees.

In one case, Justice Department prosecutors investigated an accusation that a civilian translator working under a contract with the military had sexually assaulted a detainee at Abu Ghraib prison. But when investigators arrived in Iraq, the detainee and witnesses had been released in Baghdad and could not be found.

In another case, a referral cited abusive conduct by a government employee but did not include the names of witnesses or victims or where they lived. In other cases, investigators began their inquiries long after the alleged crimes occurred, when any forensic evidence a crime scene might have provided had been lost.

One of the investigations that remains open involves the November 2003 death of Manadel al-Jamadi, who died at Abu Ghraib after a brutal interrogation in one of the most widely publicized abuse cases in Iraq. Mr. Jamadi was in the custody of a C.I.A. officer and a contract interpreter at the time of his death, although he had first been captured by a team of Navy Seals.

Justice Department prosecutors who reviewed the case advised superiors that neither of the civilians could be charged. They concluded that Mr. Jamadi probably sustained severe injuries when he was in military custody before he was turned over to the intelligence agency and that therefore the civilians could not be prosecuted for his death. Frank Spinner, who represented some of the Navy Seals who have faced disciplinary proceedings, denied that military personnel were responsible for Mr. Jamadi's death. "He walked into Abu Ghraib, into the custody of the C.I.A.," Mr. Spinner said.

Justice Department officials have never publicly disclosed that the prosecution team had terminated most of its cases or that it encountered serious evidentiary problems — an assertion likely to be met with skepticism by lawmakers and human rights activists who have been critical of the department's unwillingness to discuss the abuse cases.

DOJ_NMG_0107611

In a letter sent Monday to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois and a member of the Judiciary Committee, urged the Justice Department to be more forthcoming.

"Providing more public information about the Justice Department's handling of detainee abuse cases would be an important step in restoring the confidence of the American people in their government and would send a powerful message to the rest of the world about the role of the rule of law in American society," Mr. Durbin's letter said.

Hina Shamsi, senior counsel at Human Rights First, a group based in New York, said: "Secrecy itself invites abuse. Investigations shrouded in secrecy invite immunity for abuse. Congress needs to take a hard look at what happened, and why, and how to keep the agency accountable."

Spokesmen for the Pentagon and the C.I.A. declined to comment on specifics of the referrals, but both said their agencies took seriously accusations of detainee abuse. The C.I.A. has been advised that most of the cases have been closed, an intelligence official said. The referrals had stirred resentment within the agency, where some officers believed the actions of agency personnel did not warrant criminal investigation.

James Rybicki, a spokesman for the United States attorney's office in Alexandria, declined to comment on the details of the cases or their status. "This office continues the independent investigation of the cases referred to us," Mr. Rybicki said. "Because our review is ongoing, however, we cannot make any further comment at this time."

In a letter earlier this year responding to questions posed by Mr. Durbin, the Justice Department said the prosecution unit had received 19 separate accusations of abuse in Iraq and Afghanistan. Eleven referrals of possible wrongdoing came from the Pentagon, and eight from an unspecified agency later identified as the Central Intelligence Agency. The Department reported that it had dropped two of the cases on grounds of insufficient evidence.

Although the team has brought no charges, one civilian case has been prosecuted by federal prosecutors in North Carolina, resulting in a felony assault conviction against David A. Passaro, a C.I.A. contract employee. The charges stemmed from an interrogation in June 2003 at an American base in Afghanistan that resulted in the death of an Afghan, Abdul Wali.

Even that case caused problems for prosecutors, one of the lawyers said. Investigators were unable to retrieve the body of Mr. Wali from where he was buried to determine precisely the cause of his death. As a result, Mr. Passaro was not charged with Mr. Wali's death, but with beating him with a flashlight.

While the details about most cases are not known, one of the closed cases is believed to have involved the C.I.A. contract personnel who were at times present during the interrogation of Maj. Gen. Abed Hamed Mowhoush, an Iraqi who died after a rough interrogation in November 2003. General Mowhoush died of "asphyxiation due to smothering and chest compression," according to an autopsy report, after he was severely clubbed, beaten with fists and shoved into a sleeping bag.

In the Jamadi and Mowhoush cases, military prosecutors brought charges against several members of the armed forces. But they had no jurisdiction over civilians working alongside their military counterparts. A court-martial of Lt. Andrew Ledford, the leader of the Navy Seal unit that captured Mr. Jamadi, ended with an acquittal. A court-martial in the Mowhoush case concluded with a conviction of Chief Warrant Officer Lewis Welshofer Jr., who was fined $6,000 and confined for 60 days to his barracks.

Mr. Spinner, a defense lawyer who has specialized in military cases and who represented Lieutenant Ledford and Chief Warrant Officer Welshofer, said the Jamadi case in particular had raised questions about the role of the C.I.A. "The evidence was clear," Mr. Spinner said. "Let's have equal justice. If you're going to try Ledford and try the Seals, then you have to go after the C.I.A. guys."

From the start, there were doubts among some Democrats in Congress that the Justice Department could mount a serious prosecutorial effort against intelligence officers and other civilians accused of violence against terror suspects. It was the Justice Department, through a series of legal opinions and memoranda, that played a crucial role in erecting the legal framework intended to give C.I.A. officers the widest possible latitude in interrogating terror suspects and virtually indemnify them from legal liability.

Senator Seeks Detainee Abuse Case Update (AP)

AP, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A key Democratic senator asked the Justice Department on Monday for an update on its progress prosecuting government employees who were accused in at least 17 cases of abusing detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In response, a Justice spokesman said at least some of the cases are still under investigation.

In a letter sent Monday to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, incoming Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin, D-Ill., noted that the department began looking into the allegations of abuse two and a half years ago.

"In that time, there have not been any indictments in any of these cases," wrote Durbin, who first pressed the Justice Department for a prosecutions update in November 2005, when now-Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty was seeking Senate confirmation.

"It is my understanding that since then, the Justice Department has not commented publicly on the status of any of these cases," wrote Durbin, who sits on the Senate panel that oversees the Justice Department.

In response to Durbin's first request, the Justice Department revealed in a Jan. 17 letter that it had opened 20 investigations into claims of detainee abuse that were referred to prosecutors by the Pentagon and the CIA. The investigations were being led by a task force in the U.S. Attorney's office in Virginia's eastern district - which McNulty headed before taking the Justice Department's No. 2 job in March.

Two of those cases were dropped because of insufficient evidence to support a prosecution, the Justice Department letter noted. Additionally, another case resulted in the indictment of a former CIA contractor in North Carolina.

Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said at least a few of the estimated 17 remaining cases are still open. "The Justice Department continues to investigate these cases," Roehrkasse said Monday. He declined further comment.

The New York Times reported on its Web site Monday that a Justice Department team has decided against prosecuting nearly all of the 20 cases that were initially under investigation. It was not immediately clear precisely how many cases remain open, and Roehrkasse refused to respond to the newspaper's report.

Privately, Justice officials have acknowledged difficulties in tracking down reliable witnesses or preserving enough evidence to bring strong cases against the accused employees.

WAR NEWS:

Gates: Iraq Failure Would Be 'Calamity' (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, December 19, 2006

Robert Gates assumed the helm at the Pentagon on Monday, warning in his first public remarks as defense secretary that failure in Iraq would be a "calamity" that would haunt the United States for years.

The former CIA chief pledged to give President Bush his honest advice on the costly and unpopular war, and said he would go to Iraq soon to see what U.S. commanders believe should be done to quell the growing violence.

"All of us want to find a way to bring America's sons and daughters home again," Gates, 63, said after taking the oath of office as defense secretary from Vice President Dick Cheney at a Pentagon ceremony. "But as the president has made clear, we simply cannot afford to fail in the Middle East. Failure in Iraq at this juncture would be a calamity that would haunt our nation, impair our credibility, and endanger Americans for decades to come."

He takes office as Bush conducts a wide-ranging review of his approach to the 3 1/2 year-old Iraq conflict. The fighting, teetering on the edge of a civil war between sects, has seen more than 2,940 Americans die at a cost to U.S. taxpayers exceeding $300 billion.

Officials say the options Bush is studying run from a short-term buildup of thousands of more troops to a pullback of U.S. combat units so they can focus on training Iraqis and hunting terrorists. Bush said last week that he would wait until January to announce his new strategy, to give Gates a chance to offer advice.

Gates said he wants to hear the views of U.S. commanders on how to improve the situation, "unvarnished and straight from the shoulder." The remarks seemed to contrast with critics' complaints that the man he replaced, Donald H. Rumsfeld, did not listen enough to the advice of the military's top officers.

President Bush called Gates "the right man" for the multiple challenges of Iraq and the global war on terrorism.

"We are a nation at war," Bush said. "And I rely on our secretary of defense to provide me with the best possible advice and to help direct our nation's armed force as they engage the enemies of freedom around the world. Bob Gates is the right man to take on these challenges. He'll be an outstanding leader for our men and women in uniform."

Gates formally assumed the job earlier Monday in a private swearing-in ceremony at the White House, replacing Donald H. Rumsfeld.

He took office more than month after President Bush announced he was switching Pentagon chiefs, saying he wanted "fresh perspective" on the widely unpopular and costly war and acknowledging the current approach was not working well enough. Rumsfeld was a chief architect of the war strategy and still defends the decision to invade in March 2003.

"You have asked for my candor and my honest counsel at this critical moment in our nation's history, and you will get both," Gates said.

He said that since his Senate confirmation earlier this month he has participated in meetings on Iraq at the White House, received briefings at the Pentagon and held in-depth discussions with the president on ways ahead in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0107613

Besides the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Gates faces other immediate challenges. One is the Army's proposal that it be allowed to grow by tens of thousands of soldiers, given the strains it is enduring from the two wars. Rumsfeld had resisted increasing the size of the Army or the Marine Corps; Gates' view is unknown.

It's not yet clear whether Gates intends to immediately shake up the Pentagon by firing generals or replacing senior civilian officials. He has asked Gordon England, the deputy defense secretary, to remain, but some have already announced their departures, including the top intelligence official, Stephen Cambone.

In his remarks Monday, Gates said he looked forward to working with Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as well as the service chiefs and civilian service secretaries.

Gates, who had been president of Texas A&M University since 2002, completed his tenure over the weekend by attending three commencement ceremonies on the College Station campus.

At his confirmation hearing, Gates won plaudits for his candor, especially for acknowledging the U.S. was not winning in Iraq. That contrasted with Bush's remark at an Oct. 25 news conference that, "Absolutely, we're winning."

Gates was a member of the Iraq Study Group that spent nine months assessing the situation in Iraq and produced recommendations that include phasing out most U.S. combat troops by 2008. Gates left the commission when Bush announced that he had been picked to replace Rumsfeld.

"In my view, all options are on the table, in terms of how we address this problem in Iraq," Gates said at his confirmation hearing.

Gates, a Kansas native, joined the CIA in 1966. He left in 1974 to join the staff of the National Security Council until 1979, when he returned to the spy agency. He rose to deputy director for intelligence in 1982.

His 1987 nomination to head the CIA was scuttled when he was accused of knowing more than he admitted about the Iran-Contra affair. The Reagan administration secretly had sold arms to Iran in hopes of freeing hostages in Lebanon, and used the money to help the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

Gates went to the White House as President Reagan's deputy national security adviser in 1989, then took over the CIA in 1991. He left Washington in 1993 and since August 2002 has been president of Texas A&M University.

Replacing Rumsfeld, Gates Issues Warning On Iraq (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 18 – Robert M. Gates became secretary of defense today, pledging to rely on advice from the uniformed military professionals and convey his own no-holds-barred opinions to the White House.

“You have asked for my candor and my honest counsel,” Mr. Gates told President Bush at a Pentagon ceremony. “You will get both.”

The new secretary said Iraq is at the top of his list of concerns, and that he will go there “quite soon” to confer with military leaders and hear their assessments “unvarnished and straight from the shoulder.”

“We simply cannot afford to fail in the Middle East,” Mr. Gates said. A failure in Iraq would haunt the United States “for decades to come,” he said.

Nor can the United States afford to neglect Afghanistan, where progress in the post-Taliban era is “at risk,” Mr. Gates said. That country “cannot be allowed to become a sanctuary for extremists again,” he said. Before the Taliban was overthrown in the American-led military campaign of 2001, Afghanistan was a host for Al Qaeda terrorists.

Mr. Gates was sworn in at the Pentagon by Vice President Dick Cheney, himself a former defense secretary, after being sworn in at the White House in a private ceremony that made him Donald H. Rumsfeld’s successor.

President Bush said he was counting on Mr. Gates to bring a “fresh perspective” to the Pentagon as the United States charts “a new way forward in Iraq” to build a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself and be an ally in the war against “extremists and radicals.”

A new perspective was what President Bush called for immediately after the mid-term elections, when he abruptly announced Mr. Rumsfeld’s resignation not long after insisting that Mr. Rumsfeld was at the Pentagon to stay. Today, Mr. Bush praised Mr. Rumsfeld as a “superb leader.”

“For nearly six years, Don Rumsfeld has served with exceptional strength and energy at a time of challenge and change, and he produced impressive results,” Mr. Bush said. He said the former secretary “took ballistic missile defense from theory to reality, and undertook the most sweeping transformation of America’s global defense posture since the start of the Cold War.”

Even in peacetime, the job of defense secretary has been considered an enormous challenge because of the vast Pentagon bureaucracy. Now, Mr. Bush said, “We are a nation at war, and I rely on our secretary of defense to provide me with the best possible advice and to help direct our nation's armed forces as they engage the enemies of freedom around the world. Bob Gates is the right man to take on these challenges."

Defense Chief Gates Sworn In (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates took the oath of office yesterday, warning that the nation cannot afford failure in Iraq and promising that the war there will be his top priority.

Gates, 63, becomes Pentagon chief at a time when President Bush and military commanders are hashing out the best way forward in Iraq, hoping to salvage a situation that is by many accounts on the brink of disaster. In his confirmation hearings before the Senate, Gates said he believes the United States is neither winning nor losing the war and pledged to consider all options for the future.

"All of us want to find a way to bring America's sons and daughters home again, but as the president has made clear, we simply cannot afford to fail in the Middle East," Gates said yesterday at the Pentagon after Vice President Cheney swore him in as the nation's 22nd defense secretary. "Failure in Iraq at this juncture would be a calamity that would haunt our nation, impair our credibility, and endanger Americans for decades to come."

President Bush chose Gates to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld immediately after the November elections, when Democrats gained control of Congress. The election results were viewed as a strong message from the public that the war in Iraq is off track. Gates, a former head of the CIA, was officially sworn in early yesterday at the White House and publicly took the oath at the Pentagon.

Gates vowed yesterday to provide "candor" and "honest counsel" to the president and to listen to the professionals at the Pentagon "who ultimately must carry out the decisions" his department makes -- alluding to the perception of Rumsfeld as a Pentagon chief who did not heed war advice from his top military commanders. Gates told the uniformed service members that he will rely on their "clear-eyed advice in the weeks and months ahead," and said he plans to travel to Iraq so he can hear assessments of the situation "unvarnished and straight from the shoulder."

Bush has delayed speaking to the nation about his decisions on Iraq so Gates can make his own assessment. Gates said he has been attending National Security Council meetings, has received briefings at the Pentagon and has discussed the situation with the president.

As U.S. officials debate whether to send more troops into Iraq or to create a major shift in military operations there, Bush said yesterday that he expects Gates to "help our country forge a new way forward in Iraq."

"As Bob Gates raises his hand and takes the oath of office, he does so at a time of great consequence for our nation," Bush said. "He knows the stakes in the war on terror. He recognizes this is a long struggle against an enemy unlike any our nation has fought before."

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, attended the Pentagon ceremony and said in an interview afterward that he fears the Bush administration could go forward with ill-fated policies in Iraq but believes Gates will work with Congress. Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the outgoing chairman, said he, too, is optimistic.

"I expect he'll bring a fresh perspective on Iraq," Levin said. "Also, I expect he will be much more open to oversight."

Gates originally was a member of the Iraq Study Group -- which recently issued a stark assessment of the war and made dozens of recommendations -- but stepped aside after Bush nominated him to replace Rumsfeld. Gates had been president of Texas A&M University since 2002.

"I return to public service in the hope that I can make a difference at a time when our nation is facing daunting challenges and difficult choices," Gates said.

White House, Joint Chiefs At Odds On Adding Troops (WP)

By Robin Wright And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

The Bush administration is split over the idea of a surge in troops to Iraq, with White House officials aggressively promoting the concept over the unanimous disagreement of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, according to U.S. officials familiar with the intense debate.

Sending 15,000 to 30,000 more troops for a mission of possibly six to eight months is one of the central proposals on the table of the White House policy review to reverse the steady deterioration in Iraq. The option is being discussed as an element in a range of bigger packages, the officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0107615

But the Joint Chiefs think the White House, after a month of talks, still does not have a defined mission and is latching on to the surge idea in part because of limited alternatives, despite warnings about the potential disadvantages for the military, said the officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the White House review is not public.

The chiefs have taken a firm stand, the sources say, because they believe the strategy review will be the most important decision on Iraq to be made since the March 2003 invasion.

At regular interagency meetings and in briefing President Bush last week, the Pentagon has warned that any short-term mission may only set up the United States for bigger problems when it ends. The service chiefs have warned that a short-term mission could give an enormous edge to virtually all the armed factions in Iraq -- including al-Qaeda's foreign fighters, Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias -- without giving an enduring boost to the U.S military mission or to the Iraqi army, the officials said.

The Pentagon has cautioned that a modest surge could lead to more attacks by al-Qaeda, provide more targets for Sunni insurgents and fuel the jihadist appeal for more foreign fighters to flock to Iraq to attack U.S. troops, the officials said.

The informal but well-armed Shiite militias, the Joint Chiefs have also warned, may simply melt back into society during a U.S. surge and wait until the troops are withdrawn -- then reemerge and retake the streets of Baghdad and other cities.

Even the announcement of a time frame and mission -- such as for six months to try to secure volatile Baghdad -- could play to armed factions by allowing them to game out the new U.S. strategy, the chiefs have warned the White House.

The idea of a much larger military deployment for a longer mission is virtually off the table, at least so far, mainly for logistics reasons, say officials familiar with the debate. Any deployment of 40,000 to 50,000 would force the Pentagon to redeploy troops who were scheduled to go home.

A senior administration official said it is "too simplistic" to say the surge question has broken down into a fight between the White House and the Pentagon, but the official acknowledged that the military has questioned the option. "Of course, military leadership is going to be focused on the mission -- what you're trying to accomplish, the ramifications it would have on broader issues in terms of manpower and strength and all that," the official said.

The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss internal deliberations, said military officers have not directly opposed a surge option. "I've never heard them be depicted that way to the president," the official said. "Because they ask questions about what the mission would be doesn't mean they don't support it. Those are the kinds of questions the president wants his military planners to be asking."

The concerns raised by the military are sometimes offset by concerns on the other side. For instance, those who warn that a short-term surge would harm longer-term deployments are met with the argument that the situation is urgent now, the official said. "Advocates would say: 'Can you afford to wait? Can you afford to plan in the long term? What's the tipping point in that country? Do you have time to wait?' "

Which way Bush is leaning remains unclear. "The president's keeping his cards pretty close to his vest," the official said, "and I think people may be trying to interpret questions he's asking and information he's asking for as signs that he's made up his mind."

Robert M. Gates, who was sworn in yesterday as defense secretary, is headed for Iraq this week and is expected to play a decisive role in resolving the debate, officials said. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's views are still open, according to State Department officials. The principals met again yesterday to continue discussions.

The White House yesterday noted the growing number of reports about what is being discussed behind closed doors. "It's also worth issuing a note of caution, because quite often people will try to litigate preferred options through the press," White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters.

Discussions are expected to continue through the holidays. Rice is expected to travel to the president's ranch near Crawford, Tex., after Christmas for consultations on Iraq. The administration's foreign policy principals are also expected to hold at least two meetings during the holiday. The White House has said the president will outline his new strategy to the nation early next year.

As the White House debate continues, another independent report on Iraq strategy is being issued today by the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based crisis monitoring group that includes several former U.S. officials. It calls for more far-reaching policy revisions and reversals than did even the Iraq Study Group report, the bipartisan report issued two weeks ago.

The new report calls the study group's recommendations "not nearly radical enough" and says that "its prescriptions are no match for its diagnosis." It continues: "What is needed today is a clean break both in the way the U.S. and other international actors deal with the Iraqi government, and in the way the U.S. deals with the region."

The Iraqi government and military should not be treated as "privileged allies" because they are not partners in efforts to stem the violence but rather parties to the conflict, it says. Trying to strengthen the fragile government of Prime Minister Nouri al-

Maliki will not contribute to Iraq's stability, it adds. Iraq's escalating crisis cannot be resolved militarily, the report says, and can be solved only with a major political effort.

The International Crisis Group proposes three broad steps: First, it calls for creation of an international support group, including the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council and Iraq's six neighbors, to press Iraq's constituents to accept political compromise.

Second, it urges a conference of all Iraqi players, including militias and insurgent groups, with support from the international community, to forge a political compact on controversial issues such as federalism, distribution of oil revenue, an amnesty, the status of Baath Party members and a timetable for U.S. withdrawal. Finally, it suggests a new regional strategy that would include engagement with Syria and Iran and jump-starting the moribund Arab-Israeli peace process.

Iraqi TV Station Plays Up U.S. Losses (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi And Molly Hennessy-fiske, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, December 19, 2006

BAGHDAD — The men with laptops sat around an unadorned conference table, chatting amicably about their plans and operations.

The scene on the newly launched Al Zawraa satellite television channel could have been footage from the boardroom of any company, if it weren't for the ski masks the men wore and the subject of the meeting: future mortar attacks on U.S. bases in Iraq.

The renegade, pro-insurgent Al Zawraa channel, with a 24-hour diet of propaganda against U.S. forces and the Iraqi government, has become something of a sensation throughout the country. It has drawn condemnation from U.S. officials, Iraqi politicians and Friday prayer leaders.

Most hours of the day it plays footage of U.S. soldiers in Iraq being shot and blown up in insurgent attacks, often with religious chants or Saddam Hussein-era nationalist anthems in the background. There are segments warning Iraq's Sunni Arabs to be wary of Shiite Muslims, and occasional English-language commentary and subtitles clearly meant to demoralize U.S. troops.

"Your new enlisting qualifications are kind of comical," an announcer says in slightly accented American English, over an image of a U.S. soldier in a field hospital, a bandage on his newly amputated arm. "I mean, what are you doing? Thirty-nine years old? That's the new age of recruiting? Are you recruiting nannies? I guess if we are patient, we might witness crippled people enlisting for the Marines."

The station attempts to present an alternative to images of the war appearing in U.S. and other Iraqi media. It shows footage of Americans abusing Iraqis and Baghdad government officials collaborating with the "occupier." Even Michael Moore's "Fahrenheit 911," the 2004 documentary critical of the Bush administration's foreign policy, gets drawn into the commentary.

"After all, there are honest guys in America," the announcer says in comments directed at President Bush. "If Mr. Moore can talk to you like that, so can I."

It's not clear how big an Iraqi audience Al Zawraa captures. But its very presence demonstrates the insurgency's abilities. Despite 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq and intense diplomatic pressure on Iraq's neighbors, the station is able to circumvent U.S. and Iraqi forces and stage round-the-clock broadcasts, complete with news bulletins, graphics and commentary.

Al Zawraa started out several months ago as an aboveground hard-line Sunni channel, but it was shut down by the Iraqi government Nov. 5, the day Hussein received the death penalty. Iraqi police raided the station's headquarters after broadcasts criticized the verdict.

At the time, Mishaan Jaburi, a member of parliament said to be behind the station, disputed the sanction.

"If Saddam had ordered the killing of some hundreds of Iraqi people, the current officials in Baghdad deserve 1,000 death sentences because they cause the daily killing of more than those killed by Saddam," Jaburi, who has been accused of embezzling state funds, told the Associated Press from Syria.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki had warned stations in July not to broadcast footage that would jeopardize the nation's stability. But the attempt to stifle Al Zawraa backfired. It quickly reemerged as an underground station with violent, no-holds-barred content clearly meant to incite Sunnis.

Broadcast staples include images of U.S. soldiers manhandling Iraqi women, photos from the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal and footage of Iraqi children burned and injured in alleged U.S. attacks.

The station also loops shaky, slow-motion footage of U.S. vehicles being blown up and American soldiers, often in crosshairs, crumpling to the ground after being shot by snipers.

One question-and-answer segment with insurgents shows them installing Katyusha rocket launchers on cars and assembling weapons to fire rocket-propelled grenades.

DOJ_NMG_0107617

"And you still using this tactic?" the announcer asks.

"Oh yes. With the will of God, we will never give up," an insurgent replies.

Al Zawraa announcers dispute U.S. casualty statistics. They insist that instead of nearly 3,000 American soldiers killed, the death toll is closer, as one said, to "30,000 miserable, poor nobodies who you have convinced that they will win a scholarship after a tiny tour in a little place called Iraq."

They attempt to portray the insurgency as a powerful force to be reckoned with for years to come. "There will be no negotiating," an announcer states. "For us, it's straight and simple. We are fighting for our religion and for our soil. We will fight you while you are packing. We will fight you while you are sleeping. We will fight you as you are evacuating your last soldier."

Some of the images of Americans being attacked are available on the Web and in video shops in Iraq. Some U.S. military officers shrug off Al Zawraa, saying it rarely broadcasts anything new.

Some viewers acknowledge the station's sectarian biases but say it's no different from other new Iraqi channels beholden to political blocs.

"Al Zawraa is not serving the interest of the Iraqi people," said Zaid Farooq, a 33-year-old Baghdad electrical engineer. "They are saying bad things about the government. But we can't blame Al Zawraa when there are other channels like Al Iraqiya," the state-owned station.

Though Al Zawraa rarely praises or shows footage of the many insurgent attacks on Iraqi civilians and security forces, it's the station's sectarian agenda that most irks the Shiite-dominated government. After Iraqis held a reconciliation conference Saturday meant to heal wounds between Sunnis and Shiites, the station quickly broadcast denunciations of the meeting by the Muslim Scholars Assn., a leading Sunni clerical group.

A recent segment showed Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr sitting among a group of clerics and ordering an unseen person to "send them in there as soldiers," a suggestion that his men had infiltrated the security forces and were taking part in death-squad operations against Sunnis.

An announcer alleged that Sadr, a critic of U.S. policies here, had stopped his fight against the Americans and was now focusing his efforts against Sunnis.

Iraqi government efforts to track down the renegade station have come to naught. No one's quite sure where it broadcasts from or even who is behind it. Iraqi national security advisor Mowaffak Rubaie and a senior U.S. military official said it was broadcasting from somewhere near the Kurdish city of Irbil at one point and recently signed a distribution deal with the Egyptian satellite company NileSat.

There are indications that the Iraqi government is still looking for Al Zawraa. Police in the Sunni city of Hawija near Kirkuk raided the home of another member of Jaburi's parliamentary bloc Sunday, arresting him and two others on unspecified security charges.

Prosecutor Implicates Saddam In Attacks (AP)

By By
AP, December 19, 2006

The chief prosecutor in Saddam Hussein's trial presented memos Monday from the ousted president's office approving chemical attacks against Kurdish villages, the most serious evidence against him in his genocide trial.

Munqith al-Faroon showed the Iraqi court trying Saddam and six other former regime members about 25 documents, including some presidential letters instructing the army to use "special ammunition" — identified as "mustard gas" — to quell a Kurdish rebellion in 1987. Some of the documents bore Saddam's signature, al-Faroon said.

Documents from Saddam's government played a crucial role in his first trial, for the 1987 killing of Shiites in the town of Dujail. In that trial, which ended with Saddam being sentenced to death, prosecutors presented memos with his signature approving death sentences for Shiites and rewarding intelligence agents for their role in the Dujail crackdown.

As in past hearings, Saddam said Monday that anything that occurred during his 34-year rule of Iraq was ultimately his responsibility, but he did not say he ordered the attacks.

"Any strike whether it was by special ammunition — chemical as (the prosecutor) interpreted or conventional — and (claims) by any military or civil official who said Saddam Hussein ordered us to do so, I take the responsibility with honor, whether the order came from me or not," Saddam told the court.

DOJ_NMG_0107618

He admitted that he was not tolerant of "dissidents," including Kurdish rebels, but insisted that he did not target women and children.

His defense lawyers and some co-defendants have said in recent hearings that it was the Iranian, not the Iraqi army, that carried out the chemical attacks against Iraq's Kurdish population.

Saddam exonerated one of his co-defendants, former military intelligence chief Sabir al-Douri, saying that his role and that of his department was limited to gathering intelligence, not carrying out orders.

"As the commander in chief of the armed forces, the military intelligence gathers information and is connected to the secretary of the president of the republic. It has no other duty than to collect intelligence," Saddam said.

Earlier Monday, al-Faroon presented a letter dated in 1987 and signed by Iraq's military intelligence, asking Saddam's presidential office for permission to strike Kurdish rebels with the "special ammunition."

"It identifies the special ammunition right here as 'mustard gas,'" al-Faroon maintained, pointing to the gas reference in the letter, which was briefly shown during a television broadcast of the proceedings.

A response letter from Saddam's presidential office said it sanctioned the strike, provided that its "goal is not only to harm the rebels," according to al-Faroon, who asserted that the other target was Kurdish civilians.

Another 1987 letter, this one by Iraq's air force command addressing the defense ministry, said that "there were 44 strikes carried out by 44 warplanes, using special ammunition on the bases of (Kurdish) agents, except for one village because it was near our ground units," al-Faroon said.

The prosecuting lawyer also read a letter to the intelligence headquarters in eastern Iraq sent in 1987 by one of the intelligence offices in the northern Kurdish area that said a "number of reporters have arrived at Sarglou area to see the result of Iraqi shelling, using chemical weapons. It is likely that journalists will be sent to the areas hit to report on the incidents."

Al-Douri — Saddam's military intelligence chief — ruled out any connection with the alleged chemical attacks, saying such an offensive was not feasible because his department lacked the technical expertise.

"There was not a single officer or a body in my organization that was specialized in chemical weapons," he said, adding that he suspected some of the documents were not authentic. Al-Douri had previously accused Iran of attacking Iraq's Kurds with chemicals.

Saddam and his co-defendants have pleaded innocent to charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity for their alleged roles in the 1987-88 military offensive against the Kurds, codenamed Operation Anfal.

The prosecution estimates that 180,000 Kurds were killed when Saddam's army waged a scorched-earth campaign against Kurdish separatist guerrillas, allegedly destroying hundreds of villages, killing or forcing their residents to flee.

Saddam and one other defendant have pleaded innocent to the additional charge of genocide.

If convicted, all the accused could be condemned to death.

Saddam was convicted in the Dujail trial where he was convicted of ordering the execution of 148 Iraqis, including children, after a 1982 attempt to assassinate him.

His lawyers appealed that trial's verdict and sentence. The appeals court is expected to rule early next month.

Iraqi officials have suggested that Saddam's prosecution on genocide charges would be halted if the appeals court upholds the death sentence of the first trial.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said Friday he hoped it would only be a matter of days before an appeals court rules on Saddam's death sentence.

The trial was adjourned until Tuesday.

Marine To Be Charged In Haditha Case (AP)

By Thomas Watkins,

AP, December 19, 2006

A Marine captain has been told he will be criminally charged in connection with the killing of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha, his attorney said Monday.

Capt. Lucas McConnell, 31, was told by his commanding officer that he will be charged with dereliction of duty, said Kevin McDermott, his attorney.

"We're just absolutely clueless as to what kind of dereliction of duty he could have committed," he said, adding that his client was not present during the killings.

DOJ_NMG_0107619

Separately, two military officials said a group of Marines would be charged Thursday for their alleged roles in the killings. The officials requested anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about the charges ahead of their announcement.

The charges would mark the latest step in a massive investigation into the actions of a squad of Camp Pendleton-based Marines and several officers on Nov. 19, 2005. Earlier this month, the Marine Corps said that charges were being finalized against several troops but the precise timing was unclear.

Marine spokesman Lt. Col. Sean Gibson said Monday: "We will be presenting as much information as allowable at the appropriate time."

The Marine Corps initially reported that 15 civilians died in a roadside-bomb blast. Citing survivor accounts and human rights groups, a media report in March said that the killings were deliberate acts by the Marines, prompting the criminal investigation.

A parallel military investigation has examined whether officers in the Marines' chain of command tried to cover up the events. Results have not been made public.

The killing began when a roadside bomb struck the last of a four-vehicle convoy containing a 12-Marine squad and several Iraqi soldiers. Driver Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas died in the blast and two other Marines were seriously wounded.

In the events that followed, two dozen Iraqis were killed. Five men were shot to death when they approached the scene in a taxi, and others — including women and children — died in three houses over the next several hours.

Neal Puckett, a defense attorney for squad leader Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, has described the events of the day as a tragic but lawful combat engagement.

The criminal case will focus on whether the Marines were responding to perceived threats with legitimate force, or if the troops went too far and acted outside their rules of combat.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Fannie Mae Ex-Officials Are Sued For Disputed Pay (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

Federal regulators yesterday sued three former Fannie Mae executives, including former chairman and chief executive Franklin D. Raines, to recoup more than $115 million in pay they received while the company's earnings were misstated.

In an administrative complaint, regulators said Raines and the others engaged in a variety of ruses to meet profit goals and boost their compensation. For example, they delayed booking $200 million of expenses one year and used transactions with no economic purpose in other periods simply to shift income into the future, the complaint alleged.

The regulators' discovery of accounting problems in 2004 ultimately led Fannie Mae to pay a $400 million penalty and correct years of financial results, erasing $6.3 billion of previously reported profit.

Charged with Raines were J. Timothy Howard, former chief financial officer of the government-chartered mortgage finance company, and Leanne G. Spencer, former controller.

The former executives "improperly manipulated earnings to maximize their bonuses, while knowingly neglecting accounting systems and internal controls, misapplying over twenty accounting principles and misleading the regulator and the public," James B. Lockhart III, director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, said in a statement.

The three "did very serious harm to this company," Lockhart said in a conference call with reporters.

Lawyers for the former executives said the allegations were false and politically motivated. OFHEO's director had been warning for weeks that he planned to take action against former Fannie Mae executives, and he has cited the company's problems in calling on Congress to pass legislation giving Fannie's regulators greater power.

Lockhart is using Raines as a prop in his legislative campaign, and his agency has distorted evidence that it has kept from public view, Kevin M. Downey, an attorney for Raines, wrote in a letter yesterday to the OFHEO director.

Lawyers for Howard and Spencer noted that the agency now bringing the charges once vouched for Fannie's soundness, adding that the company's annual financial results were certified by auditor KPMG.

OFHEO's charges are to be reviewed by an administrative law judge, who will recommend a final decision to the agency's director. Raines's lawyer called on the current director, Lockhart, to withdraw from the matter, saying he was "fatally biased" because he repeatedly accused Raines of wrongdoing prior to bringing charges.

The agency is seeking to recoup $84.6 million in bonuses, stock option grants and other awards from Raines alone. In addition, OFHEO is seeking penalties from the three former executives that could total more than $100 million.

DOJ_NMG_0107620

Before Fannie's problems came to light, Raines was one of Washington's most prominent businessmen, widely viewed as a potential Treasury secretary. His rÃ©sumÃ© traced his rise from humble roots to the heights of government and finance: graduate of Harvard College and Harvard Law School, Rhodes Scholar, junior aide to President Jimmy Carter, investment banker at Lazard Freres, chairman of Harvard's Board of Overseers, director of President Bill Clinton's Office of Management and Budget.

He was also a leader of the Business Roundtable, a lobbying group for chief executives of major corporations, and he worked to repair corporate America's credibility after accounting scandals at Enron and other companies.

"As a CEO, one of the most offensive things about the corporate scandals that emerged recently was to hear CEOs claim that they did not know, they could not know, and they could not be expected to know about the activities that brought down their companies," Raines wrote in Fannie Mae's 2002 annual report.

In 2004, an OFHEO examination faulted Fannie's accounting and challenged its management, ultimately leading the company to settle charges of fraud and other violations with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Fannie's accounting problems were so extensive that it took two years and cost more than $1.4 billion for thousands of workers to redo past financial reports. Fannie remains unable to issue current financial statements on a timely basis, one of the basic requirements of any public company, and in the absence of such reports, its shares continue trading on the New York Stock Exchange by special dispensation.

The charges filed yesterday are the first to target the top executives who presided over the company during the accounting debacle.

To unlock maximum executive bonuses for 1998, regulators alleged, Fannie understated expenses by almost $200 million, counted two years of low-income housing tax credits in a single year, and, through a last-minute bookkeeping entry, recorded $3.9 million of "miscellaneous income."

The complaint said Raines has testified that he had no reason to refute Spencer's statement that he signed off on the decision to defer the nearly $200 million of expenses.

Most of Fannie's flawed bookkeeping involved accounting for derivatives, financial instruments Fannie uses to hedge against movements in interest rates. Raines argued in 2004 that the derivatives accounting involved complex issues about which experts could disagree. Regulators said that the issues were black and white and that Fannie deliberately violated the requirements. Other companies have issued corrections over similar mistakes.

Relations between the company and the agency have often been antagonistic. In a May report, OFHEO alleged that Fannie lobbied to keep the agency poorly funded so that Fannie "would essentially be regulated only by itself."

Raines's successor as chief executive, Daniel H. Mudd, distanced himself from Fannie's posture under Raines, telling lawmakers this year that the days "of the arrogant, defiant my-way Fannie Mae had to end."

A Fannie spokesman declined to comment yesterday.

Unlike OFHEO, the SEC has taken no action against Raines or Howard. The SEC's investigation is continuing, SEC spokesman John Nester said.

The Justice Department has said that it does not plan to prosecute Fannie Mae, though it has been investigating whether Raines and Howard committed perjury when they testified about Fannie's accounting at a 2004 congressional hearing.

Fannie, Raines and Howard, meanwhile, are defending themselves against litigation brought by shareholders.

Fannie Mae recently sued its former auditor KPMG, alleging the accounting firm's negligence caused damages of more than $2 billion. KPMG said it plans to pursue claims of its own against Fannie Mae.

A fair review of OFHEO's claims "will demonstrate the propriety in all respects of Mr. Howard's conduct," said his attorney, Steven M. Salky. Spencer's work "was nothing short of outstanding," said her attorney, David S. Krakoff.

OFHEO acted yesterday to meet a two-year statute of limitations. Its charges could take years to resolve. More than three years after an accounting scandal at Fannie's rival Freddie Mac, the agency remains in litigation to recoup pay from former Freddie executives.

Ex-Fannie Execs Face Civil Charges (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, December 19, 2006

Federal regulators Monday filed civil charges against former Fannie Mae CEO Franklin Raines and two other former executives, accusing them of manipulating Fannie Mae's earnings to jack up their bonuses.

In a complaint with an administrative law judge, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight detailed 101 charges from 1998 to 2004 against Raines, former chief financial officer Timothy Howard and former controller Leanne Spencer, who all resigned in 2003 as the Fannie Mae scandal worsened.

DOJ_NMG_0107621

FINDLAW: Notice of charges against the three

OFHEO is seeking $100 million in penalties and $115 million in return of bonuses. The regulator also seeks the return of legal fees, and to bar the former executives from any future business with Fannie Mae.

A major force in the mortgage investment market, Fannie Mae has been engulfed in political controversy and financial scandal for years. Lawmakers and regulators are seeking greater regulatory control of the government-sponsored housing finance giant.

Fannie Mae was run by Harvard University graduate Raines, former budget director in the Clinton administration and one of the first black CEOs of a major corporation.

James Lockhart, OFHEO's director, said the actions of the former executives "cost the enterprise and shareholders many billions of dollars and damaged the public trust."

OFHEO alleges that the former executives submitted "misleading and inaccurate accounting statements and inaccurate capital reports that enabled them to grow Fannie Mae in an unsafe and unsound manner."

Defense attorneys for the former executives deny the charges.

Howard's lawyer, Steven Salky of the Zuckerman Spaeder law firm, called the allegations "a work of unsubstantiated fiction" and "a politically motivated attempt to rewrite history."

Spencer's attorney, David Krakoff of Mayer Brown Rowe & Maw, said OFHEO brought the charges even after reporting to Congress that Fannie Mae surpassed financial safety requirements through 2003.

Raines' attorney, Kevin Downey of Williams & Connolly, demanded Monday that Lockhart recuse himself from the case. In a letter to Lockhart, he called the OFHEO director "a fatally biased regulator" who is using the case to advance his political agenda of enacting Fannie Mae-related legislation. Raines' lawyers hope to move the case to a federal court.

Lockhart declined to address the allegations of bias.

While the charges cover 1998 to 2004, Lockhart said other violations may have occurred in the early 1990s.

The agency continues to investigate other current and former Fannie Mae executives, he said.

Two years ago, a special examination by OFHEO found that former Fannie Mae executives ignored internal financial controls and manipulated earnings through questionable "cookie jar" reserves.

Last spring, OFHEO and Fannie Mae agreed to a $400 millionfine for alleged accounting manipulation.

Regulator Seeks Legal Action Against Fannie Mae Ex-Officials (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty And Damian Paletta

The Wall Street Journal, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Fannie Mae's main regulator announced legal action aimed at forcing three former executives of the government-sponsored mortgage company to pay back more than $115 million of bonuses.

But responses from lawyers for the executives suggest that the regulator faces a long and difficult legal battle.

The regulator, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, or Ofheo, also said it is seeking fines against the three that could total more than $100 million. Ofheo plans to present to an administrative law judge allegations that the three former executives "improperly manipulated earnings to maximize their bonuses." The former executives are Franklin Raines, who was chief executive officer, Timothy Howard, chief financial officer, and Leanne Spencer, controller. The former executives and their lawyers yesterday were notified about the claims in a notice of charges.

Fannie ousted all three about two years ago after regulators found that the company violated accounting rules.

The former executives neglected internal controls, misapplied more than 20 accounting principles and misled the regulator and public, Ofheo Director James Lockhart charged in a statement. Fannie Mae recently announced a restatement of results that cut retained earnings as of June 30, 2004, by $6.3 billion.

Lawyers for all three executives denied the allegations, which Mr. Howard's attorney called "a work of unsubstantiated fiction." The lawyers' responses suggested that they will argue that Fannie's former accounting practices and internal controls were approved by outside auditors and Ofheo itself.

In a letter to the regulator yesterday, Kevin Downey, a lawyer for Mr. Raines, called on Ofheo's Mr. Lockhart to remove himself from the case. Mr. Downey wrote that Mr. Lockhart's public comments in recent months show that he is "fatally biased" against Mr. Raines and already has concluded that the former CEO is guilty. An Ofheo official declined to comment on the letter.

Ofheo said it expects the U.S. Office of Personnel Management to refer the case to an administrative law judge, a justice who handles cases involving federal agencies. After hearing from the two sides and perhaps holding public hearings, the judge would recommend a decision to Ofheo's director, who could "accept, modify or set aside" the recommendation, Ofheo said. The defendants could appeal to a federal court.

Mr. Downey said Ofheo should allow the executives to challenge the agency's findings and proposed remedies immediately in federal court rather than going through the administrative law procedure.

For three years, Ofheo has been waging a similar legal battle to force two former top officers at Freddie Mac, a rival of Fannie, to give up some of their compensation because of an accounting scandal at Freddie that erupted in 2003. So far, former Freddie Chief Executive Leland Brendsel and former Chief Financial Officer Vaughn Clarke have successfully resisted Ofheo's demands for paybacks. The case is being heard by an administrative law judge in Washington.

In the Fannie case, Ofheo is seeking restitution of about $85 million of bonuses, stock options and other nonsalary compensation paid to Mr. Raines from 1998 through 2003, $27 million from Mr. Howard, and $5.7 million from Ms. Spencer.

Fannie and Freddie, which were chartered by Congress but are owned by shareholders, buy home mortgages from lenders and package them into securities.

U.S. Files Charges In Fannie Mae Accounting Case (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

Federal authorities filed civil charges today against three former top executives of Fannie Mae, the giant government-sponsored company that underwrites home mortgages, including the former chief executive, Franklin D. Raines, accusing them of manipulating Fannie Mae's books to fatten their bonuses.

The charges were the latest development in the fallout over accounting violations at Fannie Mae. After the housing oversight office denounced Fannie Mae in a scathing report in May, the company agreed to pay a $400 million settlement. Earlier this month, Fannie restated its earnings for several years, making a total of $6.3 billion in various corrections, to straighten out inaccuracies in its financial statements. It was one of the largest corporate accounting restatements on record.

In all, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight filed 101 charges today against Mr. Raines, J. Timothy Howard and Leanne G. Spencer. Mr. Howard was once Fannie Mae's chief financial officer; Ms. Spencer was the company's controller.

The allegations against them include fabricating "deliberately misleading" financial reports, manipulating earnings and failing to operate a sound system of internal checks and balances.

"The 101 charges reveal how the individuals improperly manipulated earnings to maximize their bonuses, while knowingly neglecting accounting systems and internal controls," said James B. Lockhart, director of the housing oversight office, in announcing the charges today. "They submitted six years of misleading and inaccurate accounting statements and inaccurate capital reports that enabled them to grow Fannie Mae in an unsafe and unsound manner."

If proven, the charges against the executives could result in fines of more than $100 million being assessed against them. In addition, the housing oversight office is asking that the Fannie executives be ordered to repay some $115 million that they were paid by the company. Regulators have said that, of the $90 million paid to Mr. Raines from 1998 to 2003, the years during which the accounting violations occurred, at least $52 million was tied to bonus targets that were reached by manipulating accounting.

Kevin M. Downey, Mr. Raines's lawyer, strongly denied the accusations against his client. In a letter to Mr. Lockhart, Mr. Downey asked that he remove himself from the case. "The long record in this matter demonstrates that you are a fatally biased regulator," Mr. Downey wrote.

Steven Salky, a lawyer for Mr. Howard, called the new charges "a work of unsubstantiated fiction." In a statement, Mr. Salky said the allegations are "a politically motivated attempt to rewrite history."

Mr. Raines and Mr. Howard were forced out of the company in December 2004, and investigators have since laid much of the blame for the problems on their shoulders.

Fannie Mae, the second-largest financial institution in the nation, buys home mortgages and sells bonds backed by them, which investors consider to be implicitly backed by the Treasury, though there is no formal guarantee. Its activities and those of similar smaller agencies dominate the mortgage-backed securities market. Once known as the Federal National Mortgage Association, the company changed its name in 1997 to match its Wall Street nickname, based on its abbreviation.

Former Fannie Leaders Charged (WT/AP)

By Marcy Gordon

The Washington Times, December 19, 2006

The government yesterday filed civil charges against former Fannie Mae Chief Executive Franklin D. Raines and two other top executives, accusing them of misconduct costing shareholders billions of dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0107623

The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight (OFHEO), the D.C. mortgage giant's regulator, announced that it is seeking fines and the return of millions of dollars in bonus money. It filed 101 charges against Mr. Raines, former Chief Financial Officer Timothy Howard and former Controller Leanne Spencer.

Mr. Raines and Mr. Howard were swept out of office two years ago in the multibillion-dollar accounting debacle at the government-sponsored company, which finances one of every five home loans in the United States. Fannie Mae earlier this month announced a long-awaited restatement for 2001 through June 30, 2004, that erased $6.3 billion in profit.

OFHEO said it is seeking civil fines of $100 million or more against the three former executives and restitution totaling more than $115 million in bonus money tied to an improper accounting scheme.

The regulator may bring similar charges against both current and former executives and directors, OFHEO General Counsel Alfred Pollard said. Fannie Mae spokesman Brian Faith declined to comment.

Attorneys for Mr. Raines, Mr. Howard and Ms. Spencer disputed the regulators' charges and said they were politically motivated. The lawyer for Mr. Raines called OFHEO Director James B. Lockhart "a fatally biased regulator" and asked him in a letter to remove himself "immediately and completely from any further regulatory action affecting Mr. Raines."

Mr. Lockhart's true motivation is to get Congress to enact legislation tightening the government reins on Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, its smaller sibling in the $8 trillion home-mortgage market, said Mr. Raines' attorney, Kevin Downey.

Mr. Raines, a prominent Washington figure who was White House budget director in the Clinton administration, led Fannie Mae -- with its legendary political clout, generosity in campaign contributions and lobbying savvy -- from 1999 until his ouster by the company board in December 2004.

Mr. Lockhart said the charges "reveal how the individuals improperly manipulated earnings to maximize their bonuses, while knowingly neglecting accounting systems and internal controls, misapplying over 20 accounting principles, and misleading the regulator and the public."

"The misconduct cost [Fannie Mae] and shareholders many billions of dollars and damaged the public trust," he said.

OFHEO, the regulator for Fannie Mae and McLean company Freddie Mac, in May issued a blistering report charging a six-year accounting fraud at Fannie Mae, the second-largest U.S. financial institution after Citigroup Inc. The regulators said the scheme included manipulations to reach quarterly earnings targets so that company executives could pocket hundreds of millions in bonuses from 1998 to 2004.

Fannie Mae paid a record $400 million civil fine in a settlement with OFHEO and the Securities and Exchange Commission. It also agreed to limit the growth of its multibillion-dollar mortgage holdings, capping them at $727 billion, and to make top-to-bottom changes in its corporate culture, accounting procedures and ways of managing risk.

The notice of charges filed by OFHEO includes accusations that Mr. Raines, Mr. Howard and Ms. Spencer engaged in earnings manipulation and "deliberately misleading" financial reporting, and failed to establish a sound internal-controls system.

The charges will be heard by an administrative law judge, who will make a recommendation to Mr. Lockhart -- not a binding decision -- on whether the charges should stand. The three would have the right to appeal a final ruling in federal court.

Mr. Raines' total compensation from 1998 through 2004 was $91.1 million, including some $52.6 million in bonuses. Mr. Howard earned $30.8 million during the period, including $16.8 million in bonuses; Ms. Spencer received $7.3 million, of which some $3.5 million was bonus money.

Mr. Howard's attorney, Steven Salky, called the accusations against his client "a politically motivated attempt to rewrite history."

The charges are "a work of unsubstantiated fiction, starkly at odds with both the actual facts and the conclusions reached by OFHEO during its extensive annual examinations of Fannie Mae," he said. "We are eager for a fair and impartial adjudication of these claims, which will demonstrate the propriety in all respects of Mr. Howard's conduct."

Ms. Spencer's lawyer, David Krakoff, said her annual performance reviews for the six years she was controller "found her work was nothing short of outstanding."

"We look forward to disproving the politically motivated claims brought by OFHEO," he said.

Broadcom Faces Upgraded, `Formal' SEC Options Probe (BLOOM)

By Peter J. Brennan

Bloomberg, December 19, 2006

Dec. 18 (Bloomberg) -- Broadcom Corp., a chipmaker restating results to add $1.5 billion in payroll costs, said the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission has opened a ``formal'' investigation into the company's options practices.

Broadcom also canceled more than $37 million in stock options held by three unnamed individuals it holds responsible for manipulating their grant dates, the Irvine, California-based company said in a statement today. Broadcom said it took the actions as it finished an internal review of the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0107624

Dates on ``numerous'' grants were manipulated after they were issued from 1998 to 2003, Broadcom said. The SEC's formal probe gives it subpoena power to demand information from current and former Broadcom employees. The company has said that because of the irregularities, related compensation costs will at least double, the biggest increase in the widening options scandal.

``The escalation of the SEC inquiry to formal status is a bit unsettling given the open-ended possibilities,'' said Cody Acree, a Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst, in a note to investors. Acree said current demand for the company's products isn't improving, so he's keeping a ``hold'' rating on the shares.

Shares of Broadcom rose 13 cents to $33.72 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading and have risen 7.3 percent this year.

Samueli, Others Absolved

Chief Executive Officer Scott McGregor and acting Chief Financial Officer Bruce Kiddoo can certify Broadcom's financial statements, the company said. It said Henry Samueli, co-founder, chairman and chief technical officer, and Broadcom's outside directors didn't receive any improperly dated grants.

The company's statement didn't mention William Ruehle, who quit Sept. 19 after nine years as Broadcom's chief financial officer. Broadcom spokesman Bill Blanning didn't immediately answer questions posed in an e-mail.

Samueli and the outside directors ``reasonably'' relied upon management and professionals to correctly handle option grants and their accounting treatment, Broadcom said.

Executives and directors who say they relied on professional advice could be establishing a valid defense, said Jacob Frenkel, a former enforcement lawyer with the SEC.

``Once it is asserted, that opens for discovery the extent of the discussions'' among the CEO, chairman and those responsible for the options backdating, Frenkel said in an interview. ``That could be the difference between to charge and not charge'' in both civil and criminal cases.

Options granted since 2003 have been properly dated and accounted for, the company said, including those given to co-founder Henry Nicholas. Nicholas quit as CEO in January of 2003, saying he wanted to spend more time with his family.

`Voluntary' Repricing

Remaining employees who received improperly dated options have ``voluntarily'' agreed to higher exercise prices, reflecting grant dates chosen by the company, Broadcom said. It said all the individuals ``actively responsible'' for the date manipulation have left the company.

The SEC's upgraded investigation means it can subpoena documents and witnesses who are both current and former employees, said Frenkel, now a lawyer with Shulman, Rogers, Gandal, Pordy & Ecker in Rockville, Maryland.

``The federal investigation likely will be time consuming and demanding,'' Frenkel said. ``It does not portend an enforcement action.''

Amended results for 2005 and the first quarter of 2006 will be reported in January, the company said. McGregor in October said he would be disappointed if reports for the second and third quarters weren't released by the end of this year.

High Flier

Broadcom was a high-flying company where expensive Italian Lamborghini sports cars dotted the parking lot as the stock price shot up to as high as a split-adjusted $183.17 in August 2000. Sales soared from $37 million in 1998, when Broadcom shares began trading publicly, to $2.67 billion last year. The company makes chips for a wide variety of consumer electronics such as television set-top boxes, Apple Computer Inc.'s video iPod and Nintendo Co.'s Wii game console.

This is the second major accounting scandal to hit Broadcom. In 2001, the company was forced to change how it accounted for warrants issued in connection with the more than 30 acquisitions that fueled its sales growth. Lawsuits charged Broadcom with inflating its revenue and the company last year settled for $150 million.

Incentives

Stock options let recipients buy shares at a future date, usually at the market price on the day they were granted. Often they are given to managers as an incentive.

The U.S. Justice Department and SEC are investigating Broadcom and other companies to determine if they manipulated the dates of option grants to boost their value. At least 185 other companies have announced internal or federal options probes in the scandal.

Broadcom's internal investigators reviewed 6 million pages of documents and electronic information and interviewed over 40 people about the option grants, the company said.

``There was uncertainty and confusion as to the accounting rules for options, and certain individuals may have acted without fully understanding the rules or whether compensation charges should have been taken,'' Broadcom's statement said.

Blowdown: How Faults At BP Led To One Of America's Worst Industrial Disasters (FT)

By Sheila Mcnulty

Financial Times, December 19, 2006

Part of William Bradley Bessire's job as project co-ordinator at BP's Texas City refinery was to put on a lavish "safety lunch" to reward the workers in his section for every week without an accident.

At such a lunch on March 23 last year, Mr Bessire finished a big plate of fajitas, rice and beans, congratulated the workers on another good week and headed back to the trailer that served as his office - just as the refinery's nearby isomerisation unit was being restarted.

Some of the operators in the unit, designed to boost the octane rating in petrol, had been working 12-hour days for 30 days in a row, several with two-hour commutes. Alarms and gauges were broken and a key piece of equipment, the blowdown drum, was not only outdated but undersized. A proposal by BP engineers to upgrade to safer technology in 2002 had been turned down because of cost pressures.

Restarting the unit was a fairly routine event: it had been shut for maintenance and fired up again 19 times in the previous five years. But the use of the blowdown drum meant it vented directly to the atmosphere instead of to a flare, which would have burnt off fumes. During the start-up that Wednesday, the drum became overfilled with highly flammable liquid hydrocarbons. The accompanying fumes spread out over the refinery - until they found a spark.

Some 500ft away in his trailer,Mr Bessire felt a shock wave and knew the isomerisation unit was going to blow. He rushed out just as an explosion ripped through the plant, forcing a door and window out of their frames and into him, knocking him down.

As the flames spread, hundreds of workers ran to the barbed wire fence surrounding the refinery trying to get out, but they could not climb over it without shredding their hands. Mr Bessire backed a truck up to the fence so that people could clamber on it to jump over. He ripped off his coverall and laid it over the barbed wire as protection for those fleeing, then he ran back to find something else to wear. He spent four hours helping people out of the refinery. By then, 15 people were dead and 500 injured in and around the facility. He ruptured two discs that would have to be replaced with metal plates, limiting mobility in his neck, and damaged nerves would leave him with chronic pain on his right side.

It was the worst US industrial accident in more than a decade. Lord Browne, BP's chief executive, flew in the next day to take responsibility, setting the tone for talks with what would eventually become 1,000 claimants seeking the $1.6bn (£820m, €1.2bn) that BP allotted for compensation.

Not all BP executives displayed great contrition, however. A friend e-mailed John Manzoni, head of BP's refining and marketing, suggesting that he should travel to the refinery. Mr Manzoni's reply was terse and he appeared perturbed when Lord Browne ordered him to interrupt his vacation to go to Texas City: "I arrived in Texas City at 3am - along with Lord Browne and we spent the day there - at the cost of a precious day of my leave." BP declined to comment on this e-mail.

The US Department of Labor's Occupational Safety and Health Administration (Osha) uncovered more than 300 "egregious, wilful violations" in Texas City - BP's biggest refinery. BP did not admit guilt but agreed to a maximum allowable $21m fine and said it would spend $1bn improving and maintaining the refinery over the next five years.

Many of the problems at the 70-year-old plant had, no doubt, been inherited by BP when it acquired the refinery in 1998 as part of its purchase of Amoco. Before the blast, the Texas City site had in 30 years suffered 23 fatalities - four since BP took over. But instead of making the investments needed to improve safety, BP in 1999 ordered a 25 per cent cut in fixed costs.

Federal investigators would later conclude that these budget cuts caused a progressive deterioration in safety: "At an ageing facility like Texas City, it is not responsible to cut budgets related to safety and maintenance without thoroughly examining the impact on the risk of a catastrophic accident," said Carolyn Merritt, chairwoman of the US Chemical Safety Board (CSB), an independent federal agency that investigates industrial chemical accidents. "They had all the symptoms of a failed safety culture."

Ronnie Chappell, a BP spokesman, responded that the cuts were not a "directive" but rather a "challenge" to achieve the target without compromising safety or the long-term viability of the business unit. Nor did the cuts cause the blast, he added: "Our investigation team found no evidence that previous budget decisions were a critical factor in the terrible tragedy." Indeed, he said, spending at the facility had increased significantly in the years prior to the explosion and was by some measures higher than the industry average. Nonetheless, workers said they were certain BP was underspending and that this had put the refinery at risk of the type of explosion that took place that day.

Mr Bessire said: "I always worried about the safety of being in that refinery. Every time you drove up to the gate and 'badged in', you worried; there is not a person who works in that place that does not worry." It was hard not to: near the refinery entrance, workers for a time passed a billboard commemorating two colleagues scalded to death by boiling water after a pipe ruptured on September 2 2004.

John McLemore, fire chief at the site, estimated in a deposition for one of the many civil lawsuits against BP that the refinery had suffered an average of a fire a week over the past 10 years. The isomerisation unit had recorded eight other releases of vapour from the same blowdown drum from 1994 to 2004 - two of them under BP's watch. Of the total, six had included vapour clouds thatMs Merritt concluded could have had "catastrophic consequences, but for the absence of an ignition source" and two resulted in fires.

Ms Merritt said she doubted that the poor safety culture existed solely within the confines of the barbed wire fence at Texas City: "It's rare that you are going to have one facility that is so far off the mark in having a good culture in an organisation. An errant facility would not be able to continue on a bad path."

Indeed, an investigation by the Financial Times has shown BP allowed the refinery to deteriorate, in spite of all the red flags. Moreover, it was not the only BP operation in the US that was permitted to do so. BP Alaska has suffered a string of damaging safety lapses over the past five years and there have been smaller incidents in other states - all hinting at a broader problem with BP's safety approach in the US. Yet Texas City was in particularly bad shape - and, according to US regulators, senior executives in London knew that.

"BP's global management was aware of problems with maintenance, spending, and infrastructure well before March 2005," the CSB's report said. "BP did respond with a variety of measures aimed at improving safety. However, the focus of many of these initiatives was on improving procedural compliance and reducing occupational injury rates, while catastrophic safety risks remained."

Prior to the blast, a BP safety presentation on Texas City had opened with the statement: "Texas City is not a safe place to work." Texas City's safety business plan for 2005 said the death of a worker within 12 to 18 months was a "key risk". Even further back, BP executives had been aware of problems. On August 16 2002, James Hay, BP business unit leader for chemicals, e-mailed David Pierpoline, the group's director of health, safety, security and environmental compliance for the western hemisphere, to note that Mike Hoffman, vice-president for refining, had asked him to follow up on how Texas City had fallen into "such a poor state" and expressed concern that other sites should not be allowed to deteriorate to that extent.

But not much changed and, by late 2004, Texas City workers had grown so fearful of a massive accident that the local union contacted colleagues in Alaska for help in engaging the services of Chuck Hamel, a longtime campaigner for oil workers, to publicise their plight.

Around the same time, Don Parus, the refinery's site manager, tried to get a handle on the depths of the problems by commissioning an independent safety audit. Telos Group, a Texas-based consultancy, surveyed more than 1,100, or 60 per cent, of Texas City employees. Mr Parus said in a deposition he was unsurprised by the findings. Employees in the 338-page report, completed on January 21 last year, tell of broken alarms, thinned pipe, chunks of concrete falling, bolts dropping 60ft and staff being overcome with fumes. Staff rated "making money" BP's number one priority and "people" its lowest, at number nine.

"The history of investment neglect, coupled with the BP culture of lack of leadership accountability from frequent management changes, is setting BP Texas City up for a series of catastrophic events" was one of many ominous warnings. Geoffrey Gioja, co-author of the Telos report, said he was astounded: "We have never seen a site where the notion 'I could die today' was so real . . . This had a profound impact on us all. It also causes asolidarity, especially amongst the hourly employees, that seemedakin to being in a war together."

The Telos report contained something even more disturbing, however: evidence that the numbers of reported safety incidents were being kept low by pressure being brought to bear on the victims. While BP pointed out that the Texas City refinery in 2004 had the lowest injury rate in its history - and nearly one-third the average for the oil refining sector - BP's internal 2005 safety business plan, a copy of which has been obtained by the FT, listed under key risks a "site not reporting all incidents in fear of consequences".

Telos quoted numerous workers at the plant complaining of pressure not to report injuries and safety violations. "I have been hurt and had management punish me and make a fool of me. Need I say more?" asked one worker cited in the report. A second said: "The employee is always at fault - and required to sign [a] statement that he committed an unsafe act."

"They made fun of me," said a third. And a fourth: "Now when we get hurt, you drag yourself out the gate, if you're able, and say it happened at home."

"There are senior managers here who have allowed the site to accept a completely inappropriate amount and level of risk, who have allowed criminal levels of non-compliance," concluded a fifth.

Mr Chappell countered that the Telos report "does not report the 'objective' truth about safety performance or conditions" but rather "is an accurate representation of the attitudes, perceptions and statements made by survey participants". Nonetheless, he said, BP had been moving to address the concerns expressed in the report when the refinery exploded. "There had been a comprehensive effort by Texas City refinery leadership to drive continued safety improvement, encourage the reporting of injuries and near-misses and ensure the thorough and complete investigation of injuries and incidents at the refinery."

DOJ_NMG_0107627

In spite of a heightened sense of urgency about the state of Texas City in internal e-mails after the report, then confidential, was circulated among management, BP kept the plant open. "When they got the Telos report, BP had a choice: embrace safety and do it the right way, or just keep profits and production going," said John Eddie Williams Jr, managing partner at Williams Bailey, a law firm that handled 145 of the civil cases arising from the blast. "They made the conscious decision to keep running this plant instead of doing a safety stand-down."

With limited other employment chances for the largely low-skilled workers at the plant, they in general hung on - even after the disaster. "A lot of people are stuck here because there is no place else they can get money to pay for their families," said the wife of one man who stayed on. Though the explosion had shaken their nearby house and thrown their toddler a foot into the air, they had agreed to risk the husband's continuing at the refinery for another year, at $25 an hour, to save up enough to move away. "This is a working man's town. Those without education can always get a job in the plants because of the dangers of the chemicals," said the woman.

Ms Merritt of the CSB urged BP to set up an independent review of its other US operations for lapses. The company agreed, appointing a panel led by James Baker, former secretary of state. The results of that probe were originally due last month but Mr Baker has pushed that deadline back twice, citing the scale of the review, and has set a new release time of early January. In the meantime, according toBP's Mr Chappell, the company has done its own assessment and identified problems at each of its refineries that, while not as broad or deep as those found at Texas City, are being addressed.

In the months following the disaster, BP's various operations in Texas suffered another explosion, a fire and a spill. On July 20 this year a contract worker was crushed to death at Texas City when, in operating a motorised hoist, he became wedged between a beam and the control panel. BP's safety record elsewhere in the US has also been troubled. Last month two contract drillers were killed in separate accidents in Alaska and Oklahoma, suffering head injuries in what BP called "the course of normal activities".

The deaths followed regulatory and legal battles elsewhere in the US. In April, Osha fined BP $2.4m for unsafe operations at its Ohio refinery. In May, BP ended a legal battle by agreeing to increase oil-spill prevention efforts and fund a $1m study of spill risks at its refinery in Washington state. In Illinois, BP is embroiled in a lawsuit arising from the sale of a chemical plant in 2004 that Flint Hills Resources, the buyer, says "required tens of millions to comply with environmental laws and permits" - charges BP denies.

The state of California has sued BP in recent years both over air pollution violations and a failure to make required upgrades to safeguard water supplies from unseen leaks. The company has settled the suits with agreements to spend millions of dollars in penalties and improvements. Amid all this, the US federal government this summer accused BP's traders of having tried to manipulate the propane market in 2004. Last week, regulators told BP the company was under investigation for manipulating the unleaded petrol futures market, a charge it denies.

Mr Chappell insists the incidents are one-offs, denying Ms Merritt's charge of a problem with BP's safety culture: "While it is natural for people to look for patterns, recent events in the US are not linked. They are each very different from each other in terms of immediate cause, location, business unit. There are lots of BP businesses in the US doing a world-class job of managing their operations."

But Mr Hamel, the campaigner for oil workers, disagrees, noting the striking similarity of complaints about BP processes coming out of Texas and Alaska, its two biggest trouble spots: "They are both identical - defer, defer, defer maintenance - and operate systems and facilities to failure as a money-saving programme." These similarities became public on August 6 when BP Alaska admitted discovering such "severe corrosion" in pipelines, following government-mandated checks after a big spill, that it shut half its oilfield.

Five years earlier, BP had received what it considered an "extremely negative" assessment of its anti-corrosion programme by an independent consultant. Its response was to press the consultant to revise the criticism. Documents obtained from Mr Hamel show the company persuaded Coffman Engineers to change the report, with the final version being shorter and softer on BP.Mr Chappell says the "first generation of the report contained errors, and we pointed them out as part of the normal review process. Simple as that."

But this year, BP was forced to admit it had failed to perform "pigging" corrosion checks for up to 14 years on oil transit lines, relying on cheaper, less reliable checks from the exterior, slotting in metal "coupons" and using ultrasonic equipment, instead of sending a probe through the line itself.

BP said it did not suspect microbial bacteria in its transit lines - which turned out to be the cause of the corrosion and which "pigging" would have cleaned out. But experts say this is not credible. "Any prudent operator is going to be sure it does not have MIC [microbial bacteria] and is going to periodically run cleaning pigs to sweep out colonies if they do form," says Rick Kuprewicz, president of Accufact, a pipeline energy consulting firm. "MIC is not something that space science invented last year."

The company's reputation took another hit when, during the BP Congressional hearings this year, Richard Woollam, former head of corrosion monitoring for BP Alaska, refused to testify, citing his constitutional right to avoid self-incrimination. Steve Marshall, at the time BP Alaska president, said BP had transferred Mr Woollam after finding evidence that his inspection team had felt intimidated.

Following the hearings, John Dingell, a senior member of the House of Representatives committee on energy and commerce, told the FT: "What is most troubling is that, to this day, it is not clear if BP truly understands what went wrong with either Texas City or Alaska . . . It will be far too easy to repeat these failures if BP does not first understand the problems that led to them." Since then both Mr Marshall, the former BP Alaska head, and Maureen Johnson, who managed the Prudhoe Bay oil field, have been reassigned.

The Department of Justice has grand juries in both Alaska and Texas exploring whether to bring criminal charges against the company and/or its officers. Mr Bessire has meanwhile been left to fend for himself. BP gave him a settlement he is not allowed to reveal but, at age 53, he readily admits he could have earned twice what he received had he been able to work another 10 years.

Now the pain from his injuries keeps him up at night, leaving him exhausted and, with his limited mobility, too much of a risk to hire. Worse, he cannot get health insurance. "Medical bills eat up everything that everybody's got. Now I worry every day, 'Can I spend a dollar? What if I need it down the road?'" He wants Lord Browne to provide the victims with health insurance. "He can't wash his hands . . he owes that to us."

Options Backdating Frequent, Report Says (AP)

AP, December 19, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - About 1,400 corporate directors received option grants whose timing was manipulated, according to an academic study released Monday.

Of all options grants to directors, about 9 percent were received at "lucky" times -- when the stock price was equal to a monthly low, according to a Harvard Law and Economics paper released Monday.

After studying the period form 1996 to 2005, academics at Harvard Law School, Cornell University and INSEAD in France estimated that about 800 lucky grant events were the result of opportunistic timing.

Options give the recipient a right to buy a stock at a fixed "strike price," generally set at the stock's market price the day of the grant and options holders benefit if the stock rises above the strike price. In the backdating scandal, companies have dated option grants to days when the stock was at a low, enhancing the potential benefit.

According to the study:

_Director grants were more likely to be manipulated when potential gains were larger.

_Grants were more likely to be manipulated when the company had more provisions protecting insiders from risk of removal.

_Directors' grants were more likely to be lucky when executives, and especially the CEO, also received a grant on the same date.

_Grants were more likely to be manipulated when the board did not have a majority of independent directors.

The report was written by Lucian Bebchuk at Harvard, Yaniv Grinstein at Cornell and Urs Peyer at INSEAD.

At least 189 companies have disclosed Securities and Exchange Commission, Department of Justice or internal investigations related to backdating, according to an Associated Press review.

Doubt Cast On Stock Options Of Directors (LAT)

By Kathy M. Kristof, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 18, 2006

A study suggests that hundreds of board members may have gained from backdating.

Nearly 1,400 corporate board members appear to have profited from the manipulation of stock option grant dates over a 10-year period, according to a study being released today.

The analysis raises the possibility that hundreds of board members were aware that options were backdated to boost their value to themselves and company executives. That could be seen as a conflict with their role as advocates for all company shareholders.

"Rather than merely failing to notice or stop the manipulation of executives' grants, many outside directors have received manipulated option grants and thus directly benefited from the manipulation practices," according to the study by Harvard professor Lucian Bebchuck and two other scholars.

DOJ_NMG_0107629

Stock options are rights to buy company shares at a set price in the future. The option price generally is set at the market price on the grant date. The lower the price on that date, the more likely the recipient would be to profit.

The study reviewed 29,000 stock option grants from 1996 to 2005 to so-called outside directors, or board members who are not executives of the company.

About 9% of the time, options were granted on days when the stock price was at a monthly low — a coincidence that suggests the date may have been picked in hindsight, or backdated, to ensure maximum benefit.

Corporate watchdogs said the 9% figure was significant, even though it suggested that the timing was not suspicious for the overwhelming majority of grants. That's because board members are supposed to be looking out for average investors, not using their positions for self-profit, these critics say.

"It's appalling," said Claudia Allen, chairwoman of the corporate governance practice at Chicago law firm Neal, Gerber & Eisenberg. "Directors are fiduciaries for all stockholders; to act in their own self-interest is a breach of loyalty. It's the cardinal sin."

The study did not name any companies, nor did it offer any hard evidence that directors played a direct role in the backdating of options.

It did conclude that backdating occurred across a wide range of industries. The one exception was the utilities sector, which issues few options to directors.

The backdating scandal emerged this year after academic research by Erik Lie of the University of Iowa, leading to resignations and investigations at scores of companies.

Most of the focus has been on corporate executives, who make far more in option grants than board directors. But the study's authors and others say the role of directors deserves scrutiny.

"It seems less significant because there is less money involved, but the betrayal of trust is far greater," said Paul Hodgson, senior research associate at Corporate Library, a governance research firm based in Maine.

Questionable grants were sometimes given to executives and directors on the same date, according to the study, coauthored by Yaniv Grinstein of Cornell and Urs Peyer of the University of Chicago.

At other times, directors were given options on dates that executives did not receive them, the study found. In those cases, 71% of the options granted appeared to involve some kind of date manipulation.

Bebchuck said suspicious grants were far more likely to happen at companies that had management structures that tended to give chief executives more power. These include provisions for staggered terms of board members, weakening their clout, and so-called poison pill measures and other defenses against hostile takeovers.

Lie of the University of Iowa said the new study underscored the important role directors should play in guarding against management abuses.

"It's hard for shareholders to understand what's going on in a company because you can't be there," Lie said. "That's why you delegate the responsibility to a few people, the directors, who represent you. You have to have trust in those people and they have to act in a trustworthy manner."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Violent Crime Is Up For 2nd Straight Year (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

A surge in violent crime that began last year accelerated in the first half of 2006, the FBI reported yesterday, providing the clearest signal yet that the historic drop in the U.S. crime rate has ended and is being reversed.

Reports of homicides, assaults and other violent offenses surged by nearly 4 percent in the first six months of the year compared with the same time period in 2005, according to the FBI's latest Uniform Crime Report. The numbers included an increase of nearly 10 percent for robberies, which many criminologists consider a leading indicator of coming trends.

The results follow a 2.5 percent jump in violent crime for 2005, which at the time represented the largest increase in 15 years.

The latest numbers suggest that those results were not an anomaly but rather part of the first significant uptick in violent crime since the early 1990s, according to criminal justice experts.

Many communities, particularly those in urbanized areas, may be headed into a period of sustained crime increases, they said. While no one is certain of the causes, experts cited an increase in the number of young men in their crime-prone years, diminished crime-fighting assistance from the federal government, fewer jobs for people with marginal skills and even the ongoing growth in methamphetamine use in some places.

The numbers come amid heightened criticism of the federal government from many police chiefs and state law enforcement officials, who complain that the Bush administration has retreated from fighting traditional crime in favor of combating terrorism and protecting homeland security. Justice officials dispute those contentions and pointed yesterday to an ongoing study designed to identify solutions to the rise in violent crime.

"This confirms what law enforcement has been seeing and saying on a more anecdotal level: that crime is on the way up," said David A. Harris, a law professor at the University of Toledo who studies crime trends. "While it's still too early to be sure, you've certainly got things pointing in one direction."

One positive piece of news came in the category of car thefts and other property crimes, which dropped 2.6 percent overall. Even that portion of the report contained some bad tidings, however: Burglaries, another key indicator, rose 1.2 percent nationwide.

Homicide and assault rates rose by more than 1 percent overall, while the number of reported rapes dipped slightly.

The FBI's six-month report does not include statistics for the District, which reports crime statistics to the FBI only on an annual basis, officials said. Baltimore's overall violent-crime rate remained unchanged, the report showed. Data for individual states were not part of the analysis.

Rising homicide rates have prompted particular concern among law enforcement officials, and a surge in killings and other violent attacks in the Midwest played a significant role in driving up rates in 2005. But Alfred Blumstein, a criminologist at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh, noted that, unlike 2005, homicide rates plunged in many smaller and medium-size cities for the first half of 2006.

"Obviously these big cities are accounting for a big piece of the action in this report," he said.

The increase was especially dramatic in many cities of 500,000 residents or more, the FBI report showed, including a 28 percent increase in Houston that appears attributable in part to an influx of residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina in 2005. Homicides in New Orleans, whose population was greatly reduced after the storm, plunged by more than 60 percent in the same time period.

The numbers are certain to increase pressure on the Bush administration, whose detractors say local police concerns have been slighted by the focus on homeland security and counterterrorism.

The Justice Department inspector general's office has reported sharp declines in the number of FBI agents and investigations dedicated to traditional crimes since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. In addition, the International Association of Chiefs of Police says that law enforcement programs at the Justice Department have been cut by more than $2 billion since 2002 and that overall funding for such programs has been reduced to levels of a decade ago.

"We've been looking at some pretty discouraging numbers, and we've always been concerned that as funding decreases, crime rates will increase," said Gene Voegtlin, the association's legislative counsel.

James Alan Fox, a criminologist at Northeastern University in Boston who has been critical of the Bush administration's crime-fighting strategies, said the overall rise in violent crime should be expected given dramatic cuts in assistance to local police and simultaneous increases in the population of males in their teens and 20s.

"We have many high-crime areas where gangs have made a comeback, where police resources are down and where whatever resources there are have been shifted to anti-terrorism activity," Fox said. "It's robbing Peter, and maybe even murdering Peter, to pay Paul."

Justice Department officials have repeatedly rejected such criticism, arguing that the causes and trajectory of the crime increase is still unclear. Nonetheless, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales has launched a series of anti-drug and anti-gang initiatives at Justice, and he acknowledged at a crime conference in Boston last week that local police are struggling with "increased responsibilities" since Sept. 11, 2001.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said yesterday that the department's ongoing study of crime trends in 18 cities will help determine "what is causing this increase" and "which crime-fighting efforts are most effective."

"We are encouraged by the drop in property crime seen in most areas around the country, but we are again concerned about the increase in violent crime in some cities and towns," Roehrkasse said.

FBI Reports Rise In Violent Crime (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 19, 2006

Murders, robberies grow in the first half of 2006, more evidence that a long decline is over.

WASHINGTON — The number of murders and robberies in the U.S. continued to grow during the first half of this year, fresh evidence that violent crime is on the upswing after more than a decade of decline, the FBI said Monday.

From January to June, violent crime increased 3.7% compared with the first six months of 2005, the bureau reported. The number of robberies increased 9.7%, while murders rose 1.4%. Aggravated assaults increased 1.2%; forcible rape offenses declined less than 0.1%.

The increases, which occurred nationwide, follow an overall jump of 2.3% for violent offenses in 2005 and portend another year of rising violent crime, experts said. In 2005, violent crime posted its largest overall increase since 1991.

Though criminal justice experts were cautious about drawing conclusions from six months of data, they found the report worrisome and said the country could be in a new period of slowly rising crime.

A number of different explanations have been offered for the increase, including cutbacks in federal funding to state and local law enforcement agencies, which has led to fewer police on the street in large cities, and demographic factors, including an increase in the number of males from age of 14 to 24.

The trend also has kindled a debate over whether the country is spending enough for crime fighting and prevention at a time when growing numbers of federal dollars are being targeted toward terrorism and domestic security.

If the trend of rising crime continues, it could become a political issue in the 2008 election. Violent crime peaked in 1992 before beginning an extended decline to its lowest level in three decades.

"Violent street crime did not go away on Sept. 11," said James O. Pasco Jr., executive director of the Fraternal Order of Police, the nation's largest police union. Though "the same or additional resources are needed to fight those crimes," in many cases less money is being spent, he said.

The increases in violent crime were felt in all regions. The West had the largest increase: 4.7%.

The situation in California was mixed.

In Los Angeles, the number of violent crimes declined 2.6% to 14,961 from 15,367. The number of murders declined to 227 from 249. But robberies rose 7.5% to 7,042 from 6,552.

Violent crime in Oakland surged 37.9% to 3,665 from 2,657; the number of murders there increased to 66 from 37.

The FBI said the number of reported robberies was up in cities of all sizes. The largest increase — 12.8% — occurred in cities with populations of 10,000 to 24,999. But robberies also increased in metropolitan counties — 8.4%.

Cities of populations of 500,000 to 999,999 reported the sharpest increase in murders — 8.4%. In metropolitan counties, murders were up 3.1%.

The data are based on reports of more than 11,000 state and local law enforcement agencies.

Experts said the crime upsurge reflected an increase in gang violence, particularly in midsized cities, and a growth in gun crimes, including robberies and homicides.

"We have gone backward in our ability to deal with the illegal gun market," said James Alan Fox, a criminal justice professor at Northeastern University in Boston.

He said the problem had been compounded by the fact that the number of police on the street in large cities had dropped almost 10% since 2001.

The crime problem, he said, "is not going down unless we make some major changes in what we are doing."

Federal aid to state and local police declined to about $890 million in 2006 from $2.5 billion in 2001. Police departments are being squeezed by growing domestic security duties at a time when federal agencies such as the FBI are focusing more on preventing terrorism than assisting local departments fighting traditional crimes.

"We have seen some pretty dramatic cuts" in grant programs, said Gene R. Voegtlin, a spokesman for the International Assn. of Chiefs of Police, an Alexandria, Va., trade group for police department executives. "They are having an increasingly difficult time in effectively trying to combat crime and provide for safer communities. It has been a struggle."

FBI: Violent Crime Still On Rise In 2006 (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON - Murders and robberies continued to rise across the country during the first six months of 2006, preliminary FBI data released Monday show, indicating that the lull in crime between 2001 and 2004 appears to be over.

Violent crime figures are on pace for a second straight annual increase. Based on statistics for all of 2005, violent crime rose 2.2 percent nationally - the first increase since 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0107632

"This is a concern we've been focused on," said Gene Voegtlin, legislative counsel for the International Association of Chiefs of Police, which represents an estimated 20,000 law enforcement officials and has been pushing for more crime-fighting funding. "A lot of (police) agencies are really stretched thin when it comes to the budget and their ability to aggressively combat crime."

From megapolises to small cities, violent crime rose 3.7 percent between January and June compared to the first six months of 2005. Twenty-eight more people were murdered during that period 2006 in New York City, for example, while the college town Norman, Okla., saw its total number of homicides jump from zero to three.

The early data show:

-Murders rose by 1.4 percent, felony assaults by 1.2 percent and robberies by a whopping 9.7 percent in 2006, compared to the first six months of 2005. The number of rapes decreased by less than one-tenth of 1 percent.

-Burglaries increased by 1.2 percent. But car thefts dropped by 2.3 percent and other stealing incidents by 3.8 percent.

-Arsons rose by 6.8 percent.

The FBI's twice-yearly report comes as the Justice Department studies 18 cities and suburban regions for clues on why the national violent crime rate is increasing. Justice researchers have not yet visited all of the cities, and it is not clear whether the government will make more federal funding available to the worst-hit.

The Bush administration has asked for $1.2 billion in crime-fighting grants and assistance programs this year - what Voegtlin described as at least a $1 billion hit from funding levels a decade ago.

Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department is encouraged by a 2.6 percent drop in property crimes - such as auto theft and other larcenies - as outlined in the FBI report. But "we are again concerned about the increase in violent crime in some cities and towns," he said.

The data is based on crime reports from 11,535 police and other law enforcement agencies nationwide. The total number of actual crimes reported was not immediately available.

Violent Crimes On Rise, Especially In West, An F.B.I. Report Says (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

HOUSTON, Dec. 18 — Driven by a surge in robberies, violent crimes nationwide rose 3.7 percent for the first half of 2006, with the West leading the increase, the F.B.I. reported Monday. But property crime was down 2.6 percent.

Robberies reported to the authorities were up 9.7 percent, murders were up 1.4 percent and arson was up 6.8 percent, the Federal Bureau of Investigation said in its summary. Rape was largely unchanged.

Reflecting a surge in crime in Texas after the dislocations of Hurricane Katrina, Houston recorded a sharp increase in homicides, to 202 for the first half of 2006, up from 158 in the comparable prestorm period last year. Three Texas cities ranked among the nation's top 10 in crimes per capita.

Homicides in Dallas were down to 101 from 106 but it still ranked as the nation's most crime-ridden big city, with 3,985 overall crimes per 100,000 population, followed by Houston with 3,444. After Phoenix with 3,436, San Antonio was 4th with 3,422. Los Angeles ranked 8th with 1,730, and New York was 10th with 1,187.

Lt. Vernon Hale, a spokesman for the Dallas Police Department, said the rankings were subject to differences in how cities classified crimes, adding, "We overreport." Through November, he said, overall crime in Dallas compared with last year was down nearly 10 percent, with violent crime down nearly 3 percent. "We think things are getting better," Lieutenant Hale said.

In New York, where homicides were up to 266 from 238 last year, Paul J. Browne, the chief police spokesman, said a dozen or more killings were actually "reclassifications" of old crimes that became homicides when the victims died this year. Overall crime in the city was down 7 percent and violent crime down 3 percent for the first half of the year, Mr. Browne said.

The oldest and largest police chiefs' organization said the figures proved that law enforcement agencies were stretched too thin.

"They all have new responsibilities since 9/11," said Gene Voegtlin, legislative counsel for the group, the International Association of Chiefs of Police, in Alexandria, Va. He said that since 1997, federal grants to local police agencies had decreased to $890 million from $2.4 billion.

"There are some disturbing indications" in the half-year figures, Mr. Voegtlin said, but cautioned, "It's hard to draw general conclusions."

Violent crime for the period had been on a downward trend: 3.1 percent in 2003, 2 percent in 2004, and half a percent last year.

The West led the increase in violent crime, up 4.7 percent. Much of that was driven by robbery, up 14.6 percent, nearly three times the increase in the Northeast.

DOJ_NMG_0107633

The Northeast had the smallest increase in violent crime, 2.9 percent. The South led in homicides, up 3.3 percent.

Many cities showed increases in homicides: Miami was up to 30 from 23; Indianapolis to 68 from 44; Boston to 37 from 29; and Detroit to 186 from 169.

FBI Reports Rise In Violent Crime In First Half Of '06 (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, December 19, 2006

Violent crime nationwide increased by 3.7 percent in the first six months of this year, but property crime dropped by 2.6 percent, the FBI said yesterday.

The FBI's Preliminary Semiannual Uniform Crime Report, based on statistics submitted by 11,535 law-enforcement agencies, showed increases in murders (up 1.4 percent), robberies (up 9.7 percent) and aggravated assaults (up 1.2 percent) over the same period in 2005. Forcible rapes dropped 0.1 percent.

Last year, the number of violent crimes increased by 2.5 percent, the largest gain in 15 years, and the Justice Department pledged to determine why the crime numbers were continuing to increase. A report on the matter has not yet been completed.

Washington was not included in the FBI report, but Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey has declared progress in a renewed fight against violent crime in the city, which spiked in July -- prompting the declaration of a citywide crime emergency.

Only two area cities reported data to the FBI for the report: Baltimore, which recorded declines in the reported incidents of murder (137 to 133), rape (79 to 77) and aggravated assaults (3,498 to 3,257), and Alexandria, which reported increases in the number of murders (1 to 6), robberies (88 to 109) and aggravated assaults (111 to 114).

According to the FBI report, the largest increases in the reported number of violent crimes, 12.8 percent, occurred in small cities with populations of 10,000 to 24,999, while cities with populations of 500,000 to 999,999 had the most marked increase in reported murder offenses, up 8.4 percent.

In the property-crime category, according to the report, the number of larceny-theft offenses decreased 3.8 percent nationwide for the six-month period, while reported motor vehicle thefts declined 2.3 percent. Only burglary offenses showed an increase, up 1.2 percent from the 2005 level.

Though reported property-crime offenses as a whole were down in all of the nation's population groups, the report said the number of reported burglary offenses was up in all of the population groups with the exceptions of cities with 1 million or more inhabitants, where they declined by 1.5 percent, and the nation's nonmetropolitan counties, down 3.7 percent.

According to the report, reported property crimes were down in three of the four regions. The Midwest was the only region to show a cumulative increase in the volume of reported property crimes, up 1.7 percent overall with increases of 5.8 percent for burglary, 0.7 percent for larceny-theft and 0.3 percent for motor vehicle theft.

The report said that arson offenses, which are tracked separately from other property-crime offenses, increased 6.8 percent nationwide.

BAY AREA Violence On Rise In Some Cities FBI Report -- Oakland, S.F. Part Of Bigger Trend (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, December 19, 2006

Driven by a surge in armed robberies, violent crime rose in the Bay Area and around the country during the first six months of this year, the FBI said Monday in a report that raised concern that the drop in crime that started in the 1990s has turned around.

Oakland witnessed a 38 percent increase in reported violent crimes -- homicides, rapes, robberies and assaults -- from the first half of 2005, the biggest uptick among 63 California cities with populations of at least 100,000 people.

Double-digit increases were also tallied by Hayward, San Francisco and Antioch, according to the FBI's preliminary Uniform Crime Report, which was compiled using numbers from 11,535 law enforcement agencies.

Nationally, violent crime increased 3.7 percent, with robberies up 9.7 percent. The bump in violent crime was biggest in cities with populations of 500,000 to 1 million residents, at 8.4 percent. And it followed a 2.3 percent increase nationally from 2004 to 2005.

On a positive note, nonviolent property crimes -- burglary, theft and arson -- were down 2.6 percent nationally, the FBI said.

"We are again encouraged by the drop in property crimes seen in most areas around the country, but we are also concerned about the increase in violent crime in some cities and some towns," said Brian Roehrkasse, a U.S. Justice Department spokesman.

He said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales had dispatched teams to 18 cities to study recent crime increases. The Justice Department will suggest new anti-crime programs after receiving those teams' reports, Roehrkasse said.

DOJ_NMG_0107634

Roehrkasse said Justice Department officials could not explain the rise in robberies. In the Bay Area, Santa Clara recorded a jump of 82 percent, from 17 to 31, in the first half of the year. Big gains were recorded from San Francisco (37 percent) to Antioch (19 percent).

Antioch Police Chief James Hyde said his officers are seeing younger criminals as well as more women and out-of-towners committing robberies and other violent attacks.

The motive, he said, usually relates to drugs, particularly methamphetamine. Robbers rip off dealers, steal prescription drugs from pharmacies and pull off street heists to get money for a quick drug fix, he said.

"Instead of one or two, you're seeing four to five people" in a robbery crew, Hyde said. "They tend to be parolees along with probationers learning the robbery trade, if you want to put it that way. You're seeing a more mobile and sophisticated robbery crew."

Hyde said the government had a hand in the problem by cutting financial support for community policing in favor of anti-terrorism grants.

"That limited our ability to work closely with neighborhoods and have a higher officer-to-citizen ratio," Hyde said. "Many departments have become more reactive than proactive."

Roehrkasse, however, said the increases do not appear to be related to federal spending, which he said has never totaled more than 4 percent of state and local law enforcement agencies' budgets.

Franklin Zimring, a professor at UC Berkeley's Boalt Hall School of Law, said criminologists are "nibbling their nails" at the new data because there were no solid answers for why crime decreased drastically in the 1990s and held relatively flat during the first half of this decade.

Zimring recently completed "The Great American Crime Decline," a book that attacks prevailing explanations for the decline -- including economic prosperity, prison expansion and a decrease in at-risk youth due to abortion legalization.

"Any indication that the arrow can turn up alerts us to the possibility that the trend can turn against us," Zimring said. "If we had a stronger sense of what held crime down, we'd have less to worry about with small blips."

Nationally, homicides increased 1.4 percent and aggravated assaults went up 1.2 percent in the first half of this year. Rapes decreased by less than 0.1 percent.

Oakland saw a 78 percent jump in homicides, from 37 to 66 in the six-month span, and a 48 percent increase in robberies.

"I don't think it lends itself to a simple solution," said Officer Roland Holmgren, a spokesman for the Oakland Police Department. "And it's not going to take one thing to fix it."

He said factors in Oakland's crime increase include poverty, the greater availability of guns and a lack of problem-solving skills among young people, who increasingly settle disputes with guns rather than fists.

Fremont experienced the greatest increase in property crimes, at 13 percent, among large California cities. Many other Bay Area cities showed declines, including Antioch, where property crime dropped 24 percent.

Hyde said he believes people are "target-hardening" their homes and cars with alarms and other measures, in part because of fear that they might be victimized.

Dayton Follows National Trend In Violent-crime Rise (DAYDN)

By Ken McCall

Dayton (OH) Daily News, December 19, 2006

DAYTON — Mirroring a nationwide trend, newly released FBI data showed violent crime increased by 6.4 percent in the city of Dayton during the first six months of 2006.

The preliminary crime data released Monday show homicides and robberies continued to rise across the country during the first half of this year, on pace for an increase in violent crime for the second straight year.

The nationwide 3.7 percent uptick in violent crime between January and June comes amid a still-incomplete Justice Department study of 18 cities for clues on why criminal activity is increasing.

The numbers reflect what police across the country have been saying for months: that the lull in crime between 2001 and 2004 appears to be over.

Of the 228 cities with a population of at least 100,000 listed in the data, six of 10 showed an increase in violent crime. Dayton's 6.4 percent increase ranked 93rd on that list.

The three other large Ohio cities listed in the data all showed increases: Columbus, 8.8 percent; Cleveland, 6.8 percent; and Cincinnati, 1.2 percent.

Dayton Police Maj. Mitchell Davis, superintendent of investigations, said the national numbers generally reflect the city's experience.

"There does seem to be an increase in violent crime," Davis said. "Our homicide rate has gone back up."

But Davis said the most recent crime statistics show declines in several categories. The numbers for the year through Dec. 17 show decreases of 5 percent in felonious assaults, 12 percent in rapes, and 1 percent in robberies.

Those decreases are offset, however, by a 31 percent increase in homicides, Davis said.

The city has 42 homicides this year so far, compared with 34 for all of 2005.

But Davis said the city is safe for those who aren't involved with drugs.

"All of our murders, the victim and the murderer seem to know each other," he said. "And a very large percentage are related to the use and sale of drugs.

Dayton Director of Police Julian Davis said he had no explanation for the increase.

"Nobody knows," he said. "It could be cyclical. Even the FBI said they could not explain it."

Violent Crime Rises In U.S. (RTD)

Richmond Times-Dispatch, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A recent rise in violent crime accelerated in the first half of 2006, the FBI reported yesterday. The data provide the clearest sign yet that the nation is in the midst of a prolonged increase in murder, assaults and other violent offenses.

The results follow on the heels of a 2.5 percent increase in violent crimes for 2005, which marked the highest rate of increase in 15 years.

Violent crime reports rose by nearly 4 percent in the first six months of 2006 when compared with the same time period a year earlier, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Report.

The numbers reflect what police across the country have been saying for months: that the lull in crime between 2001 and 2004 appears to be over.

But in the metro Richmond area, the picture is not as bleak. In the first six months of 2006, Richmond saw a 14 percent decline in violent crime, despite a two-man killing spree that started the year.

Some of the surrounding counties got off to a rocky start, with violent crime increasing 9 percent in Henrico and 13 percent in Chesterfield during the first six months.

Hanover County saw a 29 percent drop in violent crime during that period.

The second half of the year has been more peaceful in Henrico and Chesterfield, which have had seven and 12 homicides, respectively, this year.

Hanover has had two, which is fewer than the number experienced by places such as Dinwiddie County and Hopewell.

Nationally, the recent crime increases have prompted widespread criticism by police chiefs and state law-enforcement officials around the country, who complain the federal government has retreated from providing money and other help to localities in favor of programs focused on counterterrorism.

Justice Department officials have argued that federal policies play a limited role in combating local crime.

One senior Justice official called the 2005 statistics a "yellow flag" that did not represent a trend.

At the same time, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales increasingly has focused on combating violence and gang crimes in public appearances, and the department has launched a study to find explanations for the crime increase.

The early data show:

Murders rose by 1.4 percent, felony assaults by 1.2 percent and robberies by 9.7 percent in 2006, compared with the first six months of 2005.

The number of reported rapes decreased by less than one-tenth of 1 percent.

Burglaries increased by 1.2 percent. But car thefts dropped by 2.3 percent and other stealing incidents by 3.8 percent.

Arsons rose by 6.8 percent.

The data are based on crime reports from 11,535 police and other law-enforcement agencies nationwide.

The total number of actual crimes reported was not immediately available.

Group To Duke: Join Bid For DA Inquiry (DURHS)

By Ray Gronberg

Durham Herald Sun, December 19, 2006

DURHAM -- Supporters of the three Duke lacrosse rape defendants on Monday asked university officials to join U.S. Rep. Walter Jones in calling for a federal civil-rights investigation of District Attorney Mike Nifong's handling of the case.

The group Friends of Duke University said that while that wouldn't force Duke President Richard Brodhead or other administrators to take a position about the guilt or innocence of the accused men, it would support "the undeniable proposition that public information suggests there is a sufficient likelihood of civil-rights violations" to merit U.S. Department of Justice scrutiny.

Speaking up is also imperative because the public-relations damage the case has inflicted on Duke is damaging the school's standing with potential applicants, the group said in news release posted on its Web site, friendsofdukeuniversity.blogspot.com, and e-mailed to reporters.

Noting that Duke's early-admission applicants dropped by 20 percent this fall, the group said "any prospective parent would have to think twice about sending a son or daughter to an institution whose leadership has stood aside as a local prosecutor targets students through procedurally improper actions."

Duke officials reacted by issuing a statement from Brodhead that repeated that his stance that the legal process has to run its course.

"Under American law, the legal system is the place to establish the facts and bring a case to a just resolution," Brodhead said. "For that reason, it is of the essence that everyone involved in the legal system act fairly in pursuing the truth and protecting the rights of the individuals involved."

He noted that he'd also said that when the case "goes before a judge and jury, the DA's case will be on trial just as much as our students will be," and that until a jury says otherwise, the defendants must be presumed innocent.

Asked specifically whether Duke would link itself to calls for a federal civil-rights investigation, university public-relations chief John Burness said, "I don't think we're planning to do that at the moment."

A spokesman for Friends of Duke University, Maryland lawyer and Duke alumnus Jason Trumpbour, criticized Brodhead's statement.

The president's response "contains absolutely nothing new, and it studiously avoids the central issue," Trumpbour said. "It speaks on one hand of a belief in the system, and yet the fundamental problem we and others have been pointing out is that the system has not been working. You can't have it both ways. You can't express your belief in the system and at the same time ignore substantial and compelling evidence that the system isn't working."

Trumpbour's group issued its request four days after Jones, a Farmville Republican, asked the Bush administration to intervene.

The congressman said Nifong may have denied defendants David Evans, Collin Finnerty and Reade Seligmann their rights by directing Durham police to show their accuser a photo lineup that only included Duke lacrosse players, and by making prejudicial comments to the press.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told Fox News over the weekend that Jones' request "is being evaluated" by the Department of Justice, but he declined to say whether the agency might launch an investigation.

Trumpbour's group said the revelations late last week that prosecutors withheld DNA test results from the defense highlighted an additional violation of the defendants' constitutional rights. The results in question showed that the accuser had the DNA of several men -- uncharged and unconnected to the case -- on or in her underwear and body cavities.

In addition to wanting a federal investigation, the group wants Nifong removed from the Duke case and replaced with a special prosecutor, Trumpbour said.

It believes the accuser's allegations were false and "would never have been handed over from police to the prosecutors" absent Nifong's intervention, he said.

Nifong didn't return a phone call seeking his reaction to Brodhead and Trumpbour's comments. He's rarely answered media inquiries about the lacrosse case since the late spring.

Witness: New Orleans Cops Shot Man In Back As He Ran Away (CNN)

By Drew Griffin, James Polk And Kate Albright-Hanna

CNN Online, December 18, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Louisiana (CNN) -- New Orleans police lined up "like at a firing range" and fatally shot an unarmed man in the back as he fled from them in the days after Hurricane Katrina swept ashore, a witness to the shooting told CNN.

It marks the first time a witness has come forward publicly with information about the shooting of Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally retarded man whose death has sparked a police investigation and a grand jury probe into what happened in and around the Danziger Bridge that day.

"He just fell like he was collapsing," Kasimir Gaston told CNN. "Like something just wiped him out."

Gaston was one of many flood refugees living on the second floor of the Friendly Inn, a low-income motel on the city's east side. On Sunday, September 4 of last year, he says he woke up and stepped onto the balcony of the motel and saw a man running, hands outstretched and being fired upon.

DOJ_NMG_0107637

Initial police accounts said that Madison reached for his waistband and turned on police, but Gaston said Madison did not appear to have a weapon and that he was running away from police "hands out, full speed" when he was shot.

Police declined CNN's request for an interview.

After the shooting last year, police said officers had responded to reported gunshots on the Danziger Bridge and that a running gunbattle ensued with six suspects.

One teenager was killed near the base of the bridge and three other people were wounded, according to police reports.

A police department press release from October 4, 2005, said Madison, described as an unidentified gunman, was "confronted by a New Orleans Police officer. The suspect reached into his waist and turned toward the officer who fired one shot, fatally wounding him."

When asked if Madison had a gun, Gaston said, "I didn't see any on him."

No gun was found on Madison's body.

An autopsy obtained previously by CNN and verified by the Orleans Parish Coroner said Madison suffered five gunshot wounds to his back and two in his shoulder.

'What I saw with my own eyes'

Gaston said he came forward now because he is still troubled by what happened. He said he decided to break his silence after watching a "CNN Presents" documentary, "Shoot to Kill," about the days after Katrina hit the Gulf Coast on August 29, 2005.

CNN has visited the room where Gaston was staying. From that balcony, it is about 100 feet to where Madison was shot and killed.

The police department has said the shooting has been thoroughly investigated. But Gaston said no officer or detective approached him about what he saw. He was not asked for his name or phone number, Gaston said.

Gaston said his only contact with police on that day was when officers told him not to touch Madison's body, which was lying behind Gaston's truck, parked in the motel entranceway.

CNN has obtained a newspaper photo taken that Sunday morning that shows where the body fell. The back of a truck with a rusted trailer hitch and broken tail light can be seen in the photo. The photo appears to be Gaston's truck, which now sits in a parking lot in Dallas, Texas, where he now lives.

"They notified me that I had two bullet holes in the passenger side," he said. Two bullet marks can be seen at the right rear of the truck today.

Mary Howell, an attorney suing New Orleans police on behalf of the dead man's family, says there were several potential witnesses living at the Friendly Inn at the time of the shooting. She has accused police of violating procedures by failing to even write down their names.

Howell said Ronald Madison and his older brother, Lance Madison, were trying to avoid the shootout between police and others that day when they ran up the Danziger Bridge, toward the other side of the Industrial Canal.

Lance Madison has said a policeman pointed what looked like a rifle or shotgun at his brother and shot Ronald near the top of the bridge. Lance said he helped carry his wounded brother to the entrance of the motel and left him there while he ran for help. After being arrested, Lance was brought back to the motel where, he says, he first saw his brother was dead.

Howell said police, in the chaos after Hurricane Katrina, failed to properly investigate the fatal shooting and are now trying to put everything behind them.

"There's a lot of things that have been washed away with this hurricane," Howell said. "We are doing everything we can to make sure this is not one of them."

While the family of Ronald Madison presses on with its lawsuit, a grand jury in New Orleans is investigating the case. Gaston said he is willing to testify before the grand jury if it will help get to the truth.

"I'm not trying to say nobody did this and nobody did that," Gaston said. "I'm just saying what I saw and being truthful and honest about what I saw with my own eyes."

Kan. Inmate Charged With Mailing Bomb To Va. Court (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

A prisoner at the famed high-security Leavenworth prison was charged yesterday with fashioning a letter bomb and mailing it to the federal courthouse in Richmond, authorities said.

Rodney Curtis Hamrick, who has a long history of threatening public officials, sent "an operable explosive device that had the capability to cause death," prosecutors said as they announced the charges. It was sent to the offices of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit and addressed to the clerk but was diverted to a basement mailroom and later detonated by police, authorities said. No one was injured.

Hamrick was an inmate at the U.S. Penitentiary in Leavenworth, Kan., when he mailed the bomb in October 2005, along with a letter several days later that contained a powdery substance labeled "anthrax," federal law enforcement officials said. Tests indicated that the substance was not anthrax.

Traci Billingsley, a spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons, said she could not comment on how Hamrick allegedly managed to construct and mail a bomb from prison.

An attorney had not been appointed yesterday for Hamrick, 41, who was charged in a seven-count indictment and faces up to life in prison if convicted. He has since been moved to Colorado's notorious "supermax" federal facility that houses terrorists and other violent felons.

Chuck Rosenberg, the U.S. attorney in Alexandria, said Hamrick's actions had presented "a grave threat to the United States courthouse and to the people who work inside, and we will prosecute it accordingly."

Hamrick has made threats to public officials and mailed dangerous devices from jail before, court records show. In 1987, from a state prison, he mailed letters threatening to kill President Ronald Reagan. While serving a prison term for that offense, he threatened to blow up a West Virginia courthouse, a United Airlines flight and NAACP headquarters, court records show.

Hamrick then constructed a bomb while an inmate at a county prison in West Virginia, according to a 1995 4th Circuit Court decision. The bomb "comprised a nine-volt battery as a power source, steel wires, three butane cigarette lighters as the explosive, and an unidentified pink substance speculated to be lip balm, which was to serve as the detonator," the appellate court wrote.

Hamrick was later convicted of mailing an envelope containing the bomb to William A. Kolibash, the U.S. attorney in West Virginia. Kolibash opened the envelope in his office, realized it contained a homemade bomb and fled. The bomb, which had scorched the packaging in which it was mailed, was disarmed, the court said.

A three-judge panel of the 4th Circuit initially reversed Hamrick's conviction for the attempt to kill Kolibash, but the full court overturned that ruling and reinstated the conviction in a 1995 decision.

Pat Connor, the 4th Circuit Court clerk, praised the quick action security officials took when the bomb Hamrick is now accused of sending was received. "The response was one that would make those receiving the package feel safe," she said.

Going Too Far (WP)

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

CREATING BETTER conditions for the reentry and rehabilitation of offenders is a worthy goal, and not just for the men and women released from prison. The community's interest is served if ex-offenders build crime-free lives. But two measures being considered by the D.C. Council to help offenders, no matter how well-intentioned, are cause for serious concern and, if approved, would undermine public safety.

Most problematic is an effort by council member Marion Barry (D-Ward 8) to amend the city's Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination in employment or housing based upon an arrest or conviction record. The bill adds a criminal record to such cherished protections as those for race, religion, sex and age. Here's what it could mean: A couple with small children couldn't refuse to rent the apartment in their duplex to a convicted sex offender; a bank couldn't disqualify a job seeker who served time for embezzlement as long as it didn't happen in the previous 10 years. Those simply using good judgment could be sued for punitive damages. No one is against giving people a second chance, but this bill goes too far.

The other measure would greatly expand the conditions for expungement, or sealing, of criminal records. (In full disclosure, The Washington Post testified against the measure in committee because the newspaper values access to complete and accurate criminal records.) The legislation builds on the thoughtful work of the Council for Court Excellence, which makes a compelling argument that there are instances (such as actual innocence) in which it is only right that a person not be burdened with the life-long stigma of a criminal record. The District lags behind a majority of states, including Virginia and Maryland, in allowing individuals to clear their records when appropriate. Yet again this proposal -- which would permit expungement of arrest records and even of certain conviction records -- goes too far. As Patricia A. Riley, special counsel to the U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia, testified, it "tips the scales too far against the public interest and public safety."

More should be done to help the 2,000 offenders returning to the city each year. Mr. Barry's idea to establish a city commission to coordinate and monitor services for ex-offenders has the potential to do good. By contrast, the other measures pose too great a risk.

CIVIL LAW:

Abramoff Opts For Self-Defense In Latest Suits (LAW)

By Anna Palmer

Law.com, December 19, 2006

After paying for a high-priced criminal defense by Chadbourne & Parke's Abbe Lowell in the government's corruption probe, former uber-lobbyist-turned-jailbird Jack Abramoff is taking a different approach in two lawsuits filed against him by Indian tribes.

This time around, Abramoff is representing himself against former client Louisiana Coushatta Tribe and the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas.

So far, Abramoff has piggybacked on motions filed by lawyers for former Christian Coalition head Ralph Reed and former Abramoff associate Michael Scanlon in the Texas case. Lowell did not return calls.

Abramoff may be using the law library from the minimum-security federal prison in Cumberland, Md., where he is serving almost six years for a fraud conviction separate from the corruption probe.

It's extremely rare for prisoners to defend themselves pro se, according to the American Civil Liberties Union's National Prisoner Project. The logistics could get tricky with Abramoff unable to travel for depositions. But the tactic could get him out of prison chores like kitchen duty or carpentry while he is doing legal research.

"It's Jack Abramoff. What else can you say? The guy believes in himself," says Barbara Van Gelder of Wiley Rein & Fielding, who represented David Safavian, the former White House official convicted in June in connection with Abramoff.

A Creative Flair Rising In Lawsuit Settlements (LAW)

By Peter Geier, The National Law Journal

Law.com, December 19, 2006

In March 2005, Eva Rowe's parents, James and Linda, were killed in a BP refinery explosion in Texas City, Texas -- a disaster that killed 13 others and injured 170.

She sued the company on behalf of herself and the estates of her parents. Last month, her attorney struck a settlement that has a rare twist: More than $32 million is not going to Rowe.

BP Products North America Inc. pledged $32 million to five medical and educational institutions. The deal also includes as much as $6 million in additional matching funds. Arenazas v. BP Products North America, No. 05- CV-0337 (Galveston Co., Texas, Dist. Ct.). Rowe received a confidential settlement.

Civil actions ending in creative settlements that do more than put money into the pockets of plaintiffs and their lawyers are unusual, but attorneys are starting to see more of them.

In October, for instance, an accidentally paralyzed plaintiff, his family and lawyers in Tampa, Fla., pledged all of a medical malpractice jury's $100.1 million punitive damages award -- part of the largest med-mal verdict in state history -- to the Miami Project to Cure Paralysis at the University of Miami Leonard M. Miller School of Medicine. Navarro v. Austin, No. 02-6154 (Hillsborough Co., Fla., Cir. Ct.).

Lawyers involved in settling cases that result in charitable donations acknowledge that parties in some instances gain in improved public relations and financial benefits such as tax breaks. They also note that the prospect of a defendant's gaining any such advantage can discourage plaintiffs from charitable settlements.

Typically, a plaintiff is trying to find an acceptable resolution of a traumatic event, according to René M. Haas of Perry & Haas, a boutique practice in Corpus Christi, Texas, which, she said, now handle four to 10 cases a year involving people killed or maimed in industrial accidents.

"Most of the time, what we end up working with is a client who really wants something good to come out of a bad situation," said Haas, who is also a former Texas district judge.

One of Haas' clients, a widow who lost her husband in an oil refinery accident, set aside $1 million of her confidential settlement -- and counsel set aside its fee on that portion -- to help fund a plant safety academic program and a scholarship at Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi, she said. Wright v. Citgo Petroleum Corp., No. 99-4396-C (Nueces Co., Texas, Dist. Ct. 2002).

In another case -- a post-trial settlement in which a refinery worker who was permanently disabled by a blast won a $30 million punitive damages award against an oil company -- the client agreed to forgo the punitive damages award if the company instituted a new safety program, Haas said. The program will be paid for by the company but monitored independently to ensure compliance. Caballero v. Esenjay Petroleum Corp., No. 95-6629-A (Nueces Co., Texas, Dist. Ct. 1997).

PUNITIVE DAMAGES PLEDGED

The $100.1 million donation in the Tampa medical malpractice case in October came at the end of a trial in which a jury had already returned a $116.7 million compensatory damages award in favor of Allan Navarro, whose misdiagnosed stroke resulted in his paralysis.

C. Steve Yerrid of the Yerrid Law Firm in Tampa, one of Navarro's lawyers, said that Navarro decided before the jury returned its punitive damages verdict to give the full amount of whatever the jury awarded to an institution that serves people with neurological and spinal cord injuries.

Jeffrey M. Goodis of Thompson, Goodis, Thompson, Groseclose & Richardson in St. Petersburg, Fla., a lawyer for the defendants, declined to discuss a case pending appeal. But he pointed out that in pledging the punitive damages award, the plaintiffs are "donating something they don't have."

Goodis said that an extra motivation for plaintiffs to agree to these creative settlements is that they must pay full taxes on punitive damages, as must the attorney on his or her 25 percent to 40 percent contingency fee.

Yerrid said that in questioning a grievously injured plaintiff's motives, the defense "deals in an area of thought that I cannot even begin to engage in." He said the judge in the Navarro case has already denied all of the defense's post-trial motions. The defendants' last chance is the state appeals court.

"We have a judgment I think that's pretty valid, though of course there's always the problem of collecting a judgment," Yerrid said.

In another case Yerrid handled, the family of a man who died when surgeons operating on a cancerous kidney accidentally cut his aorta and vena cava agreed that, in addition to a confidential cash settlement, the hospital would fund a pair of $5,000 nursing scholarships for minority candidates for 20 years. Greenway v. St. Joseph's Hospital, No. 03-11667G (Hillsborough Co., Fla., Cir. Ct.).

Roland J. Lamb of Morgan, Lamb, Goldman & Valles in Tampa, who represented the hospital in the Greenway case, confirmed that the scholarships were part of the settlement but declined to comment on it.

Dan D. Kohane, president of the Tampa-based Federation of Defense & Corporate Counsel and a partner at Buffalo, N.Y.'s Hurwitz & Fine, said that he is seeing more of these kinds of settlements, especially in lower-profile cases.

Insurance companies and self-insured defendants would rather contribute to a public good than pay money to an individual.

But the public seldom hears about the contributions because defendants do not want their payments to appear to be admissions of liability, which they are not, Kohane said.

"Sometimes you can find a creative solution or a remedy that is not just money in someone's pocket," Kohane said. "It can be any kind of thing: an apology or a change of character, a scholarship, a park, putting up a statue, a drunk driving program," he said.

The outcome of the BP case had a lot to do with the client, said attorney Brent W. Coon of Brent Coon & Associates in Beaumont, Texas, who represented Eva Rowe.

"The client in this case was the difference -- some clients just want to take the money offered and put the case behind them," said Coon, adding that he has made "small charitable deals in other cases, but nothing anywhere near the magnitude of this."

MORE CASES SCHEDULED

Ronnie Chappell, a spokesman for BP America, would say only that the company "is deeply sorry for the loss that Ms. Rowe and others suffered from this terrible industrial accident." He added that BP is working to ensure that it does not happen again, and is committed to avoiding long and protracted litigation and to resolving all claims in a fair way.

The case settled last month as jury selection was beginning in what would have been the first group of cases to be tried. Coon noted that he has settled less than a third of the total of 150 to 175 BP refinery explosion cases that he has. His next trial group of five cases is set for trial in February 2007.

The amount BP paid in fees to Rowe and Coon is confidential.

The company will donate $12.5 million to the Truman G. Blocker Burn Unit at University of Texas Medical Branch at Galveston; $12.5 million to the Mary Kay O'Connor Process Safety Center at Texas A&M University; and $5 million to the College of the Mainland in Texas City for safety and process technology training for refinery and chemical plant workers, all in memory of the 15 people who died.

The company also has pledged a potential $6 million in matching funds for donations to each of these institutions made in the six months following the settlement, up to $2 million per institution.

BP also earmarked $1 million donations to two other institutions that Rowe designated in her parents' memory, according to Coon's office.

DOJ_NMG_0107641

In another element of the settlement, BP has agreed to the release of documents and deposition testimony related to the case, which will be posted on the Web site www.texascityexplosionmedia.com, Coon said.

CASES 'UNDER THE RADAR'

Richard W. Mithoff of the Mithoff Law Firm in Houston said that he does about one settlement a year "for a client who really wants to make a difference in a way besides just trying to recover money."

"I've had clients set up scholarship funds, clients who lost a child in an accident and were awkward about recovering money for a dead child," he said. He also represented a surgeon in a medical malpractice case in which the surgeon was injured.

"Part of the settlement required the hospital to set up a teaching/research fund in [the surgeon's] name. He was in his 60s when he sustained the injury, well respected and not in need of money. He and the hospital had a real interest in a teaching fund and scholarship fund," Mithoff said, declining to identify his cases.

"Medical cases are not headliners. A lot of it's under the radar screen because a lot of cases are settled confidentially, though hospitals are happy to set aside money for scholarships and research funds," he said.

Automating The E-mail Discovery Process Proves Fruitful For Transatlantic Reinsurance Co. (LAW)

By Edward Kelley

Law.com, December 19, 2006

Any attorney or in-house counsel who relies on e-mail for evidence or litigation support knows that e-mail discovery is among the most mind-numbing, inefficient processes that enterprises face. And in today's highly regulated business climate, e-mail messages have become one of the most scrutinized and sought after categories of business records.

Transatlantic Reinsurance Company, Inc. better known as "TRC," is one of the largest publicly traded reinsurers in the industry, and like all other players in that industry, we face increasing oversight over business transactions -- particularly relating to e-mail. As a result, our legal and IT teams are responsible for searching through and reviewing tens of thousands of messages to find pertinent e-mails related to inquiries. These examinations are almost always subject to fairly tight deadlines.

THE PERSISTENCE OF E-MAIL

The challenge with e-mail is that retention policies are difficult to police at best, and e-mail never really goes away.

As a result, companies like TRC have ended up with literally millions of messages stored on multiple servers.

Prior to automating our retrieval and analysis process, our IT team spent between one and three days processing each keyword inquiry.

Depending on the number of "hits" returned, our lawyers then had thousands of e-mails to review for relevance and privilege.

Each time a regulator returned with a new keyword request, an entirely new search had to be initiated. In instances where historical data were needed from tapes or other long-term media, the IT department would inevitably need to add at least another week to the process. Once the search was complete, we had to cull the duplicate hits caused by getting the same e-mail from any number of recipients. As a result, our legal personnel ended up spending days organizing and analyzing the results. In one instance, a review of 11,000 messages generated by a keyword search determined that approximately 50 percent were duplicates and another 40 percent were spam or irrelevant. In the end, less than 10 percent were actually relevant.

This immense workload and the difficulty of coordinating these activities between multiple departments put a constant strain on our legal and IT group. The result was inefficiency for both departments. Like most other companies that experience this same challenge, we spent so much time locating e-mails, we found ourselves short on time when it came to the more important job of analyzing the results. To maintain our competitive edge, we needed to free up our time and streamline the back and forth process between all groups. This would enable us to draw intelligent, accurate conclusions instead of looking at a pile of seemingly random messages. That's when we made the strategic decision to automate our retrieval and analysis process.

INTELLIGENCE MAKES THE DIFFERENCE

By automating our e-mail discovery process with the Clearwell E-Mail Intelligence Platform, we've extended our search capabilities with technology that provides a much deeper level of analysis. This type of intelligence has enabled us to identify, extract and deliver actionable content from our e-mail systems. Now, we have a single view into multiple, globally based e-mail stores (including exchange servers, archives and PSTs), and by streamlining our e-discovery efforts we are able to quickly and accurately retrieve and analyze the results. Our new process took the headache out of e-discovery, and has empowered our legal department to autonomously revise inquiries for specific mail threads, reducing the burden placed upon IT and saving countless hours searching for e-mails. Our department now spends more time and attention analyzing evidence with a level of intelligence previously unavailable with manual searches.

By utilizing a dedicated e-mail analysis product, one of the biggest challenges we've been able to overcome is identifying duplicate messages, which often added unnecessary complexity to the onerous process of responding to e-mail inquiries. When we factored in the number of e-mail communications sent to multiple people (other recipients in the "To", "CC" or "BCC" fields), we ended up with a lot of duplicate e-mails. Using a standard keyword search yielded thousands of unrelated e-mails including many spam and junk e-mail messages. In contrast, our new process automatically eliminates duplicate and irrelevant messages from the results, saving us countless hours of filtering and organizing searches with no redundancy. E-mail intelligence is really the best way to describe our new approach.

The technology we now employ is sophisticated -- using advanced weighting algorithms to help index our e-mail-specific metadata and accurately establish e-mail rank, giving each e-mail a relevancy score. By automatically linking messages together into threads, we can view critical discussions, pinpoint when messages were sent and identify key contributors instantly, visually displaying who knew what and when. Topic analysis made it quick and easy to locate exactly the right message threads without manually reading through thousands of e-mails. Capabilities such as e-mail ranking and discussion threads also have been an enormous help in reducing the headache of e-mail analysis for both our legal and IT teams.

MORE TIME FOR THE REAL ISSUES

By reducing our e-mail review time, as a company we can respond even more rapidly and confidently to regulatory inquiries. This resource has freed up our legal team to respond faster and move on to more strategic work. Additionally, we can now apply our resources to support a greater number of TRC's customer-focused initiatives, like structuring effective reinsurance programs and building solutions that help our clients.

Some of the other benefits we've seen include faster e-mail analysis through relevant search results, discussion threads and de-duplication; reduction in IT and legal dollars spent on e-mail review and analysis; and minimal product training and rapid user adoption from a simple, intuitive user interface. We've been able to accomplish all this without disrupting our e-mail path, without creating a separate information store and without moving mailboxes or installing software on any desktops and servers.

E-mail intelligence makes all the difference when we're responding to inquiries or audits. Search is one important component of our e-mail strategy, but we've also realized that having a way to analyze the findings and generate intuitive results is just as critical (if not more so) to the investigative process.

Edward Kelley is assistant general counsel at Transatlantic Reinsurance Company Inc., where he manages the company's information requests and the e-mail investigatory process. A 21-year veteran of the reinsurance industry, he has been with Transatlantic for the last three years.

That's No Bull: Damages Reduction Leads To Attorney Fee Cut (LAW)

By Mary Alice Robbins, Texas Lawyer

Law.com, December 19, 2006

In a unanimous decision, the Texas Supreme Court has ruled for the first time that two legal principles appellate courts use to limit or overturn damage awards also can be applied to attorney fees.

On Dec. 1, the Supreme Court affirmed the 1st Court of Appeals' decision to significantly reduce the damages awarded in Barker and Barker v. Eckman, a suit involving the distribution of proceeds from the sale of bull semen collected, stored and sold under a bailment agreement. The high court concluded that the Houston appeals court was correct when it held that the statute of limitations barred breaches of the agreement that occurred more than four years before Walter Eckman sued Emzy and Ava Barker.

However, the Supreme Court reversed the 1st Court's affirmation of the attorney fees awarded in Barker and remanded the case to the 151st District Court in Houston for a new trial on the fee issue.

The Supreme Court held that the Barkers are entitled to a meaningful evidentiary review of the jury's finding regarding the attorney fees awarded to Eckman in light of the 1st Court's decision to reduce the damages awarded.

In his analysis finding that the Barkers are entitled to a meaningful evidentiary review of the attorney fees awarded, Supreme Court Justice Phillip Johnson, author of the opinion, cited 1996's Saenz v. Fidelity & Guaranty Insurance Underwriters. The Supreme Court made it clear in Saenz that a court of appeals must conduct a meaningful review to determine whether sufficient evidence supports a jury's award of mental anguish damages.

As Johnson noted in Barker, the 1st Court's review of the jury's finding as to the attorney fees could not provide the Barkers the meaningful factual sufficiency evidentiary review to which they were entitled because the damages amount, or "results obtained," on which the jury based the attorney fee was incorrect. The jury charge listed the results obtained as one of the factors the jurors were to consider in determining a reasonable attorney's fee, according to the opinion.

In Barker, the high court also for the first time applied to attorney fees the "presumptive harm" rule that it annunciated in 2000's Crown Life Insurance Co. v. Casteel and subsequent cases. The court concluded in Barker that an appellate court will presume harm and must reverse the attorney fees awarded unless it can be reasonably certain that the jury's fee award was not significantly affected by the error in the damages award.

Because the statute of limitations had run on most of Eckman's claims, and the correct damages in Barker were one-seventh of the erroneous damages, "we are not reasonably certain that the jury was not significantly affected by the error" when calculating the attorney fees, Johnson wrote in the opinion.

"This is the first time they've applied that kind of logic to attorneys' fees," says J. Brett Busby, the attorney for the Barkers, owners and operators of a Central Texas business that collected, stored and sold semen from Brahman bulls and distributed the proceeds to the bull owners.

Busby, a partner in Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw in Houston, says the ruling shows the Supreme Court may be willing to extend the Casteel presumptive-harm rule to other kinds of cases.

Pete Schenkkan, an attorney for Texans for Lawsuit Reform (TLR), which filed an amicus curiae brief with the Supreme Court, says the opinion shows that in a fee-shifting-statute case such as Barker, one of the most important factors a jury must consider when determining a fee is the results obtained.

According to its amicus brief, TLR exists to advocate sound public policy on civil litigation issues. TLR contended in the brief that Barker presents an important legal issue within the litigation system -- how to ensure that statutory fee-shifting awards are, as required by the Legislature, reasonable.

OBJECTION WAIVED

In the opinion, the Supreme Court sets out the following facts: The Barkers owned Brushy Creek Custom Sires, where they boarded and provided other services for Brahman bulls. Between 1981 and 1995, the Barkers boarded bulls that Walter Eckman co-owned with two other persons. The Barkers collected, stored and sold semen from the bulls and distributed the proceeds to Eckman and his co-owners, according to the interest each owned in the animals or semen.

Eckman became convinced that Brushy Creek had breached its agreement with regard to the sale of the semen, the handling of proceeds from those sales and an accounting to Eckman for his shares of the semen. In an Oct. 25, 1995, letter, Eckman demanded that the Barkers deliver the semen he owned to a different storage facility, compensate Eckman properly for his share of prior sales and repay overcharges for semen storage. The Barkers delivered the semen as requested but did not agree to Eckman's monetary demands.

Eckman sued the Barkers in May 1997 in the 151st District Court, alleging that the Barkers breached their bailment agreement in a number of ways.

As noted in the Supreme Court's opinion, the Barkers contended at the trial in 2000 that Eckman's claims were barred by the four-year statute of limitations.

But the jury found the Barkers failed to comply with the bailment agreement and awarded Eckman $111,983 in damages. The jury also found that Eckman's attorney fees totaled $244,500 for trial preparation and the appellate process.

After the trial court denied their motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict, the Barkers appealed to the 1st Court.

In 2003, the 1st Court ruled that the Barkers had waived their statute of limitations argument. But, acting on the Barkers' motion for rehearing, the appeals court did an about face, holding in 2004 that the bailment agreement between the Barkers and Eckman constituted a contractual relationship and that the statute of limitations barred the claims on all but $16,180 of the damages the jury had awarded.

However, the 1st Court affirmed the jury's findings as to the attorney fees awarded to Eckman. The appeals court held that the Barkers had waived an objection to the award of attorney fees because they failed to object to the jury instruction or submit a question asking the jury to segregate the fees for Eckman's attorney fees according to the various services rendered.

Eckman and the Barkers subsequently filed petitions for review with the Supreme Court. Eckman argued that the 1st Court erred in reducing his damages on the basis of the statute of limitations because the cause of action for all of his damages accrued in October 1995 when he sent the Barkers the demand letter. The Barkers contended that the 1st Court erred when it affirmed the award of attorney fees that was based on the jury's incorrect amount of damages.

LIMITATIONS FIGHT

In his brief to the Supreme Court, Eckman argued that a cause of action for breach of a bailment agreement does not accrue until the person whose property was being held makes a demand upon the person holding the property. Eckman further argued that if there is no demand or an ineffective demand, the statute of limitations does not begin running until the bailor has notice that the bailee's conduct is inconsistent with the bailor's rights.

The Barkers argued in their brief to the high court that the $244,500 in attorney fees that the 1st Court affirmed bore no reasonable relationship to the $16,180 in damages that the appeals court determined Eckman should recover. As the Barkers noted, the record in the case does not provide a factually sufficient explanation of why the nature and circumstances of the case support such a grossly disproportionate award.

The Supreme Court agreed with Eckman that a cause of action for breach of a bailment agreement can accrue when the bailee refuses to comply with the bailor's rightful demand for return or disposition of the bailed property or when the bailee does something clearly inconsistent with the bailor's rights. But that does not preclude accrual of an action at an earlier time if the bailee breaches the agreement at an earlier time, the court held.

"We do not see that bailment contracts differ from contracts in general to the extent that the rule as to when a party has the right to sue for breach of an agreement should be altered for them," Johnson wrote for the court.

The court held that Eckman's claims for the various breaches accrued when each individual breach occurred.

Robert L. Ketchand, Eckman's attorney and a shareholder in Houston's Boyer & Ketchand, says it's significant that the Supreme Court has held that a bailment case should be treated just like any other contract case for purposes of limitations.

"I think that is a major departure from historical rules regarding statute of limitations in bailment cases," Ketchand says.

With regard to the court's decision on the attorney fees, Ketchand says, "The way I read it, we could go back and get more attorney's fees."

Ketchand says he thinks the most significant thing about Barker is the fact that the Supreme Court did not establish a rule for proportionality as urged by TLR.

TLR argued in its brief that when an appellate court substantially reduces compensatory damages, "common sense suggests a presumption of a remittitur proportionately reducing the corresponding fee-shifting award."

Schenkkan, TLR's attorney and a shareholder in Austin's Graves, Dougherty, Hearon & Moody, says that when the 1st Court reduced the actual damages, that required a recalculation of the amount of attorney fees. TLR suggested a presumptive, not automatic, proportionate remittitur as a way to do the recalculation without a remand, Schenkkan says.

The Supreme Court declined to take that approach.

Gov. Wants Death Penalty Procedure Corrected (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, December 19, 2006

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today directed his administration to fix problems with the state's procedure to execute prisoners.

Schwarzenegger acted in response to a stinging decision issued Friday by U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose, who said the state's system "is broken, but ..can be fixed."

"I am committed to doing whatever it takes to ensure that the lethal injection process is constitutional so that the will of the people is followed and the death penalty is maintained in California," Schwarzenegger said in a prepared statement. "My administration will take immediate action to resolve court concerns which have cast legal doubt on California's procedure for carrying out the death penalty."

In his ruling, Fogel, who visited the death chamber in San Quentin and held a four-day hearing in September, said the state's current procedures involving lethal injection violates the Constitution's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Fogel gave state officials 30 days to let him know what they planned to do and he urged the governor to get involved.

Fogel listed a number of problems with how the death penalty is implemented in California, including inconsistent and unreliable screening of execution team members, poorly trained staff, inconsistent and unreliable record keeping of drugs used in the process, improper mixing, preparation and administration of drugs administered by the execution team, overcrowded conditions and poorly designed facilities in which the execution team must work. He also blasted state personnel involved in the process for a "pervasive lack of professionalism."

In a prepared statement released today, Schwarzenegger said his top legal and correctional officials "will lead an effort to implement a screening process and undertake a comprehensive training program for execution team members, create standardized record-keeping, recommend how to improve the death penalty facility and identify the best experts in other states to advise the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation on lethal injection and its implementation."

Schwarzenegger said he had asked his legal affairs legal Andrea Lynn Hoch to work with the Corrections Department to in the next 30 days take the following five steps:

· Establish a screening process for selection of execution team members and periodic review process for team members.

· Establish a comprehensive training program for all members of the execution team so all are familiar with the drugs being used, their preparation and the risks associated with the drugs.

· Develop standardized record-keeping to ensure that there are complete and reliable records of each execution.

DOJ_NMG_0107645

· Recommend how to improve the death penalty facility at San Quentin, which was switched from a gas chamber to a lethal injection chamber, to ensure there is adequate equipment, lighting, and space for the execution team members to perform their functions.

· Identify the best experts in other states to advise the Corrections Department on the lethal injection protocol and its implementation.

Judge Fogel's ruling was in response to a lawsuit filed earlier this year by condemned inmate Michael Morales, who has been on death row for more than 20 years after he was convicted of murdering Lodi teenager Terri Winchell.

ANTITRUST:

FCC Official Declines To Vote On AT& T Deal (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

Federal Communications Commissioner Robert M. McDowell announced yesterday that he would disqualify himself from voting on AT&T's proposed purchase of BellSouth on ethical grounds, depriving the FCC of a potential swing vote that could have broken the stalemate among its Democratic and Republican members.

McDowell, saying he felt compelled to silence speculation over whether he would take part in the vote, accused his colleagues of failing to negotiate in good faith over conditions for approving the $86 billion merger proposed seven months ago.

"It appears that the lingering question of my involvement is being used as another excuse for delay and inaction," he told reporters.

McDowell has said for months that he would not vote because he previously worked as senior vice president for Comptel, an association that lobbied on behalf of companies competing with AT&T and BellSouth. But despite his concern about a possible conflict of interest, the FCC's general counsel, Samuel Feder, ruled this month that McDowell could take part because of an overriding government interest in breaking the deadlock.

McDowell rejected that reasoning and criticized Feder's opinion, saying it overlooked important facts and legal considerations. In particular, he said the opinion did not address the ethics agreement reached during his Senate confirmation process this year in which he pledged not to participate for a year in any matter in which Comptel had been involved.

"While I expected the legal equivalent of body armor, I was handed Swiss cheese," McDowell said.

FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, who asked Feder to issue the opinion, has been urging McDowell to take part in the considerations. Late yesterday, Martin said his aim had been to make sure the commission considered the merger in a timely fashion.

"With Commissioner McDowell having made his decision, I will continue to try to work with my colleagues to bring our consideration of this merger to conclusion," Martin said in a statement.

He also said he respected McDowell's decision to abstain. Though both men are Republicans, their relations have been strained since McDowell joined the FCC.

Martin has been an advocate of approving the merger without conditions. But the two Democratic members have insisted that the deal, which would create a telecommunications giant, include safeguards to ensure competition and protect consumers.

The FCC has repeatedly postponed acting because of the stalemate, and no vote is scheduled.

Amid Twists At FCC Review, AT&T Hurdles Loom (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- AT&T Inc.'s $86 billion bid to buy BellSouth Corp. could face a variety of unwanted conditions after a Federal Communications Commission member said he won't vote on the deal because of ethical concerns.

The decision yesterday by Robert McDowell, a telecommunications lawyer, to abstain from voting was an unwelcome development for the companies, which had been counting on the Republican to break the impasse that has paralyzed the agency's review of the deal.

The FCC's review had broken down during the past few weeks amid partisan bickering, with the two Democrats on the five-member commission pushing for certain conditions and the two remaining Republicans opposing them. Mr. McDowell's decision to step aside increases the likelihood that AT&T will be forced to accept some conditions involving "net neutrality," or the idea that all Internet traffic should be treated equally. However, it also sweeps away uncertainty about who will vote, which has slowed negotiations on merger conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0107646

Mr. McDowell has expressed concern about whether he could vote since the merger was announced in March, shortly after he was nominated for the FCC job. Mr. McDowell previously lobbied on behalf of CompTel, a trade group that represents smaller phone companies and has energetically opposed the deal. Mr. McDowell must abstain from voting on matters that involve the group for a year.

Even without Mr. McDowell's vote, there is little question the FCC will approve the deal. But his abstention will change what conditions might be imposed.

The FCC's two Democrats are demanding that AT&T abide by net-neutrality conditions, which would require the company to treat all Internet traffic equally. The FCC's two Republican members, notably Chairman Kevin Martin, agree with AT&T that such a condition would hinder its ability to manage its network and roll out new services for consumers. Mr. McDowell had publicly sided with his Republican colleagues on the net-neutrality issue, which is one reason he was being pressed to vote on the deal.

Democrats want nondiscrimination rules to apply on AT&T's lines all the way to the company's Internet backbone. AT&T has so far been willing to agree to apply those rules to portions of the network, but not all of it.

Another potential merger condition will center on the pricing of wholesale high-volume data lines used by corporate customers. Wireless phone companies and corporate customers have complained that consolidation of those high-volume lines will lead to significantly higher prices. Similar concerns were raised during the merger of SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.'s acquisition of MCI Corp. In those mergers, the Justice Department required limited divestitures in some cities, and the FCC required limited price caps for those lines.

The Justice Department approved the AT&T-BellSouth transaction in October without any conditions.

Mr. McDowell's decision ended a week of drama and hand-wringing about whether he should vote. The angst began about 10 days ago, when the FCC's general counsel, in a memo, gave legal justification for Mr. McDowell's participation. It didn't make as strong a case as many thought it would. Instead, it detailed concerns by the head of the Office of Government Ethics, who suggested Mr. McDowell shouldn't vote.

"While I expected the legal equivalent of body armor, I was handed Swiss cheese," Mr. McDowell said yesterday. The Virginia Bar Association, of which Mr. McDowell is a member, also cautioned him on voting on the deal. "They did not encourage me to go forward," he said.

For a week, Mr. McDowell remained quiet about his intentions, while privately pressing his colleagues to jump-start the merger talks in hopes of their reaching a deal. Those efforts proved fruitless, however, and Mr. McDowell decided to step aside now, an FCC official said, rather than get involved in the merger talks and either vote or abstain at the last minute.

Congressional Democrats immediately applauded Mr. McDowell's decision. Democratic FCC Commissioner Michael Copps said it provided clarity that "should give some juice to our ongoing discussions."

Washington politicians' recent debate about propriety and ethics -- which helped Democrats retake Congress -- appears to have played a role in Mr. McDowell's decision. Mr. McDowell's concerns about protecting his integrity -- and avoiding becoming a punching bag for Democrats on Capitol Hill for the next two years -- appear to have won out over merger proponents who wanted the deal approved with minimal conditions.

One reason for the FCC's delay in approving the merger has been the continued uncertainty about whether Mr. McDowell would participate. FCC board members negotiated but never came close to cutting a deal while Mr. McDowell's involvement remained an option. Negotiations ended about two weeks ago, FCC sources say, when Mr. Martin suggested that he was only willing to go so far on the net-neutrality issue.

"The chairman has continued to be committed to working with his colleagues and acting on the merger. But the sticking points are still very sticky," said an FCC official close to the negotiations. "We're not sure how quickly this merger can be approved."

In a statement, AT&T said it would continue to work with the FCC to get the deal approved. "We will -- as we have always done -- do our part to bring the merger review to a bipartisan completion as quickly as possible," said an AT&T spokesman.

FCC Member Officially Bows Out Of Voting On AT& T Deal (USAT)

By Leslie Cauley

USA Today, December 19, 2006

NEW YORK — Robert McDowell, the third Republican on the Federal Communications Commission's five-member panel, said Monday that he will not vote on AT&T's $80 billion purchase of BellSouth.

His decision leaves intact a deadlock between the two Democrats who want to impose several conditions on the deal, and the other two Republicans, including Chairman Kevin Martin, who favor no conditions.

McDowell, who joined the FCC in June, initially abstained from participating in the AT&T-BellSouth case because he used to lobby for CompTel, a trade group that represents small carriers that oppose the deal.

He also cited ethical concerns of the Virginia Bar Association.

Earlier this month FCC general counsel Sam Feder said that McDowell could vote on the deal.

McDowell said he had hoped Feder's recommendation would provide him with the "legal equivalent of body armor." Instead, he said, "I was handed Swiss cheese."

After conferring with several advisers, including the executive branch's Office of Government Ethics, McDowell decided to "follow my own personal sense of ethics" and "disqualify myself from this matter."

Referring to the crush of ethics scandals that have consumed headlines over the past year, McDowell said Americans often "have been disappointed by those who hold public office. I hope this is one instance where they are not disappointed."

Martin said in a statement that he appreciated McDowell's "thoughtful consideration," adding that he would "respect his decision to abstain." The FCC cannot compel a commissioner to vote.

The BellSouth deal just needs the FCC's approval to close. It already has been approved by the Department of Justice, which imposed no conditions.

The two Democrats, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, are pushing for conditions in two areas.

They want "net neutrality," which is the idea of making sure high-speed broadband lines are available on fair terms for all comers.

The second area is "special access." They want AT&T to reduce the rates it charges rivals to lease the large-capacity data lines that are a staple in business.

AT&T has so far refused to agree to any conditions that might limit its ability to manage its new high-speed broadband network, which is costing the carrier billions to construct. It is also reluctant to agree to conditions that might curb profitability in the special-access segment.

Yet with McDowell out of the picture, AT&T will be forced to work out a deal with the Democrats.

"This is a setback for AT&T," says Gene Kimmelman, public policy director of Consumers Union, which opposes the deal.

AT&T "clearly expected that they were going to get a vote from McDowell that rubber-stamped the deal," he says. "It was a miscalculation."

Stifel Nicolaus analyst Blair Levin agrees.

On the day the Justice Department approved the merger with no conditions, "You could practically hear the champagne corks popping" at AT&T, Levin recalled.

The lesson? "As Yogi Berra used to say, it ain't over till the fat lady sings."

On a positive note, Levin says negotiations between AT&T and the FCC should kick into high gear now that the McDowell question has been settled.

"It's sort of like the NBA," he says. "Nobody really plays hard until the fourth quarter."

AT&T closed at $35.47, down 19 cents, while BellSouth fell 72 cents to $45.33.

Virtuous Neutrality (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 19, 2006

What an FCC commissioner's recusal means for AT&T and BellSouth -- and millions of Internet users.

IT'S UNCLEAR WHETHER he acted out of principle or obligation, but Robert M. McDowell made the right choice Monday. McDowell, a Republican appointed earlier this year to the Federal Communications Commission by President Bush, recused himself from the FCC's decision on whether to approve AT&T's proposed acquisition of BellSouth.

His decision leaves the FCC deadlocked, with the two other Republicans resisting demands by the commission's two Democrats for more restrictions on the merged company. But that may be just as well, at least for consumers, if it leads the commission to compromise on the one issue that could most affect Internet users: something called "Net neutrality."

Democrats Michael J. Copps and Jonathan S. Adelstein want to bar AT&T's high-speed Internet service from offering special treatment to data from websites or online services that pay extra for it. AT&T and other broadband suppliers have resisted the Net neutrality requirement, while Google, Amazon and other Web-based companies have lobbied hard for it.

McDowell used to be a lobbyist for a trade group that opposes the merger. The FCC's general counsel recently cleared him to vote despite the apparent conflict, but McDowell opted Monday to stay out. His move increases the chances that his old employer will prevail — that AT&T and BellSouth will be forced to accept numerous restrictions or abandon the deal. At the same time, McDowell has publicly called for fewer regulations and has questioned the need for Net neutrality rules. No matter. At least McDowell got to act principled — in announcing his decision, he used the words "ethics" or "ethical" 33 times in five pages.

The Justice Department has already signed off on the merger, but AT&T can't complete the purchase without the assent of the FCC. That means Copps and Adelstein, who are more skeptical about the deal's benefits for the public, have an unusual amount of leverage as long as McDowell stays out of the picture.

And that's a good thing, at least as far as Net neutrality is concerned. This merger is less troubling than it would have been a decade ago, with Internet service providers, cable TV and wireless companies all offering alternatives to the local phone companies' copper lines. There is far less competition, however, in high-speed Internet service. In many parts of the country, consumers may have only one or no alternative to the DSL service to be offered by AT&T/BellSouth.

That's why the merger should not be approved unless there is a guarantee that AT&T will offer a level playing field to websites and online services, at least until their customers have more choices for high-speed Internet connections.

Benefit Firm Attempts To Outbid CVS For Caremark (WP)

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, December 19, 2006

Pharmacy-benefit manager Express Scripts yesterday attempted to outbid retail pharmacy giant CVS for Caremark Rx with an offer of $26 billion in cash and stock, joining a flurry of year-end mergers and acquisitions.

The proposal stunned many investors and marked the first shot in what could become a protracted battle over who gets to be the nation's leading filler of drug prescriptions.

In other deals announced yesterday, several private-equity firms said they planned to acquire a variety of companies, including the parent of both Century 21 and Coldwell Banker, as well as Harrah's casinos and a maker of hip and knee replacements, continuing a record year for private-equity buyouts.

Caremark and CVS last month agreed to what was characterized as a merger of equals, with CVS offering Caremark shareholders $22.5 million in stock. The combination of Caremark, the nation's second-largest pharmacy-benefit manager, and CVS, the second-largest pharmacy retailer, would create the biggest private-sector buyer of prescription drugs, responsible for managing more than 1 billion prescriptions a year.

Pharmacy-benefit managers are hired by employers to negotiate lower prices from drugmakers and to determine what employees are required to pay. Some companies, such as Caremark, also compete with retail pharmacies by buying and distributing drugs through the mail.

Caremark and CVS have said the size of the new company would give it better leverage with drug companies to demand lower prices, which would ultimately be passed onto consumers.

Express Scripts chief executive George Paz made similar predictions yesterday about a merger between his company and Caremark, even though Express Scripts is half the size of Caremark.

"Buying the company and putting this together allows us the opportunity to take advantage of the additional scale and size and to become bigger and stronger," he said.

Unlike CVS, Express Scripts is offering Caremark shareholders cash and a 15 percent premium based on the closing price of Caremark's shares last Friday. Express Scripts would have to borrow about $13 billion to pull off the deal, analysts estimated, and has lined up financing commitments from Citigroup Corporate and Investment Banking and Credit Suisse.

Caremark, based in Nashville, said its board would review Express Scripts' offer. Express Scripts said if rebuffed by Caremark's board, it would take its case directly to shareholders.

Shareholders have filed several lawsuits against Caremark, challenging the proposed merger with CVS and alleging the deal was designed to advance the interests of directors and insiders.

Some analysts yesterday predicted CVS would make a counteroffer. But the Woonsocket, R.I., company said in a statement that it had not yet reviewed Express Scripts' offer.

Express Scripts' play for Caremark came alongside a frenzy of acquisitions.

Apollo Management agreed to buy Realogy, the parent of Century 21 and Coldwell Banker, for $9 billion, Realogy said yesterday. Apollo plans to take on about $1.6 billion in debt and $750 million in other liabilities.

Apollo and another private-equity firm, Texas Pacific Group, were also reportedly close to buying Harrah's Entertainment yesterday for an estimated $16.7 billion.

The two deals highlighted the growing role of private-equity firms in the current buyout boom.

Buoyed by low interest rates, more access to financing and investors seeking bigger returns, several funds have raised more than $10 billion, topped by Blackstone, which raised $20 billion. Firms have also pooled money, allowing them to go after large public companies and take them private.

The result has been deals on a scale not seen since the heyday of leveraged buyouts in the late 1980s, said Colin Blaydon, director of the Center for Private Equity and Entrepreneurship at Dartmouth's Tuck School of Business. "Basically this year has been a record-setter for capital raised by private-equity funds and capital invested by private-equity funds," Blaydon said.

Blackstone, for example, partnered with Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Goldman Sachs Capital Partners to buy Biomet, a Warsaw, Ind.-based maker of hip and knee replacement products, for about $10.9 billion. In the deal announced yesterday, the firms plan to use a combination of their own cash and money borrowed from Goldman Sachs Group and Bank of America.

The pace of deal-making is likely to proceed into next year, Blaydon said.

"Right now, the economy is sufficiently strong and the debt market sufficiently robust that it will keep on going," he said.

Express Scripts' Bid For Caremark Could Trigger Fight (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, December 19, 2006

Express Scripts' unsolicited $26 billion bid for rival Caremark may force a bidding war for the pharmacy benefits manager.

While investors may think the Express Scripts cash-and-stock offer is more attractive than the $21 billion CVS all-stock deal, management at Caremark and CVS may be convinced that theirs is the better long-term move, says Merrill Lynch analyst Tom Gallucci in a research note to investors.

"We would anticipate that this deal will not go away without a fight," Gallucci wrote.

Analyst Robert Willoughby at Bank of America wrote in his note Monday about the Express Scripts bid that Caremark's board will be "hard-pressed to credibly thwart such an offer."

CVS, which said in a statement that it has not had a chance to review Express Script's offer, now has to decide if it wants to counteroffer.

Express Scripts CEO George Paz, in a letter to Caremark, says that his company's offer is the superior one and that the firm is willing to go directly to shareholders. "We are prepared to solicit proxies against approval of your proposed merger with CVS," he wrote.

If the bid is successful, Express Scripts, the third-largest pharmacy manager behind Caremark and Medco, would leap to first place. The combined company would control about 26% of all prescriptions filled, based on adjusted figures for 2006, says Willoughby's report. Medco would have about 16%.

The bid comes amid increasing pressure on the drug industry from government and employers to rein in drug costs. Adding to the pressure: recent moves by Wal-Mart and other big-box retailers to cut the cost of some generic drugs to as little as $4 a prescription.

Pharmacy benefit companies negotiate drug prices with drugmakers, wholesalers and pharmacies, passing some savings along to their insurer and employer clients. They sometimes also help draw up lists of drugs available to insured patients.

Express Scripts says the deal would result in cost savings of up to $500 million. Paz pointed to the company's effort to encourage the use of generic drugs as one way to reduce costs.

He says the firm saved clients $100 million this year by taking cholesterol treatment Lipitor off of its list of covered drugs, encouraging patients to take alternative Zocor instead, then switching them to generic Zocor when that came on the market.

The company may have to make the cost-savings case to antitrust regulators, because its proposed deal would reduce the number of big benefits managers from three to two.

"It's going to get close review," predicts Andrew Klevorn, a partner who specializes in antitrust law for Eimer Stahl law firm in Chicago. "When markets become more concentrated, that can lead to higher prices."

Express Scripts shares rose 1.9% Monday to $69.97, while Caremark's rose 10.5% to $55.58. CVS fell 1.7% to $30.01.

CVS Isn't Yet Out Of The Running In Race For Caremark (DOW)

By James Covert

Dow Jones Newswires, December 18, 2006

NEW YORK (Dow Jones)--CVS Corp. (CVS) isn't yet out of the running as a potential suitor for the pharmacy-benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc. (CMX).

Express Scripts Inc. (ESRX), a St. Louis-based pharmacy benefits manager, offered Monday to acquire its rival Caremark Rx for $26 billion in cash and stock. Express Scripts said its offer represents a 15% premium over retail pharmacy giant CVS's all-stock offer.

Nevertheless, analysts say CVS, of Woonsocket, R.I., could sweeten its bid, which had been perceived as low by Wall Street. In addition to its healthy balance sheet, CVS, in acquiring Nashville-based Caremark, could use the target company's strong cash flow to pay down debt it might take on to fund a bigger price tag. Analysts add that a deal with CVS would likely be more attractive to regulators, as an Express Scripts deal risks greater antitrust concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0107650

"We do not regard this as a deal breaker for CVS' proposed merger of equals with Caremark," Goldman Sachs analyst John Heinbockel wrote in a Monday research note. Heinbockel noted that CVS could "modestly sweeten its offer" to as much as $25 billion by switching a portion of its all-stock offer to cash, and could do so without "meaningfully" reducing benefit that CVS expects the acquisition would add to its 2008 earnings.

"Caremark shareholders may prefer a combination with CVS, at a somewhat lower price, if they view the deal as truly transformative," Heinbockel says.

In a Monday conference call with analysts, Express Scripts executives said they had discussed the idea of buying Caremark with officials at the Federal Trade Commission, and that the company is confident it can overcome regulatory hurdles. In a Monday research note, Merrill Lynch & Co. added that a tie-up between Express Scripts and Caremark is "arguably more straightforward" than a deal with a retailer.

Yet a CVS deal still stands to be viewed more favorably by big drug customers, including the government and the drug-benefits programs it runs, according to Scott Mushkin, an analyst at Bank of America Securities in New York. That's because a CVS deal would eliminate a significant amount of channel conflicts between retailers and pharmacy-benefits managers, "driving down costs significantly," Mushkin says. That would contrast favorably to the "horizontal domination" that would likely result in a merger between Express Scripts and Caremark, he adds.

Indeed, an acquisition by Express Scripts would create a giant with a 40% share of the market in pharmacy-benefits management, according to John W. Ransom, an analyst at Raymond James & Associates. Meanwhile, Ransom says the strategic benefits are greater in a CVS deal. While Express Scripts would benefit from added scale and market share, CVS could use its increased scale to wring lower prices from suppliers, and enhance its range of offerings to consumers. CVS also would gain a better cushion against legislative cuts in average wholesale prices for drugs, Ransom says.

Another point in CVS's favor: the $600 million breakup fee it has secured in its agreement with Caremark. With or without the acquisition of Caremark, CVS is poised to benefit from increased drug sales at it continues to add prescription customers from the Medicare Part D drug-benefits program and elsewhere, Ransom says.

However, if CVS elects to sweeten its bid, the result wouldn't be good for CVS's debt profile, Gimme Credit said in a Monday research note. The company has been slow repaying debt from its acquisition of the Eckerd drugstore chain, and recently spent more than $4 billion to buy the drugstore operations of Albertson's Inc., which Gimme Credit called "mediocre performers."

"We can't fault the long-term strategy but clearly management is willing to sacrifice credit quality in the interim," Gimme Credit said.

None of the above-mentioned analysts reported conflicts related to CVS, Caremark or Express Scripts. But investors should assume their firms are pursuing investment-banking relationships with the companies.

"We have not yet had an opportunity to review this offer carefully," CVS said in a written statement Monday in response to the Express Scripts offer. "However, we note that we have a definitive agreement with Caremark... We believe the prospects for completing that transaction are excellent and we remain confident in the long-term strategic value of our combination as well as the benefit to shareholders of CVS and Caremark."

Caremark shares surged 11.6% on the news, recently trading at $56.12, up $5.82 from Friday's close. Shares of Express Scripts were up 57 cents, or 0.8%, early Monday afternoon at $69.23. CVS shares fell 27 cents, or 0.9%, to $30.25.

Biomet Agrees To Buyout, Reports Option-Dating Problems (NYT)

By Barnaby J. Feder

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

Biomet, a major manufacturer of artificial hips and knees, said today that it had agreed to be acquired by a private investment consortium for $10.9 billion.

The buyout bid came from affiliates of the Blackstone Group, Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and TPG.

Biomet said in a news release that the private investment group is also expected to include Dane A. Miller, one of the founders of Biomet, who served as its chief executive until he resigned last April over disagreements with the company's board of directors.

The company also announced today that a board committee's review of the company's options-dating practices back to 1996 had uncovered numerous cases of option grants backdated to create immediate profits for the recipients, as well as shortcomings in the company's records.

Biomet, a 29-year-old company based in Warsaw, Ind., said that it had notified the Chicago office of the Securities and Exchange Commission about the options findings, and that it would not announce earnings for its second fiscal quarter as scheduled on Wednesday. It declined to predict how long it would take to sort out its books and report the figures.

The company said that senior executives, whom it did not name, had been aware of the backdating, "though they may not have been aware of the accounting and legal ramifications of this practice."

While the accounting irregularities have prevented a final tally of profits for the quarter, Biomet did say that sales were $520.3 million, a 5 percent increase over the comparable period a year earlier. That fell short of Wall Street's average forecast of $527 million.

The buyout bid works out to $44 a share, slightly less than the highest prices that have been bandied about in recent speculation suggesting that Biomet would merge with Smith & Nephew, a British orthopedics company. Smith & Nephew, which confirmed in November that the two companies were in talks, said today that those discussions had ended.

Biomet and the investor group said that the buyout could be completed by next October. In Nasdaq trading today, Biomet's shares fell 41 cents, or 1 percent, to close at $41.59, reflecting a belief that no competing bids are likely to emerge and that investors will have a relatively long wait before receiving their proceeds from the buyout, which represents a 4.8 percent premium on Friday's closing price of $42.

"You are talking about a very small return for a 10-month wait," said Raj Denhoy, who follows the orthopedics sector for Piper Jaffray & Company.

Smith & Nephew's shares, by contrast, surged on the news. Its American depository receipts gained $3.43, or 7.3 percent, to close at $50.58 on the New York Stock Exchange. Many investors in the company had been afraid that the British company would overpay for Biomet.

Smith & Nephew's rise may also be fueled by speculation that private equity investors might now buy that company, too, and perhaps combine them.

"This isn't a lot of money for this investment group," Robin Young, an orthopedics industry consultant and market researcher who publishes the Orthopedics This Week newsletter, said of the Biomet buyout. "They could turn right around and go after Smith & Nephew."

Even so, there has been no indication so far that the British company is for sale. Biomet, on the other hand, said publicly in April that it was considering all its strategic options and had hired Morgan Stanley to advise it; that was when Mr. Miller stepped down from his executive post. Daniel P. Hann, who was the company's general counsel, has served as interim president and chief executive since then, while Mr. Miller has served as a consultant to the company.

Many analysts had suggested that a combination of Biomet and Smith & Nephew made sense, because it would be roughly the same size in orthopedics as the three largest players — Zimmer Holdings, Stryker, and the DePuy division of Johnson & Johnson.

Biomet Agrees To Be Acquired For $10.9 Billion (WSJ)

By Susan Carey And Jonathan Vuocolo

The Wall Street Journal, December 19, 2006

Orthopedic-devices maker Biomet Inc. agreed to be acquired by a private-equity group for $10.9 billion, but investors failed to lift its shares to the asking price after the company disclosed problems with backdating stock options that could affect its financial results for the past decade.

The Warsaw, Ind., company said that if its shareholders agree to the deal, they will receive $44 a common share from a private-equity group that includes affiliates of Blackstone Group, Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Texas Pacific Group.

The price represents a 27% premium to the stock's closing price in early April, a few days before Biomet said it had hired Morgan Stanley to help it look at strategic alternatives. That move came a week after the resignation of Dane Miller, Biomet's co-founder and its chief executive officer for 29 years. Mr. Miller is expected to be an investor in the new private company once the deal closes in October 2007.

With a market capitalization of about $10.2 billion and the fourth-largest share of hip- and knee-replacement devices by revenue world-wide, Biomet looked like a good candidate for another medical firm. It even held preliminary merger talks with United Kingdom competitor Smith & Nephew PLC, a fact Smith & Nephew disclosed in early November.

Private-Equity Advantage

But these days, private-equity firms, armed with low-cost capital and increasingly on the prowl for acquisitions, can often outbid potential strategic buyers.

DEALS MONDAY!

Deals valued at tens of billions of dollars were unveiled Monday. · Express Scripts Offers $26 Billion for Caremark Rx1

· Icos Accepts Lilly's Sweetened $2.3 Billion Offer2

· Private-Equity Firms Invest $3.4 Billion in Delphi3

· Apollo, Texas Pacific Set to Win Harrah's4

· Statoil, Norsk Hydro to Merge Oil, Gas Operations5

That is in contrast to the conventional wisdom of previous cycles when strategic buyers would pay more because there were more synergies and opportunities to cut costs. Also, most companies aren't comfortable with the levels of debt that private-equity firms put on their target companies. And the giant investment firms don't always face potential antitrust hurdles.

The Biomet deal is one of a flurry of deals this month. Even before December's frenetic activity, buyouts have risen 60% this year, according to data from J.P. Morgan Securities. And there is little indication that the credit markets have lost their enthusiasm for financing private-equity firms as investors remain hungry for yield in a world where interest rates remain low and may soon go lower.

Health-care companies have become one of the most popular areas for private-equity firms this year in the wake of the buyout of HCA Inc.

Matt Miksic, an analyst who follows medical-technology stocks for Morgan Stanley, said the leveraged buyout of Biomet endorses his view that companies in this sector "throw off a lot of cash and are attractive businesses." He had Biomet rated at the equivalent of a "buy" before the deal was announced, despite the disappointing performance of its spinal-product business. "Hips and knee implants have been clicking along pretty well," he said. Mr. Miksic doesn't own any Biomet stock, but Morgan Stanley has an investment-banking relationship with the company.

When news of the Biomet-Smith & Nephew talks came out, analysts at J.P. Morgan expressed caution about a possible tie-up, saying any deal would face challenges such as product and sales-force overlap, integration and valuation. "In our view, a going-private transaction makes the most sense for Biomet -- being outside the glare of public scrutiny could allow the company to make some tough decisions with respect to its cost structure, business portfolio and management," the analysts said in a research note.

While that scenario now has materialized, Biomet shares slipped 41 cents to $41.59 yesterday in 4 p.m. composite trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market. Volume was 11.8 million shares traded, compared with the daily average of 2.1 million.

Biomet said yesterday that it will postpone reporting its fiscal second-quarter results -- previously expected to be announced tomorrow -- while it continues an internal investigation that already has found that the company may have improperly "backdated" a substantial number of options granted to employees to purchase about 20 million Biomet shares in the past decade.

Options-Backdating Issues

Biomet said correcting errors in how these stock options were accounted for may have a material effect on its historical and/or current financial statements. Moreover, the company's unaudited sales of $520 million for its second quarter ended Nov. 30, while up 5% from a year ago, were below Wall Street's average view of $527 million.

Cowen & Co. analyst Dhulsini De Zoysa said she thinks investors are fretting that the stock-options review could have a material negative impact on Biomet's results, which could trigger the company's private-equity buyers to reprice their offer.

"Theoretically, that's the concern, I think," she said. But "without knowing the magnitude [of the potential impact] it's impossible to say" if the scenario is likely to unfold. The analyst doesn't own Biomet shares.

Biomet Agrees To $10.9 Billion Buyout (AP)

By Deanna Martin, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 19, 2006

A group of private investors that could include a founder of Biomet Inc. has offered $10.9 billion in cash for the Warsaw, Ind.-based orthopedics maker as they seek to capitalize on baby boomers who want to turn back the clock.

The consortium offered $44 per share, 27 percent more than Biomet's closing price on April 3, the last trading day before the merger talk began. The offer is $1 per-share higher than what one analyst said would be justified last week.

Wall Street greeted the news with skepticism. Biomet shares fell 41 cents, or 1 percent, to close at $41.59 in trading Monday on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

But Linda Varoli, vice president of merger research with the New York-based Wall Street Access, said the $10.9 billion purchase price — which will be paid with cash and loans — reflects the potential of the industry, which has been rattled recently by antitrust concerns.

In June, Biomet and three other orthopedics makers announced they had received subpoenas stemming from possible criminal violations in the manufacturing and sale of orthopedic implant devices.

"They wouldn't be making the investment if they didn't see some definite future growth in the company, and most likely in the industry in general," Varoli said of the consortium.

Monday's announcement ended merger speculation brewing since Biomet disclosed in April that it had hired Morgan Stanley to explore "strategic alternatives." The company recently had discussions with British rival Smith & Nephew LLC.

Biomet, established in 1977, is one of three orthopedics companies based in Warsaw, about 40 miles west of Fort Wayne. DePuy Orthopaedics Inc. and Zimmer Holdings Inc. also have operations there.

Orthopedic companies are counting on growth as the nation's 76 million baby boomers reach the age when knees, hips and shoulders sometimes need replacing.

Zimmer Holdings Inc. projects its 2007 sales to top $3.82 billion, an increase of about 10 percent over 2006.

"The number of people who will be in the age category that's typical of joint replacement will be continuing to grow for quite some time," said company spokesman Brad Bishop.

Baby boomers want to remain more active than past generations, said Christopher Kaeding, interim chairman of the Department of Orthopaedics at Ohio State University. "They don't just want to sit there in a rocking chair," Kaeding said. "They have higher expectations of what they want to do in terms of physical activity."

Biomet's buyers include Blackstone Group, Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and the Texas Pacific Group. Biomet founder Dane A. Miller, who resigned as CEO in March, also could join the deal, the company said.

Biomet's board voted in favor of the deal, which is subject to shareholder approval and antitrust clearance. Biomet officials said in a statement they expect the acquisition to be completed by Oct. 31. The company's stock would be delisted from the Nasdaq once the deal closed.

Company officials did not return messages left by The Associated Press.

"This transaction offers shareholders the ability to realize substantial value from their investments in Biomet and provides important benefits to our customers, team members and other stakeholders," interim President and Chief Executive Daniel P. Hann said in a statement.

Biomet, which has about 6,300 employees total, including 1,350 workers in Indiana, will remain in Warsaw.

Also Monday, Biomet said a review found that a substantial number of stock option grants made from 1996 to 2006 — issued on different dates than when they were granted to take advantage of a lower stock price — "were not well documented."

The practice, known as "backdating," is not illegal, but it must be properly accounted for.

Senior executives were aware of the practice, according to Biomet but were not necessarily aware of the legal ramifications.

The company said it has yet to determine the effect of the accounting errors on past financial results. Biomet said it would delay releasing its second-quarter earnings as a result of the investigation.

Preliminary results showed that sales increased 5 percent to $520.3 million for the quarter ended Nov. 30. Reconstructive device sales rose 9 percent worldwide to $368.1 million.

Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial estimated sales of $526.8 million for the second quarter.

Apollo To Acquire Realogy For $6.65B (AP)

AP, December 19, 2006

Apollo Management LP to Acquire Realogy for About $6.65 Billion in Cash

NEW YORK (AP) -- The parent of Century 21 and Coldwell Banker real estate brokerages said it is being acquired by an affiliate of private equity firm Apollo Management LP for about $6.65 billion in cash.

The buyout of Realogy Corp. includes about $1.6 billion in debt and other liabilities of roughly $750 million, the brokerage said late Sunday. Realogy also owns Sotheby's International Realty.

Realogy stockholders will receive $30 per share in cash at closing, an 18 percent premium over the stock's closing price of $25.50 on the New York Stock Exchange on Friday.

Realogy can entertain other proposals from third parties until Feb. 14, the announcement said.

Its shares rose $4.90, or 19.22 percent, to close at $30.40 on the New York Stock Exchange. Realogy's stock will no longer list on the NYSE after the deal is completed.

Realogy was spun off from Cendant Corp. on July 31, along with Wyndham Hotels & Resorts, as the New York-based company was broken up into four pieces. In August, private equity group Blackstone completed its purchase of the Travelport travel unit, leaving just the Avis and Budget rental car business. Analysts have said Wyndham is also a potential acquisition target for private equity.

DOJ_NMG_0107654

Realogy Chairman and Chief Executive Henry R. Silverman is expected to stay in his current positions until his contract expires on Dec. 31, 2007. He is expected to be succeeded by Realogy Vice Chairman and President Richard A. Smith.

The transaction is scheduled to close during the spring of 2007, subject to a shareholder vote, antitrust and insurance approvals, and other customary closing conditions.

Merck Cleared To Buy Stake In Serono (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, December 19, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium — EU regulators on Monday cleared Germany's Merck KGaA to buy Swiss biotechnology company Serono SA.

The European Commission cleared the deal automatically after identifying no antitrust problems and receiving no complaints from rivals within a deadline of 25 working days.

After losing a bid to acquire Schering AG earlier this year, Merck announced in September that it had bought a majority stake in Serono as part of a 16.6 billion Swiss franc (euro10.5 billion; US$13.31 billion) takeover, expanding its range of drugs and increasing its share of the global biotechnology market.

Merck bought the 64.5 percent stake held by the Bertarelli family and will make a public tender offer for the rest of the shares after its deal with the family has closed in January, Chief Financial Officer Michael Becker told reporters in October.

He also said that, as of Sept. 30, Merck had acquired Serono shares on the market, paying euro455 million (US$571.3 million), and planned to buy more.

The deal will give the Darmstadt-based pharmaceutical maker, whose products include the cardiovascular treatment Concor and cancer drug Erbitux, access to new markets thanks to Serono's partnership with Pfizer Inc. to market the multiple sclerosis drug Rebif.

Analysts said the deal is part of Merck's strategy to stay competitive. Many mid-sized drug companies have looked at combining their operations and research with others in an attempt to keep pace.

Merck's Pharma Ethicals division will be combined with Serono to create Merck-Serono Biopharmaceuticals. The headquarters of that business will be in Geneva, while its U.S. base of operations will be in Boston.

The new group is forecast to have pro forma sales of euro7.7 billion (US$10.1 billion), of which euro3.6 billion (US$4.7 billion) will be biopharmaceutical sales.

Merck, founded as a pharmacy in 1668, is the oldest pharmaceutical business in the world. It has been entirely separate from New Jersey-based Merck & Co. since the end of World War I and employs some 29,000 people.

Plaintiffs' Law Firm Removed From Antitrust Case (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

Milberg Weiss & Bershad, the law firm accused of paying plaintiffs to bring class-action lawsuits, was removed yesterday as one of the lead firms in an antitrust case against carmakers over Canadian imports.

Federal District Judge D. Brock Hornby in Maine granted a request by the carmakers to remove Milberg Weiss as the vice chairman of the plaintiffs' executive committee. The law firm and its lawyers can continue to represent individual plaintiffs if they can show these plaintiffs are not being paid, the judge said in the ruling filed in federal district court in Portland, Me.

"Although I was urged to deny the motion to disqualify because the firm is not in immediate jeopardy, I conclude that a fiduciary would not wait," Judge Hornby said in his ruling.

Milberg Weiss and two of its partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman, were indicted in May on charges they paid clients to sue companies for securities fraud. The firm and the two partners pleaded not guilty in July. Federal prosecutors in Los Angeles said at a hearing last month that they may bring additional charges. Mr. Schulman resigned from the law firm Dec. 8.

The firm has faced leadership challenges in other suits since its indictment.

In New Jersey, a pension fund has challenged Milberg's role in a suit seeking tens of billions of dollars from the drugmaker Merck. In June, Milberg lost its lead role in a suit against medical-device maker Medtronic, because it had not told the judge it was under investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0107655

The consolidated lawsuits in Maine were brought by consumers who said that carmakers and dealers colluded to keep new vehicles that were bought in Canada out of the United States.

Toyota Motor Sales USA Inc. has agreed to settle the claims for $35 million, according to yesterday's ruling.

Marina Ein, a spokeswoman for Milberg Weiss, did not immediately return a call to her office after business hours.

US States Sue Bush Administration To Lower Soot Levels (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, December 19, 2006

(AP) - ALBANY, New York-More than a dozen states sued the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency on Monday to lower soot levels from smokestacks and exhaust pipes, a move state officials argue would save thousands of lives.

The states argue that the Bush administration is ignoring science and its own experts in refusing to slightly reduce the allowed threshold for soot.

The lawsuit is the latest salvo against the Bush administration, which has repeatedly come under fire for what some states and environmentalists have said is its lack of commitment to environmental issues.

Most notably, California, striking out on its own, has signed a global warming technology sharing agreement with Britain and has enacted a new law that imposes the first statewide limit on greenhouse gases. It seeks to cut emissions by 25 percent and drop them to 1990 levels by 2020

In bringing the lawsuit, the states argued that the "fine particulate matter" in soot contributes to premature death, chronic respiratory disease and asthma attacks, said New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. The pollution also leads to more hospital admissions and other public health costs, he said.

Officials from California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Maine, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont and the District of Columbia joined New York in the action filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington.

"It is unfortunate that this coalition of states must resort to legal action to get the EPA to do its job - protect the environment and the public health," said Spitzer, the Democratic governor-elect.

The EPA said it considered new research cited by the state officials. But the agency decided research that prompted a previous reduction was more reliable and did not justify a further cut, according to EPA statements. The agency said it will consider the new studies in the next five-year review.

"Where the science was clear, we took clear action," said EPA spokeswoman Jennifer Wood. "EPA significantly strengthened the previous daily standard - by nearly 50 percent."

"EPA has not followed the clean air law," countered New Hampshire Attorney General Kelly Ayotte, a Republican. "My office will work in conjunction with ... other concerned states to ensure that EPA takes appropriate action."

The emissions, described as much smaller than a grain of sand, come from automobiles, power plants, factories and wood fires.

The states want to reduce the current limit of 15 micrograms of soot allowed per cubic foot of air. States say even a reduction of 1 microgram would save as many as 11,000 lives. They don't agree on a specific amount to cut the limit.

The federal Clean Air Act requires a review every five years to determine if air pollution standards should be adjusted. The states argue this compels the EPA to act. The states want the federal court to find the EPA failed to obey its "Congressional mandate to protect the environment and the public health," according to a statement from Spitzer's office.

Last week, a group called Earthjustice, which includes the American Lung Association, the American Medical Association and Environmental Defense, sued the EPA over the same issue.

Richard K. Ruminski (MJS)

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 19, 2006

Head of local FBI office says bureau more proactive after 9-11

Richard K. Ruminski, the latest special agent in charge of the Milwaukee office of the FBI, has been with the bureau for 20 years, working in Washington, D.C., Chicago, and Richmond, Va., among other places. He has worked foreign counter-intelligence, counter-terrorism and criminal investigations, including the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the D.C. sniper investigation. Ruminski, who arrived in Milwaukee in mid-August, recently took five questions from reporter Gina Barton.

Q. What do you think of Milwaukee?

A. I was born and raised in Chicago, so I like being back in the Midwest. I like the fact that at the FBI office here, I've got just an office full of dedicated employees that are happy to be here, which you don't find everywhere.

Q. What's the most interesting case you've worked on?

A. Probably the issues surrounding 9-11. There were plenty of smaller cases that were interesting, but that one - coupled with the anthrax investigation - was just so global and there were just so many leads coming out of every direction.

Q. How have things in the FBI changed since 9-11?

A. We've completely changed our focus from being mainly a criminal investigative agency that also worked counter-intelligence matters. We are now in a status where we're trying to be much more proactive. We went from a reactive agency to much more proactive because of our newest responsibility of detecting and preventing terrorism, which is a very difficult task.

Q. In the past, the FBI, particularly in Milwaukee, has had a hard time recruiting agents of color and Arabic speakers. How's that going?

A. We will always be trying to get a diverse work force, but what you're drawing your work force from is the particular area you're in. You try to recruit at colleges and different institutions. We do the best we can to get a diverse work force. It's hard to get Arabic speakers. There's a very big push right now to get Arabic speakers, and we are doing just about all we possibly can to recruit them, but we haven't had a tremendous amount of luck here in the Milwaukee area.

Q. Sen. Herb Kohl recently asked the national FBI director to send more crime-fighting resources to Milwaukee. Do you think the FBI needs to get more involved in solving Milwaukee's crime problem?

A. We have been extremely involved in the violent crime area. We work gangs, we work narcotics investigations, but we work them in task force settings. We had numerous arrests here of gang members several weeks back. . . . I have been deputizing local law officers, and the sheriffs of the counties have been deputizing agents to give them local authority. We address some of the more complex (criminal) enterprise organizations . . . in a task force setting.

FBI Tries To Retool For Post-9/11 World (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), December 19, 2006

The prototypical FBI agent in the J. Edgar Hoover days was a lawyer or accountant. Today's ideal candidate is more likely to be a computer whiz who is fluent in a second language.

Finding new agents with that kind of background can be challenging, especially since they must also pass a background check, lie detector test and physical fitness trial, as well as survive a written test, an oral interview and 18 weeks of training at Quantico, Va.

Former Special Agent Craig Dahle was in charge of recruiting for the Mobile field office until his retirement last month. In that role, he was one of the men and women responsible for trying to achieve the agency's national recruiting goal of 1,000 new agents for the fiscal year that ended in September.

The bureau fell short of that target, hiring 791 agents.

"A thousand is extremely ambitious because the process of getting hired as an FBI special agent is unlike any other job, I'd dare say," Dahle said.

In addition to all of the rigorous hurdles applicants must clear, successful candidates face one more sacrifice once they get the job: They must move to another city. Long-standing FBI rules require new agents to be assigned to a field office outside of their home area.

Dahle said the rule is meant to ensure agents avoid any entanglements that might present conflicts of interests.

The relocation was the hardest part for Teresa Higgins, a new FBI agent who arrived in Mobile in October.

"It was kind of hard for me to adapt and move somewhere where I have no family," said Higgins, a native of Johnson City, Tenn.

DOJ_NMG_0107657

Higgins, 29, is among the 15 percent or so of FBI agents who came to the agency with traditional law enforcement backgrounds. She said she became attracted to the profession as a teenager, when she participated in a local Explorer program at the Police Department.

After spending almost a decade chasing street thugs as a police officer in Johnson City, Higgins said, she wanted a new challenge. "After eight years of swing shifts, I was ready for a change," she said.

Higgins said she started the application process in 2003, stopped after her husband resisted moving and then re-applied when she managed to change his mind.

Assigned to the Mobile field office's counter-terrorism unit, Higgins had no trouble identifying why she gravitated toward the FBI. "It's the premier law enforcement agency," she said.

Remaking the FBI

The FBI has aggressively stepped up its hiring since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, taking on an average of 873 agents a year since 9/11 compared with an annual average of 632 in the five previous years.

The hiring binge has been aimed both at replacing retiring agents and increasing the overall work force as the bureau has tried to shift its focus from law enforcement to counter-terrorism and intelligence. About a third of the FBI's 12,603 agents have been hired since the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The FBI also has hired 4,886 support staff since 9/11, Dahle said. These include analysts and computer experts, he said. The Mobile field office, which includes branch offices throughout the southern portion of the state, has 58 agents and 60 support staff members.

"There's been a lot of hiring in that area that would not have happened had 9/11 not happened," he said.

Keeping pace has been a challenge, though. The impending retirement of baby boomers that is looming over the entire country already has hit the government sector, according to experts.

Work force consultant Robert Morrison said the average age of federal government workers is 47 or 48, compared with 40 for the American work force as a whole. The FBI is no exception, said Morrison, executive director of the Concours Group.

"Like many government agencies, the average age is above average. Their people are older," he said.

Morrison, co-author of "Workforce Crisis: How to beat the Coming Shortage of Skills and Talent," said the FBI has an added burden because of its mandatory retirement age of 57.

"Somebody like the FBI is really shooting themselves in the foot, because they're causing it to happen faster than it would," he said.

Special Agent Deanne Lindsey, who graduated from Quantico in August and arrived in Mobile last month after a two-month stint at the FBI headquarters in Washington, has one of those "critical skills" the agency is aggressively seeking. A physical therapist by training, she has a science background, which Dahle said the FBI covets.

The 36-year-old Georgia native said her step-father was chief of security at the state Capitol in Atlanta, and her uncle works for the Bibb County Sheriff's Office in Georgia. But she said she did not consider a law enforcement career for herself until her experience in physical therapy opened her eyes to Medicare fraud.

"I witnessed so much of that being a physical therapist. .... The people who really end up being overcharged are the patients," said Lindsey, who investigates violent crimes in Mobile.

'Sowing of seeds'

Despite the recent focus on "critical skills" like computers and foreign language, the FBI still has plenty of stereotypical G-men. About 1,500 agents have law degrees and another 1,500 have accounting backgrounds, Dahle said.

"We have a wide variance of backgrounds, and that's really the strength of the bureau," he said.

At Quantico, agents rank all 56 field offices in order of where they most want to be assigned. Higgins said she selected Charlotte, which was closest to her home, and then ranked the rest in reverse order of cost of living. Mobile was her 14th choice.

Recent hires also can expect to be transferred within a few years, Dahle said.

Finding new recruits is more art than science, Dahle said. He said he spent much of his time speaking on college campuses. With a requirement that agents have at least three years of full-time work experience, few students are even eligible to apply immediately. But Dahle called it a "sowing of seeds" in hopes that those students five or 10 years later decide to give the FBI a try.

"Word of mouth remains the best recruiting tool," he said.

For Higgins, it was the persistent encouragement of a retired FBI agent who taught her when she was a student at a community college.

"He pushed and pushed and pushed it," she said.

Dahle said external events often influence applications. After the "The Silence of the Lambs" came out in 1991, he said, a great many people applied to the FBI with dreams of becoming a profiler like Jodie Foster's character.

"It's hard to say exactly what triggers it," he said. "Perceptions do matter. Popular culture does matter."

Two Suspects Make Court Appearance In ATF Shooting (MACT)

The Macon Telegraph, December 19, 2006

DECATUR - Two suspects in the shooting and wounding of two federal agents have made their first court appearance.

Chardriguez Durden, 23, of Stone Mountain is charged with six counts of aggravated assault on a police officer and violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act.

Paul Thompson Jr., 19, of Covington is charged with violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act.

The two appeared before a judge Sunday night.

The two were jailed following the shooting of two agents with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives on Friday as the agents attempted to serve a warrant at an apartment complex in Lithonia.

The agents were treated at DeKalb Medical Center and released.

Report Calls Marijuana California's Biggest Cash Crop (KESQ)

KESQ-TV, December 18, 2006

A new report out says, marijuana is California's number one cash crop, worth some 14-billion dollars a year. That's despite an all-out crack-down campaign by the feds against the drug. Medicinal marijuana advocates say it's California's number one cash crop simply because it's illegal.

It's now been called California's biggest cash crop, worth an estimated 13.8 billion dollars. And it's illegal.

At least, that's what the federal government says.

That's the reason for statewide DEA raids on pot fields and, medicinal marijuana dispensaries, like CannaHelp and Palm Springs Caregivers here in the Coachella Valley.

Despite this, the report claims California's marijuana production rocketed 10-fold in the last 25 years.

Nationwide, pot is worth about 35 billion dollars.

Anti-prohibition advocates say classifying marijuana as illegal is the problem.

"Agriculturally, it's worth the same as alfalfa, which is six cents a pound right now, which would make the total crop, if it wasn't illegal, about 1.3million as opposed to 35 billion."

The report was done by Medicinal Marijuana Advocates.

All-time High For Homegrown As Pot Becomes Top Cash Crop In US (GUA)

Guardian Unlimited, December 19, 2006

Marijuana is now the biggest cash crop grown in the US, exceeding traditional harvests such as wheat, corn and soy beans, says a new report.

The study shows that 10,000 tonnes of marijuana worth $35.8bn (£18.4bn) is grown each year; the street value would be even higher. This dwarfs the $23bn-worth of corn grown, $17.6bn-worth of soybeans and $12.2bn-worth of hay. Marijuana is the biggest cash crop in 12 states, with the value of pot grown outstripping peanuts in Georgia and tobacco in North and South Carolina. In California, the biggest producer, it is worth $13.8bn.

Article continues

The report, Marijuana Production in the US, by DrugScience.org, which wants marijuana to be reclassified, says the drug is listed as a Schedule 1 drug, deemed to have no medicinal value and a likelihood of abuse. Other such drugs include heroin.

The author, Jon Gettman, says the figures show the war on drugs is not working: "Illicit marijuana cultivation provides considerable unreported revenue for growers without corresponding tax obligations to compensate the public for the social and fiscal costs related to [its] use."

His suggestion that the crop be legalised and taxed was rejected by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, which pointed to countries with large drug cash crops, notably Colombia and Afghanistan.

The report says output in the US has grown tenfold in the last 25 years.

The boom in domestic production has in part been fuelled by tougher border controls after 9/11. As smuggling from Mexico has become more difficult the drug cartels have moved their operations into the US, often creating plantations in remote national park land.

Backer Says Pot Is Largest U.S. Cash Crop (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, December 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107659

A California advocate for decriminalizing marijuana claims U.S. statistics prove the plant has become the country's largest cash crop.

Marijuana public policy analyst Jon Gettman told The Los Angeles Time his study used figures in a 2005 U.S. State Department report estimating U.S. cannabis cultivation at more than 22 million pounds.

He said he gave it a conservative value of about $1,600 a pound compared to the $2,000- to $4,000-a-pound street value often cited by law enforcement agencies after arrests.

The report claims the $35.8 billion marijuana harvest exceeds corn ($23 billion), soybeans ($17.6 billion) and hay ($12.2 billion), the Times reported.

Gettman advocates removing marijuana from the federal list of hard-core Schedule 1 drugs and treating it like tobacco and alcohol by legalizing and reaping a tax windfall, while also controlling production and distribution to better restrict use by minors.

Tom Riley, a spokesman for the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, disagreed, and said coca has plagued Colombia and opium poppies are a disaster for Afghanistan.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigrant Labor Or Machines? (WSJ)

By June Kronholz

The Wall Street Journal, December 19, 2006

SALINAS, Calif. -- Why don't U.S. employers just automate the low-skilled jobs that now attract illegal immigrants?

Steve Scaroni's lettuce harvester provides part of the answer. At the height of the lettuce season here, the romaine harvester that Mr. Scaroni designed and built at an out-of-pocket cost of $1 million sat in the shop, idled by a design flaw that allowed too many lettuce heads to roll back into the field.

Mr. Scaroni's company, Valley Harvesting & Packing Inc., harvests a million pounds of lettuce daily. Even when it's working, the harvester -- a bandsaw, sweeper and conveyor belt on tank-like tracks -- cuts Mr. Scaroni's labor needs by only a quarter. And with a delicate crop like lettuce, the machine causes too much bruising for anything except bagged salad mixes.

With the country deeply divided over immigration, some economists and policy makers are suggesting that technological innovations could offer a way out of the economy's reliance on illegal workers. But as Mr. Scaroni's troubled lettuce harvester shows, it's unlikely that mechanization will reduce the demand for illegal immigrants anytime soon. For most of the jobs they do, there's no easy high-tech substitute.

Illegal immigrants make up an estimated 5% of the U.S. work force, but more than one-quarter of the people who pick crops, hang drywall, shingle roofs and process food. Those jobs are drawing 500,000 low-skilled workers to the U.S. each year.

Immigration restrictionists, among others, point to the success of mechanical tomato harvesting when the Bracero guest worker program for seasonal Mexican farm workers ended in 1964. Since then, harvests of tomatoes that go into processed foods have quadrupled, while labor use has dropped by 72%, says the Western Growers Association, a California trade group.

Some other industries that rely on low-skilled labor also have mechanized. The poultry industry now uses machines to catch, kill, pluck and eviscerate chickens. The housing industry is moving more work onto factory assembly lines.

But labor economists say that's not much headway. "What struck me was how few examples there were of employers thinking ahead," says University of California at Davis economist Philip Martin, who spent a month last year looking for innovations that lessen U.S. reliance on illegal, low-skilled labor, and found almost none.

Much of the problem, he says, is that guest worker proposals circulating in Washington are "sending the signal that the supply of unskilled labor will continue" to be high. That has largely dissuaded government and industry from investing in research and development, he adds.

The Agriculture Department -- which helped pay for the tomato-harvest research at UC Davis -- ended all funding for mechanization in 1979 after unions representing agriculture workers sued the university for endangering their jobs.

Salinas's lettuce farmers began mechanizing a decade ago, using machinery with a broad blade to mow whole fields of young spinach. But the head lettuces pose a bigger challenge than greens, which are packaged whole and sold as "spring mix." Mr. Scaroni's romaine workers cut and core each head as they move through a field, slice off bruised leaves, rinse the core to prevent discoloration and toss the lettuce onto a conveyor belt, which deposits it into huge plastic-lined boxes.

Mr. Scaroni, 49 years old, needs 1,500 workers to meet his harvesting contracts in the summer season and 700 in the winter, when he moves his operation to the U.S.-Mexico border to work the lettuce crop there. Last year, he says, he began to worry that political pressures to cut illegal immigration would leave him without a work force. Federal law requires that he ask his workers for identification and U.S. work authorization, although he's not obliged to assess their authenticity, and the use of forged documents is widespread in the agriculture industry. Mr. Scaroni says that to the best of his knowledge he doesn't employ any illegal workers.

Under current law, there's almost no way for an unskilled worker to legally immigrate on a work visa. Meanwhile, Mr. Scaroni says, his longtime legal-immigrant workers are leaving the fields for skilled jobs in his company, or for higher-paying construction work.

Working with two engineers at a Salinas fabricating shop, Mr. Scaroni spent two months designing his lettuce harvester on a computer last winter and another four months building a prototype. This past summer, he moved his finished harvester into the fields.

The machine slices off the romaine heads a few inches above the ground and sweeps them onto an inclined conveyor belt. A driver maneuvers it through the field, and a half dozen workers sit on a platform at the top of the belt, trimming the lettuce before it is tipped into boxes.

The machine cuts human contact with the lettuce and is washed with chlorine nightly, making it potentially safer than hand-picked methods that could spread disease, he says. But the angle of the conveyor belt was too steep, and adjusting that flaw cost $50,000 and took the harvester out of service for two weeks. In addition, mechanization tends to bruise the lettuce.

Working without industry or university help, "we had no way to validate the design," sighed Mr. Scaroni.

Mr. Scaroni's machine reduces labor only 25% because much of the trimming and inspection that otherwise would be done in the fields has now been moved inside a processing plant. "Cutting the lettuce is easy," says Mr. Scaroni, but "someone's still got to put their eyes on it."

That problem stymies mechanization of other crops. With the development of new plant varieties, a lettuce field now matures uniformly, which means that laborers can harvest it in one pass.

But other crops mature progressively -- laborers now go through a cantaloupe field up to 10 times to cut produce as it ripens. Automating that harvest would require robots that can distinguish colors and leave green fruit behind. California citrus growers have a small robotics research project, says Jim Thompson, a UC-Davis agricultural engineer. But a prototype robot will cost $6 million, and without research grants, "they're not getting there very fast," he adds.

Even where machine harvesters have been developed, the damage and bruising they cause excludes their use on fresh foods like apples, table grapes and salad tomatoes.

With an immigration bill far from passage, the Western Growers and some other farm groups have turned their attention to an upcoming farm bill. They want some of the money that now goes into grain subsidies to be used for fruit and vegetable research, including mechanization. But that bill is still at least a year away.

So Mr. Scaroni has begun shifting some of his operation to central Mexico -- and with it, some of the business he once gave to Salinas merchants. Consumers want lettuce, "and somebody's got to cut it," he says.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senator Removes His Block On Federal Court Nominee (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, December 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 18 — Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, who blocked the confirmation of a woman to the federal bench because she attended a same-sex commitment ceremony for the daughter of her long-time neighbors, says he will now allow a vote on the nomination.

Mr. Brownback, a possible contender for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, said in a recent interview that when the Senate returned in January, he would allow a vote on Janet Neff, a 61-year-old Michigan state judge, who was nominated to a Federal District Court seat.

Mr. Brownback, who has been criticized for blocking the nomination, said he would also no longer press a proposed solution he offered on Dec. 8 that garnered even more criticism: that he would remove his block if Judge Neff agreed to recuse herself from all cases involving same-sex unions.

In an interview last week, Mr. Brownback said that he still believed Judge Neff's behavior raised serious questions about her impartiality and that he was likely to vote against her. But he said he did not realize his proposal — asking a nominee to agree in advance to remove herself from deciding a whole category of cases — was so unusual as to be possibly unprecedented. Legal scholars said it raised constitutional questions of separation of powers for a senator to demand that a judge commit to behavior on the bench in exchange for a vote.

Mr. Brownback said that he believed Judge Neff's attendance at the 2002 ceremony merited further investigation, but that he had not meant to set any precedent with his proposal. "It was the last day of the session and I was just trying to provide some accommodation to see if we could make this thing go forward," he said.

He said that "this is a big hot-button issue" and that Judge Neff had not made it clear that her presence at the ceremony did not mean she could not rule without bias in deciding cases involving same-sex unions. "I'd like to know more factually about what took place," he said.

On Oct. 12, Judge Neff answered a long list of written questions from Mr. Brownback. In her letter, she said she would decide any cases that came before her according to the law and the Constitution and would not be guided by her personal views. That is the same pledge that several conservative Republican judicial nominees made when asked whether their blunt personal statements opposing abortion rights and same-sex marriages would affect their performance on the bench.

Mr. Brownback, a member of the Judiciary Committee who supported those other nominees, has tried to put himself forward as the Republican presidential contender who best represents the interests of the nation's conservative religious community.

In her letter, Judge Neff said she had attended the ceremony in Massachusetts as a guest, not as a presiding jurist. As the ceremony occurred before Massachusetts's highest court approved same-sex unions, it did not have any legal validity.

One of the women in the ceremony, Judge Neff wrote, was the daughter of a family who had lived next door for 26 years. She said the families were so close that the woman was, in effect, a part of her family and was like a big sister to her own daughters. She said that she had delivered a homily at the ceremony and that "it was no different than being asked by my own daughters to be part of an important event in their lives."

Charles Fried, a Harvard Law School professor and leading conservative scholar, said Mr. Brownback's actions were improper. "First of all, people go to parties for all sorts of reasons," Professor Fried said, and how one would rule on a case should not be inferred from that private activity.

Further, he said, "It would be inappropriate for the judge to recuse herself from any such case because it is a judge's duty to sit on cases" unless there is a clear conflict of interest. There would be a genuine conflict of interest, he said, if the judge had a financial interest in a case's result or had been associated with one of the parties in the case.

"For her to agree to any such restriction in this case would be wrong," said Professor Fried, who has been both a judge and the solicitor general of the United States.

Judge Neff's nomination was included in a package of more than a dozen nominees whose confirmation had been agreed upon by both Democrats and Republicans. Mr. Brownback's objections held up the whole roster of nominees.

Mr. Brownback said that when Judge Neff was renominated in January, he would insist only that the nomination not be approved in a voice vote, but one in which each senator is obliged to record a personal vote.

Outsourcing Ethics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 19, 2006

Congressional mores could certainly use an upgrade, but it pays to beware of reformers promising to clean up politics by letting someone else do the dirty work. Exhibit A is the strange new enthusiasm for an "independent" office of public integrity for Congress.

One warning sign is that the proposal is being marketed by the same folks who gave us "independent counsels" such as Lawrence Walsh and Ken Starr for the executive branch, as well as the glories of "campaign finance reform." Instead of the current practice of having complaints against Members vetted by the House and Senate Ethics Committees, the idea is to create a new outside body to do the work for Congress. To her credit, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi hasn't let the browbeating by the usual goo-goo editorial pages intimidate her, and has suggested a task force to study the idea.

A better name for such an "independent" ethics body would be the office of public buck-passing, because it would allow Congress to spare itself the heavy political lifting of judging colleagues. Handing over that duty to outsiders would make Congress less politically accountable, not more, while creating a whole new set of political problems and disputes.

Supporters argue that only an outsider can hold Congress accountable because the Members won't discipline their colleagues. And true enough, sometimes Members don't. We can recall that long before Tom DeLay tried to stack the House Ethics Committee in 2005, Democrats slow-rolled the investigation into then-Speaker Jim Wright in the early 1990s. The Senate also tried to protect its own amid the Keating Five scandal of the 1980s, until Democrat Henry Gonzalez blew the whistle by holding public hearings.

But all three episodes created the opportunity for political opponents to turn ethics into a fruitful campaign issue. In the most recent case, as many as 10 Republicans who lost their seats last month did so in part because of ethics or corruption complaints. Losing a Congressional majority is the ultimate accountability moment, and it was just administered by a genuine group of "independent" outsiders" -- namely, the voters.

Meanwhile, the Justice Department is still around and doing its job of probing public corruption. Duke Cunningham is already in jail and Bob Ney seems headed there. Jack Abramoff is also sitting in a federal prison, doing penance for his bribery schemes. Several other Congressmen are under investigation, including Democrats William Jefferson (Louisiana) and Alan Mollohan (West Virginia). The voters just returned the latter duo to Washington, in part because the GOP was under greater public scrutiny this time around. But in the new Congress, Democrats will have to show if they can do better than the GOP at disciplining their own.

By outsourcing ethical oversight, the Democrats would let themselves off the hook. They'd also be creating the potential for politicizing ethics without accountability because it is a fantasy to believe that any outside investigator or panel will be without political baggage. That's what reformers also said about "independent counsels" in the executive branch. Anyone who takes the job will himself be subject to political and media pressure, and will inevitably be accused of partisan motives. He'd also be accountable to no one for his decisions, however wise or foolish they might be. At least the Members of the Ethics Committee are accountable first to their colleagues and ultimately to the voters.

Another reason Members find this kind of "independent" ethical dodge so attractive is because it deflects attention from their own bad habits. The source of much recent corruption in Congress has been the proliferation of spending "earmarks," or special favors for friends or political allies. Duke Cunningham went to jail for trading them for personal financial gain; others may follow. But reducing earmarks, or making them more transparent to the press and public, would reduce Member clout. It is so much easier to call for an "office of public integrity" and hope the press corps forgets all that earmarking stuff.

Like campaign finance reform, the proposal to outsource ethics oversight is about the appearance of virtue. It would let the Members pretend to come clean while lifting the burden of actually enforcing their own standards of conduct.

Incoming Senate Powerhouse: Time To Rev Up FOI Laws (EDPUB)

By Mark Fitzgerald

Editor & Publisher, December 18, 2006

CHICAGO The senator who will oversee the powerful Judiciary Committee as a Democratic majority takes the chamber next month says strengthening open government and citizen privacy laws will be its priority.

In a little-noticed speech last week at Georgetown University Law Center, U.S. Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) lamented the recent congressional acquiescence to the Bush administration's secrecy, and promised to restore the constitutional balance between the executive and legislative branches of government.

"Unfortunately, open, informed government has been under assault by the first administration in modern times that is explicitly hostile to the public's right to know," Leahy said. "By using ideology to trump science, gagging government scientists and experts, reclassifying public documents and undermining important tools like [the Freedom Of Information Act], this government has displayed a dangerous disdain for the free press and the public."

He said he will work to strengthen open-government laws, and to provide more congressional oversight of the White House.

"Congress has a solemn duty to protect the rights of the American people and to perform meaningful oversight to make sure the laws are followed," Leahy said. "Real oversight makes government more accountable and more effective in keeping us safe."

Leahy charged that the Bush administration "has rolled back open government laws and systematically eroded Americans' privacy rights," while "brazenly" refusing to answer "the legitimate oversight questions of the public's duly elected representatives."

Congressional oversight of the FBI and the Department of Justice "will again be one of my highest priorities when I take the gavel once more as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee," Leahy said. He said that under his previous chairmanship of the committee, oversight was a bipartisan affair, and that he expected to revive that tradition in the incoming Congress.

"I came to the Senate during the ebb tide of Watergate and Vietnam," Leahy said. "In my 32 years since then in the Senate, I have never seen a Congress so willfully derelict in its duties as during this Administration. This has been an unfortunate chapter in Congress's history, a time when our Constitution was under assault, when our legal and human rights were weakened, when our privacy and other freedoms were eroded. This election was an intervention. The American people rose up to take away Congress's rubber stamp, and to demand a new direction with more accountability."

The Bush administration, Leahy added, has done "real damage ... to our system of government" in the last few years.

Leahy's speech was first reported by the alternative Burlington (Vt.) Free Press, which put the complete text on its Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0107663

Leahy called for new privacy laws to preserve rights at a time when, he said, the Bush administration is spawning new databases but refusing to explain what they are and why they have been created.

"Privacy rights belong to the people, not to the government," he said. Bush White House officials "need to stop treating the privacy of ordinary Americans as an expendable commodity."

Leahy suggested he would revive legislation first proposed two years ago by him and Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) that establishes stronger penalties for identity theft.

Another priority will be oversight of the billions in development aid sent to Iraq. "Rarely if ever has so much money been funneled so fast to so many unsupervised contractors, with so few safeguards," Leahy said, noting that many Iraqis go without basic services while watching "billions of dollars being siphoned off by unsupervised contractors."

He said he intends to revive the blocked "War Profiteering Prevention Act" to make easier prosecution for abuse and waste of aid.

Leahy also said he plans to establish a new "Human Rights and the Law Subcommittee" that would focus attention on protecting human rights worldwide, and on curbing American violations.

The Smoky Bomb Threat (NYT)

By Peter D. Zimmerman

New York Times, December 19, 2006

London

THE exotic murder-by-polonium of the former K.G.B. spy Alexander Litvinenko has embroiled Russia, Britain and Germany in a diplomatic scuffle and a hunt for more traces of the lethal substance. But it also throws into question most of the previous analyses of "dirty bombs," terrorist attacks using radioactive isotopes wrapped in explosives (or using other dispersion techniques) to spread radioactive material in crowded areas.

Essentially all analysts, myself included, played down the possibility of using alpha radiation — fast-moving helium nuclei ejected during the radioactive decay of certain isotopes, such as of polonium 210, the substance that killed Mr. Litvinenko — as a source of dirty bombs. We concentrated instead on isotopes that emit penetrating gamma rays, which are basically super-powered packets of light, hard to shield and effective at a yard or more.

The alpha radiation from polonium can be easily shielded — by a layer of aluminum foil, a sheet or two of paper, or the dead outer layer of skin. And so, the reasoning went, alpha radiation could not hurt you as long as the source stayed outside your body. Exactly. Mr. Litvinenko was apparently killed by polonium that he ate or drank or inhaled. That source was so physically small that it was hard to see, perhaps the size of a couple of grains of salt and weighing just a few millionths of a gram.

Dirty bombs based on gamma emitters, analysts have learned, can't kill very many people. Mr. Litvinenko's death tells us that "smoky bombs" based on alpha emitters very well could.

Polonium 210 is surprisingly common. It is used by industry in devices that eliminate static electricity, in low-powered brushes used to ionize the air next to photographic film so dust can be swept off easily, and in quite large machines placed end-to-end across a web of fabric moving over rollers in a textile mill. It is even used to control dust in clean rooms where computer chips and hard drives are made.

It may be difficult to get people to eat polonium; it isn't hard to force them to breathe it. The problem for a radiological terrorist is to get his "hot" material inside people's bodies where it will do the most harm. If the terrorist can solve that problem, then alpha radiation is the most devastating choice he can make. Precisely because alphas emit their nuclei so quickly, they deposit all of their energy in a relatively small number of cells, killing them or causing them to mutate, increasing the long-term risk of cancer.

The terrorist's solution lies in getting very finely divided polonium into the air where people can breathe it. Without giving away any information damaging to national security, I see several fairly simple ways to accomplish this: burn the material, blow it up, dissolve it in a lot of water or pulverize it to a size so small that the particles can float in the air and lodge in the lungs.

It would be unwise for me to dwell on the details of just how one goes about getting a hot enough fire or breaking polonium into extremely fine "dust." In the end, however, the radioactive material will appear like the dust from an explosion, or the smoke from a fire. My point is to demonstrate the urgent need for new thinking in the regulatory arena, not to give away important information.

Air containing such radioactive debris would appear smoky or dusty, and be dangerous to breathe. A few breaths might easily be enough to sicken a victim, and in some cases to kill. A smoky bomb exploded in a packed arena or on a crowded street could kill dozens or hundreds. It would set off a radiological emergency of a kind not seen before in the United States, and the number of people requiring life support or palliative care until death would overwhelm the number of beds now available for treating victims of radiation. First responders dashing unprotected into the cloud from a smoky bomb might be among the worst wounded. Fire and police departments around the country will need alpha radiation detectors, since the counters they carry now cannot see alphas.

Some of the steps involved with making a good smoky bomb from polonium would be dangerous for the terrorists involved, and might cost them their lives. That, unfortunately, no longer seems like a very high barrier.

What can we do to stop them? We must make it far less easy for them to acquiring polonium in deadly amounts. Polonium sources with about 10 percent of a lethal dose are readily available — even in a product sold on Amazon.com. Only modest restraints inhibit purchase of significantly larger amounts of polonium: as of next year, anyone purchasing more than 16 curies of polonium 210 — enough to make up 5,000 lethal doses — must register it with a tracking system run by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. But this is vastly too high — almost no purchases on that scale are made by any industry.

The commission (and the International Atomic Energy Agency as well) is said to be considering tighter regulations to make a repeat of the Litvinenko affair less probable. There is talk that it might tighten the polonium reporting requirement by a factor of 10, to 1.6 curies. That's better, but still not strict enough.

The biggest problem is that the regulatory commission's regulations do not restrict the quantity of polonium used in industry. This may make it quite easy for terrorists to purchase large amounts of one of the earth's deadliest substances. A near-term goal should to require specific licensing of any person or company seeking to purchase alpha sources stronger than one millicurie, about a third of a lethal dose. A longer-term goal ought to be eliminating nearly all use of polonium in industry through other technologies.

That is a technical challenge and would cost some money, but it would certainly be less expensive than coping with the devastation of a smoky bomb.

Restart of Katrina shelter aid ordered

By MATT APUZZO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON - Under a court order, the Bush administration will restart a housing program for Hurricane Katrina victims this week and begin explaining to thousands of evacuees why their aid was cut off this summer.

U.S. District Judge Richard Leon ruled last month that the Federal Emergency Management Agency violated the Constitution when it eliminated short-term housing assistance and provided victims only confusing computer-generated codes to explain its decision.

FEMA officials testified in court Monday that the agency could restore the system this week but did not say how soon Texas officials could begin receiving money to cover housing for Katrina evacuees - about $750 a month per family. Officials also said they were working to produce easily understandable letters from an outdated computer system to explain why the aid was eliminated and how to appeal the decision.

"Maybe we can get this thing jump-started and get these people a roof over their heads before Christmas," said Leon, who first ordered the agency to comply three weeks ago.

James Walke, a FEMA section chief, originally testified that it would take until Friday to prepare documentation to restart the program. But when he told Leon the documentation was only two pages, Leon pressed to get it finished by this afternoon, and Walke said he would.

That puts FEMA in a potentially awkward position. The agency is challenging Leon's ruling and has asked an appeals court to delay enforcement of his order until the case is resolved. That order likely won't come until the middle of the week at the earliest.

By then, FEMA will have advised Texas officials that they plan to restore housing funding and many evacuees may have received letters. If FEMA prevails at the appeals court, officials will have to turn around and tell those people they are once again without aid.

Leon has also ordered FEMA to make three months of retroactive housing payments, which would amount to checks of about $2,250 for each eligible family. FEMA now estimates 4,200 Texas families are covered by Leon's order.

Margaret A. Young, the agency's CFO, said the agency is unable to make the retroactive payments, which would amount to about $10 million. The short-term housing program was set up to reimburse local governments for the cost of housing evacuees, she said, not to make direct payments to victims.

Even if the appeals court upholds Leon's order, however, the aid program is still temporary. Leon ruled that FEMA must make payments only until it can adequately explain why the program was eliminated and give victims a chance to appeal.

Once that happens, evacuees likely will be cut off again if they cannot prove they meet the criteria for continued aid.

Brian Verburg, the chief of FEMA's National Processing Service Center in Virginia, testified that the agency's computer system was not designed to produce letters in plain English, only in program codes. He said officials are working long hours to get the letters out.

"We may make mistakes occasionally but we're not a bunch of people sitting around just dragging our feet," Verburg said.

'Sheer anger' over torture provokes suit: Navy veteran from Chicago suing Rumsfeld

Mark J. Konkol ; The Chicago Sun-Times

A U.S . Navy veteran from Chicago sued former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in federal court Monday, accusing U.S . forces of detaining and torturing him for 97 days at a maximum security military prison in Baghdad.

Donald Vance, 29, worked in Iraq as a private security contractor when he was kidnapped by his own employer in April, rescued by U.S. forces, and then held without ever being charged with a crime, according to the lawsuit.

At the U.S. Embassy, Vance told military officials that he was an FBI informant who regularly relayed information via cell phone and e- mail to a federal agent in Chicago about his employer's possible involvement in illegally selling weapons.

"Within five minutes of my first interrogations I explained to them the relationship [with FBI agent Travis Carlisle] and I was imploring them to do their research," he said. An FBI spokesman confirmed Carlisle is an agent but declined to comment further.

'FAIR AND HUMANELY'

After being interviewed and getting a few hours of sleep at the embassy, Vance and co-worker Nathan Ertel of Virginia were bound, blindfolded and taken to Camp Cropper, the military prison where Saddam Hussein was held.

During a telephone interview Monday, Vance said he was questioned almost every day, repeatedly asked what connections his employer, Shield Group Security, had with Iraqi political and tribal leaders, what type of work they did, how much he got paid, and contacts in the U.S. State Department, among other things.

During his imprisonment, Vance was isolated and deprived of sleep and food, he said. He kept track of time by keeping notes in a prison camp-issued Bible and making hash marks on the cinder block walls of his cold cell -- a 9-foot-square room with a thin mattress and a "Turkish toilet" that amounted to a hole in the floor.

He said he was deprived of blankets and adequate clothes, and got very little sleep because cell lights were never turned off and "intolerably loud" heavy metal and country music was usually playing in the prison. Sometimes he wasn't given food and water for an entire day, the lawsuit states.

A Pentagon representative told the New York Times that Vance was treated "fair and humanely," and that there is no record Vance complained about how he was being treated.

On July 20, Vance was released and dropped at Baghdad Airport to find a way home himself.

Vance, a graduate of Chicago's Taft High School, said "sheer anger" provoked his decision to take the matter to court and help Americans "protect their liberties at home."

Federal prosecutors: Only one plant worker asked for lawyer

DENVER_Workers questioned during last week's immigration raid in Greeley were not forced to talk to agents and those arrested were informed of their rights, federal prosecutors said in court filings Monday.

Only one of the 260 people detained in the raid at Swift and Company's beef and lamb plants Dec. 12 requested a lawyer and about 75 people without criminal records agreed to be sent back to Mexico that night without a hearing, the filing said.

A total of 1,282 people were arrested at Swift plants in six states in the raid, which Immigrations and Customs Enforcement said was a crackdown on an identity-theft scheme. Only 65 are facing identity-theft or other criminal charges. The others were held for suspected immigration violations.

The union representing plant workers has asked a federal judge to order the release of the detained workers, arguing that their constitutional rights have been violated.

The United Food and Commercial Workers claim the workers were denied access to lawyers, held without being charged or offered bond and deported without hearings. They also claim that the raid was an excuse to round up suspected illegal immigrants and that workers were illegally stopped and questioned by immigration agents in the Greeley plant's cafeteria.

"The sheer disparity between the numbers of employees arrested versus those charged with any crime related to identity theft is a vivid example of ICE's abuse of its police power," union lawyers said in a filing Monday.

Union representative and worker Joanne Lopez claims ICE agents refused to let her talk to workers in the cafeteria during the raid.

But federal prosecutors argued that no doors were locked in the cafeteria and no one was prevented from leaving. Those who were arrested were advised of their rights twice in English and Spanish _ on the bus on the way to the ICE processing center in Lakewood and in writing once they arrived.

They also said federal government has the authority to arrest anyone in the country illegally without offering them bond or other rights given to criminal defendants.

According to the federal court filing, the lone worker who requested a lawyer was released because he was already in the process of being deported. The filing said it was also difficult to confirm which workers were detained because some of them were using aliases.

Detainees to be returned to state

By Felisa Cardona
Denver Post Staff Writer

About 75 people detained during a raid at a Greeley meatpacking plant last week are returning to Colorado after federal agents transported them against a judge's order to a Texas immigration jail, according to the union representing the plant's workers.

U.S. District Court Judge John Kane signed an order Wednesday that prohibited federal agents from sending detainees in the raid out of state.

"If a federal judge ordered me to do something, I would do it," said Dave Minshall, a spokesman for the United Food and Commercial Workers Local 7. "I have no idea why ICE felt they were exempt from this order."

Also, the union filed suit charging that some of those taken in the raid were illegally detained, jailed and interrogated.

Most of the detainees returning to Colorado are immigrants from countries other than Mexico, such as El Salvador and Guatemala, Minshall said.

Barbara Gonzalez, spokeswoman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said she did not have information about whether detainees were moved from Colorado against a judge's order.

"As a matter of ICE policy, we do not comment on pending litigation," Gonzalez wrote in an e-mail to The Denver Post.

Minshall says some of the 75 detainees may be on their way to the immigration jail in Aurora, but most may be sent to a detention center in Park County.

Park County Jail officials referred questions to a spokesperson, who did not return calls for comment.

On Tuesday, ICE arrested 261 people in a raid at Swift & Co. in Greeley.

Immigration officials say the raids conducted at six Swift & Co. meatpacking plants nationwide were necessary because of a massive identity-theft scheme involving workers at the company.

In Colorado, 10 of the 261 were accused of identity theft and related crimes. Three of the 10 face allegations that they used or tried to use the stolen information for some form of monetary gain other than employment.

The federal government must file written briefs today outlining the reasons why it believes the detentions were lawful.

The union says at least 100 Mexican nationals picked up in Greeley have been allowed to leave the United States voluntarily, a move that also defied Kane's order, Minshall said.

Fannie Mae Ex-Officers Sued by U.S .

ERIC DASH

Fannie Mae's main regulator sued the company's former chairman and chief executive, Franklin D. Raines, and two top financial officers yesterday in an effort to extract more than $215 million in bonus payouts and fines over their involvement in a huge-scale accounting scandal.

The regulator, the Office of Federal Housing and Enterprise Oversight, is seeking about $100 million in penalties. But its effort to recoup more than $115 million in bonus payments is notable for its rarity and size.

Even in the aftermath of the Enron scandal, only a handful of company boards have aggressively tried to claw back executive bonuses or departure packages when questionable accounting or wrongdoing was later discovered. The Securities and Exchange Commission has rarely taken similar action. And previous cases have involved much smaller amounts of money.

But the regulator here, known in government shorthand as Ofheo, seems intent on sending a message to Capitol Hill, where legislation is to be debated that would give the office greater authority.

"Ofheo basically may be trying to send a signal that they are going to be really tough under their jurisdiction," said Henry T. Hu, a professor at the University of Texas Law School. "They traditionally have not had the clout compared to other regulators for banks. And by bringing this action, they may want to send the fear of God to these executives."

Ofheo filed 101 civil charges against Mr. Raines; Fannie Mae's former chief financial officer, J. Timothy Howard; and the former controller, Leanne G. Spencer.

The Ofheo director, James B. Lockhart III, said in a conference call yesterday: "We believed as an agency that these three individuals, separately and together, did serious harm to the company. There is a long list of charges that show they allowed this company to grow out of control."

Echoing many findings that the agency's 27-month investigation into Fannie Mae uncovered in May, the lawsuit contended that the three executives took part in widespread misconduct and mismanagement from 1998 to 2004. It accused them of filing misleading financial reports, improperly applying accounting principles while knowingly failing to establish sound internal controls and misleading regulators. All the while, the three were said to have been manipulating Fannie Mae earnings to maximize their bonuses.

A lawyer representing Mr. Raines, Kevin M. Downey, called the accusations false and said in a letter to Ofheo that Mr. Lockhart was a "fatally biased regulator" who was using "Mr. Raines as a prop in the interests" of his own political agenda. He called on Mr. Lockhart to remove himself immediately from any further regulatory action.

Steven M. Salky, a lawyer for Mr. Howard, called the charges "a work of unsubstantiated fiction." David S. Krakoff, a lawyer for Ms. Spencer, did not return a phone call requesting comment.

Ofheo's move yesterday will set in motion a complex legal process that could take years to resolve. Upon its filing, the suit will go to an administrative law judge who will oversee hearings and eventually make a ruling. The judge will then present his decision to the director of Ofheo, who may accept, modify or set it aside. Should a defendant disagree with the findings, he or she may appeal the decision to a federal court judge for review. Mr. Downey said yesterday that Ofheo should allow the executives to challenge the agency's findings immediately in federal court.

The administrative law process can be cumbersome. Ofheo filed a similar suit against the former chief executive and chief financial officers of another federal-linked lender, Freddie Mac, in December 2003, seeking civil penalties and the return of more than $37 million in bonuses. That case has been bogged down in intense battles for three years and is still wending its way through administrative law courts.

Ofheo said it was seeking more than $100 million in civil penalties "in light of the multibillion-dollar harm" Fannie Mae caused to investors. The company recently completed a $6.3 billion restatement to correct its financial results up to 2004, among the largest for any public company.

But Wall Street analysts expect that it will be at least a year before Fannie Mae can issue current financial statements. The company's shares slipped 11 cents yesterday, to $60.16.

In May, Fannie Mae agreed to pay $400 million in civil penalties to resolve charges with Ofheo and the S.E.C. The Justice Department and the S.E.C., while no longer investigating the company, have said that they continue to look at other former employees who were involved in the scandal.

Fannie Mae declined to comment on the Ofheo lawsuit.

Ofheo is also seeking a cease-and-desist order that would bar Mr. Raines and the other defendants from conducting business with Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Since Fannie Mae is bearing their legal bills, it is also asking that they pay back those fees if there is a finding of misconduct.

But perhaps Ofheo's boldest action yesterday was in seeking to recoup the bonuses. In its complaint, the regulator asked that Mr. Raines, Mr. Howard and Ms. Spencer give back a total of more than $115 million in bonus payouts from 1998 to 2004, which the agency contends represented unjust enrichment. Under this arrangement, the former executives would be allowed to retain only their salaries.

It is asking Mr. Raines to give back about $84.6 million of the $91.1 million that he collected. In the past, the agency said that roughly $52 million of that amount was directly tied to the achievement of earnings targets.

But in an interview yesterday, Ofheo's general counsel, Alfred Pollard, said that the new, higher amount reflected the regulator's interest in recovering past stock-option compensation, too.

"We are also alleging these people were engaging in misconduct and mismanagement," he said. "Options, in effect, are given for working for the company, and it was mismanaged so they didn't deserve it."

Ofheo is asking that Mr. Howard return some $27.3 million and Ms. Spencer about $5.6 million in pay. But in the complaint and news release, it made no mention of recovering pensions or other funds.

Mr. Pollard said that the regulator was still interested in recouping that money. Even though Mr. Raines was ousted over the accounting problems, he received a pension valued around $25 million, according to a Harvard study. Mr. Howard's pension was estimated at $6 million.

Jackson Memorial settles fraud suit

Jackson Memorial Health System, the Miami-based parent company of 1,776-bed Jackson Memorial Hospital, becomes the sixth hospital client of Healthcare Financial Advisors to settle Medicare cost reporting fraud allegations with the U.S. attorney in Los Angeles, agreeing to pay $14.25 million to settle a 1998 whistle-blower lawsuit. Government prosecutors and whistle-blower Mark Razin, a former reimbursement specialist with HFA, allege that HFA helped the public hospital system and other hospital clients defraud Medicare and Medicaid by seeking and obtaining reimbursements for unallowable costs on reopened cost reports, and allegedly concealing those wrongful overpayments from the government.

Some of those overpayments date back to 1987. HFA, now part of Cupertino, Calif.-based Certus

Software, was a revenue recovery firm that would reopen closed Medicare cost reports and was paid by hospitals on a contingency fee basis from any reimbursements they uncovered. To date, the investigation has implicated more than 20 hospitals and recovered $50 million for government health insurance programs. Jackson Memorial, overseen by the Public Health Trust of Dade County, settled without admitting wrongdoing.

In a news release Jackson Memorial officials said: “These discrepancies occurred long before the current administration was in place at Jackson Health System. We look forward to working with the U.S. government to ensure compliance on all future billings.”

Pa. Christian college sues government over job posting service

PITTSBURGH_A Christian college in Pennsylvania and a religious law group have sued the state and federal governments over the school's bid to use a state-funded employment service to post openings for jobs with religious requirements.

Attorneys representing the Christian Legal Society and Alliance Defense Fund filed the suit Thursday in Pittsburgh on behalf of Geneva College in Beaver Falls and the Association of Faith-Based Organizations, a coalition based in Springfield, Va.

The plaintiffs say the school is being denied the use of the employment service, which includes an Internet-based service called CareerLink, because of a nondiscrimination policy barring job postings that require applicants to have particular religious backgrounds.

"Religious organizations have every legal right to hire employees that share their beliefs and values," Timothy J. Tracey, a lawyer for the Christian Legal Society's Center for Law and Religious Freedom, said in a statement.

The plaintiffs want the nondiscrimination policy declared unconstitutional when it applies to religious organizations and the government ordered to allow faith-based groups to post their employment notices on CareerLink.

The suit names U.S. Labor Secretary Elaine Chao and Secretary of the Pennsylvania Department of Labor and Industry Stephen M. Schmerin. A U.S. Department of Labor spokesman declined immediate comment. State labor department spokesman Barry Ciccocioppo also declined comment, saying officials had not seen the lawsuit.

Christian Legal Society, based in Annandale, Va., is an association of Christian lawyers, law students, professors and judges, according to its Web site.

Lawyer says Australian terror suspect cannot be visited by psychiatrist at Guantanamo Bay

By ROD McGUIRK

Associated Press Writer

CANBERRA, Australia_U.S. military authorities have refused to allow an independent psychiatric assessment of an Australian terror suspect held at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, his Pentagon-appointed lawyer said Tuesday.

Maj. Michael Mori said he had requested such an assessment because he became concerned about the mental state of alleged Taliban fighter David Hicks during a visit to Guantanamo Bay on Dec. 9-10.

"I was informed that the policy was that the defense counsel cannot bring down mental health experts anymore," Mori told Australian Broadcasting Corp. radio. Mori said he was given no explanation for the change.

Paul Mullen, a professor of forensic psychiatry from the Victoria state Forensic Mental Health Service, said he had visited Hicks at Guantanamo Bay for two days in February last year and was planning a return visit before he learned of the policy change last week.

"Without independent mental health professionals coming in from outside, we have no real idea what sort of state of mind this man is in and how close he is to suicide," Mullen told the ABC.

"It's an outrageous situation from a mental health perspective," he added.

Mullen said the 31-year-old Australian and his fellow prisoners did not trust the psychiatrists and psychologists available in Guantanamo Bay because those mental health experts had been involved in the interrogation processes.

The defense lawyers also needed to know what Hicks' mental state was when he made statements to his interrogators and whether he was mentally fit to stand trial.

Mori said Hicks had been help in solitary confinement for the past nine months.

Hicks' father, Terry Hicks, said he had ongoing concerns about his son's mental state.

Terry Hicks said he was scheduled on Wednesday to have a telephone conversation with his son, who he was told might refuse to talk because of "emotion stress."

"I don't think anyone can cope with nine months in isolation," Terry Hicks told the ABC.

"David would have coped for a little while but then the isolation, no one to talk to, guards are not allowed to talk to him, he doesn't see anyone else _ it must have some sort of strain on the mental side," he added.

Hicks was captured in Afghanistan by the Northern Alliance in December, 2001, and was sent a month later to the U.S. naval base on Cuba.

He was charged with attempted murder, conspiracy to commit war crimes and aiding the enemy, and was selected to face a U.S. military tribunal.

He pleaded not guilty to the charges, which were withdrawn and his case was thrown into limbo when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled the military tribunals illegal in June.

Couple Fired Over Security Wins Lawsuit

By SEAN D. HAMILL

The federal government turned their lives upside down, but an Iranian immigrant couple, Aliakbar and Shahla Afshari, say they always believed in the system.

The Afsharis' faith was rewarded earlier this month when the federal government admitted it made a mistake more than two-and-a-half years ago, when they were fired from their jobs with the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health in Morgantown, W.Va. The reason given for their dismissals was that they had failed a secret background check, 18 years after moving to the United States.

The government agreed to pay more than $600,000 to settle a lawsuit filed by the couple after they were fired and escorted from their workplaces on May 5, 2004. The agreement also allows Mr. Afshari to return to his agency engineering job. Mrs. Afshari will not return to her job as a laboratory researcher because she is attending dental school.

Most important, the Afsharis said, are the letters they received from the agency director, John Howard. Mr. Howard, who approved their dismissals, said they should not have happened.

"What we really wanted more than anything else in the world was to clear our name," said Mrs. Afshari.

Since the government did not reveal why the Afsharis had failed the background checks, or why they were being checked so long after they came to the United States, their case drew concern from civil liberty groups.

"This case illustrates what can happen when government attempts to hide behind a veil of secrecy," said Andrew Schneider, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of West Virginia.

The Afsharis' lead lawyer, Allan N. Karlin, of Morgantown, said: "The government never actually told us what it was that triggered this. All that is clear is that it was an association issue."

A Department of Justice spokesman, Charles Miller, said the government acknowledged settling the case, "but that's all we can say."

The Afsharis said they thought they had been fired because they took their children to two conventions of the Muslim Students Association, in 1998 and 1999. On one trip, a friend later deported for immigration violations went with them. The Federal Bureau of Investigation has said the association has close ties to the Iranian government.

Mr. Karlin said he had also learned that someone at the agency identified the couple's daughter, Azadeh, who was majoring in exercise physiology at West Virginia University and working at a clinic at the agency, as a "foreign national" and began asking questions about her.

Their dismissal had severe repercussions for the family.

Out of work, the couple spent their savings, cashed in their pension accounts and took on credit card debt to make ends meet.

Some friends and colleagues shunned the couple, and a classmate told their younger son, Amin, then in sixth grade, that his parents were “terrorists.”

“We had a really hard time,” Mrs. Afshari, 45, said. “But at the same time, we got to know who our real friends were, and got to know some really great people who helped us.”

Mr. Afshari, 54, returned last week to his job. Albert E. Munson, an agency official who had objected to the dismissals, said: “We are just terribly happy to have Ali back. He’s just a great guy.”

Last year, when the Afsharis became eligible to apply for citizenship, they considered not applying. The application is being processed.

“What we believed all along is that this is a great country,” Mrs. Afshari said. “Wrong things may happen, but as long as you have a chance to raise your voice and ask questions, you can get justice.”

Wilkins dodges Arar query; U.S. ambassador won't comment on why Canadian is still on watch list

OTTAWA Canadian PressFRONT

A new passport requirement for travel to the United States is currently the only serious irritant between the two countries, U.S. Ambassador David Wilkins said yesterday, failing to mention the Maher Arar affair during a prepared speech.

Wilkins, Washington's top diplomat in Canada, was finally asked by an audience member at a Rotary Club luncheon to explain why Arar's name remains on an American watch list as a potential threat to the country.

The ambassador would only point to a headline-grabbing statement he made last week in which he said Arar's deportation from the United States and his continuing negative status was based on information gleaned from various sources.

He twice said that people who want to be removed from a watch list are welcome to apply to have their status reconsidered.

"While I appreciate your question, I issued a statement Friday about that, I stand behind it and that's all I'm going to say on it," Wilkins said.

"There is a process about a watch list, people can apply to be removed, there is a procedure in place."

Being on a watch list prevents one from travelling in the United States or even flying over U.S. airspace.

Arar, a Canadian citizen, was arrested by U.S. officials while he was transiting through a New York airport in 2002. Canadian police had provided faulty information to them suggesting Arar had ties to Al Qaeda. He was eventually deported to Syria, where he was imprisoned and tortured.

But Arar's name was cleared in the fall by a public inquiry led by Justice Dennis O'Connor, who said it was unlikely the U.S. relied on any other information but that provided by Canada. Prime Minister

Stephen Harper has asked the U.S. government to apologize to Arar, but settled on a promise they would collaborate more fully on any future deportation\l "l" cases.

A counsel for O'Connor said Friday he suspected that Washington had a vested interested in not clearing Arar's name.

That assessment was just about the only thing Wilkins would react to when pressed repeatedly by reporters to speak about Arar.

"I certainly would think it would be a mistake for you to read that into the position that's been taken by the United States," Wilkins said.

He said that he would not comment further because there is still litigation pending in the United States on Arar's case. Arar filed a challenge last Tuesday in a U.S. Appeals court after a lower court threw out the case in February, arguing that there was a greater need to protect secrecy and diplomacy.

On the passport issue, Wilkins reiterated the line U.S. President George Bush has taken that the new identification requirement is a legislative reality that Canadians must come to grips with.

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 18

TERRORISM NEWS:

American Convicted Of Aiding Taliban Arrested For Violating Parole. The AP (12/20, Jordan) reports James Ujaama, "an American convicted of helping the Taliban was back in federal court Tuesday for violating the terms of his probation, authorities said." Ujaama, "a Muslim convert from Seattle, was arrested over the weekend in Belize — where, under the terms of his supervised release, he was not supposed to be, Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said." Ujaama was "brought back Tuesday to the United States, and waived his rights to a removal hearing in U.S. District Court in Miami."

The Washington Times (12/20, Seper, 88K) reports Ujaama "pleaded guilty in 2003 to conspiring to provide cash, computers and fighters to the Taliban, but fled after agreeing to cooperate in ongoing investigations." Authorities said Ujaama "entered Belize, a small country on the eastern coast of Central America, 10 days ago using a phony Mexican passport." Ujaama, who "served two years in a plea agreement on charges of dealing with al Qaeda and providing various types of material support to the Taliban, has since been turned over to U.S. authorities, said Leonard Hill, deputy chief of mission at the U.S. Embassy."

Administration Freezes Assets Of British Citizen Over Alleged Terror Ties. The AP (12/20, Aversa) reports the Bush Administration "took action Tuesday to freeze financial accounts and assets of a naturalized British citizen for allegedly providing 'material and logistical' support to al-Qaida and other terror groups." The action "against Mohammed Al Ghabra means that any bank accounts or other financial assets belonging to him found in the United States must be frozen." The Treasury Department "alleged that Al Ghabra had organized travel to Pakistan for people seeking to meet with senior al-Qaida officials and to undertake jihad training. Several of those people returned to the United Kingdom to engage in covert activity on behalf of al-Qaida, the department said."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Al-Haramain NSA Surveillance Suit Consolidated With Others In California. The Oregonian (12/20, Green, 318K) reports, "An Oregon lawsuit challenging a federal warrantless eavesdropping program has been shipped to a judge in San Francisco who is handling dozens of similar cases. The move, ordered by a judicial panel that consolidates groups of lawsuits with related legal issues, takes the Oregon case away from U.S. District Judge Garr M. King in Portland." The Al-Haramain

DOJ_NMG_0107680

Islamic Foundation "case has been sent to U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker, who earlier this year refused the federal government's attempt to dismiss a similar case that accuses AT&T of illegally cooperating with the program."

US Cancels Order For 75 Million Doses Of Anthrax Vaccine. The New York Times (12/20, Lipton, 1.16M) reports that in a "major setback to the Bush administration's biodefense efforts, the government announced Tuesday that it had canceled an order for 75 million doses of a new anthrax vaccine, the single biggest purchase planned for the nation's antiterror drug stockpile." Since "VaxGen of Brisbane, Calif., won the contract two years ago, skeptics have questioned the ability of the company, a small biotechnology business, to deliver on such a large order, as well as the administration's capacity to properly manage the overall $5.6 billion program, known as BioShield." Department of Health and Human Services officials "terminated the $877 million contract Tuesday after VaxGen failed to start required clinical trials, a delay caused by troubles with the vaccine formula."

The Washington Post (12/20, A1, Merle, 690K) reports, "Federal health officials yesterday scuttled the largest piece of the Bush administration's two-year program to counter bioterrorism, canceling an $877.5 million contract with VaxGen to develop an anthrax vaccine after the company missed a deadline to begin human testing." The decision, "delivered in a one-page letter, ends a troubled effort by the small California firm that has come to symbolize the failures of the government's ambitious $5.6 billion Project BioShield. The termination occurred on the same day President Bush signed legislation attempting to salvage the program by reorganizing its management and pumping more money into firms doing the work."

CIA Reports Success With New Recruiting Program. Fox News' Special Report (12/19, Hume) reported the Central Intelligence Agency "has found itself with some good news to report at the end of the year. 2006, as it turns out, has been a record recruiting year. Five years after 9/11, more Americans than ever before want to work for the CIA." A new recruiting campaign "is apparently working. In 2006 134,000 people applied for jobs, more than double the number of applicants in 2001, the year of the September 11 attacks. And one in four new CIA employees is fluent in a foreign language like Arabic or Korean. The White House has ordered the agency to bolster staff by record numbers." CIA Chief of Human Resources Cindy Bower: "We have been directed by the President to increase hiring in a number of areas, including analysis, engineering, that requires obviously some administrative support."

Intelligence Agencies, Military Rely On Technology For Translation. USA Today (12/20, 1A, Willing, 2.27M) reports that intelligence agencies "and the military are turning to technology developed for call centers, sporting events and television shopping channels to compensate for an ongoing shortage of qualified translators, interviews and public documents show." In "Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, the Defense Department's research arm is testing portable translation devices that allow English-speaking soldiers to hold conversations with Iraqis." Government-backed researchers are also "working to convert broadcasts and website postings from Arabic and Mandarin Chinese into English and to build search engines that can extract complex information from the translated texts. These efforts are part of a government plan to bolster the thin ranks of skilled translators, say researchers and experts, so human translators can focus on more demanding projects."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says US "Not Winning" In Iraq, Plans Boost In Overall Size Of Armed Forces. Under the headline "US Not Winning War In Iraq, Bush Says For 1st Time," the Washington Post (12/20, A1, Baker, 690K) reports on its Oval Office interview with President Bush. The President told the Post he "plans to expand the overall size of the 'stressed' US armed forces to meet the challenges of a long-term global struggle against terrorists." In addition, "as he searches for a new strategy for Iraq, Bush has now adopted the formula advanced by his top military adviser to describe the situation. 'We're not winning, we're not losing,' Bush said." That "assessment was a striking reversal for a president who, days before the November elections, declared, 'Absolutely, we're winning.'" The Post adds, "In another turnaround, Bush said he has ordered Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates to develop a plan to increase the troop strength of the Army and Marine Corps, heeding warnings from the Pentagon and Capitol Hill that multiple deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan are stretching the armed forces toward the breaking point."

DOJ_NMG_0107681

Bush's interview with the Washington Post is generating extensive, generally positive media coverage. Much of it focuses on the announcement about the expansion of the Armed Forces' size. USA Today (12/20, Kelley, Brook, 2.27M) reports "members of Congress and military experts welcomed Bush's comments Tuesday, saying that a larger military would ease the strain on today's troops." Rep. Ike Skelton, "a Missouri Democrat and incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, 'would welcome anyone' supporting a larger military, said his spokeswoman Loren Dealy." Democratic Sen. Jack Reed, "a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said in a statement that an increase has been needed for years and called on Bush to fund it in his budget."

ABC World News (12/19, story 4, Karl, 8.78M) said "the President has seen the Army is stretched so thin, that his hands as Commander in Chief are tied. If he wants to surge more troops into Iraq, he's told he can only do it at a short period of time. If another crisis breaks out elsewhere in the world, he is told he has only has 10,000 available troops trained and ready to go." The CBS Evening News (12/19, lead story, 2:55, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "When President Bush met with defense leaders last week at the Pentagon, he got an earful from the Joint Chiefs of Staff about how badly the military is feeling the strain of fighting wars in Iraq and Afghanistan with no end in sight." CBS also reported, "The services are currently meeting their recruiting goals. To bring in more, they will have to increase the number of recruiters out there, and also, undoubtedly, increase the financial incentives for signing up."

The announcement is being portrayed as a sharp departure from the approach advocated by former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. NBC Nightly News (12/19, story 3, 2:50, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "This is a total reversal of the Pentagon's former policy under…Rumsfeld and comes only one day after Rumsfeld stepped down. Amid growing concern that the war in Iraq could break the US Army and Marines, President Bush told the Washington Post today he wants to expand the size of the armed forces to fight the long-term war against terrorists." The New York Times (12/20, Shanker, Rutenberg, 1.16M) also says Bush's comments "indicated that the administration was breaking abruptly with the stance taken by…Rumsfeld, the former Pentagon chief, who championed the view that better intelligence and technological advancements could substitute for a bigger military."

Bush Says Election An Indication Voters "Not Satisfied With Progress In Iraq." In an analysis piece, the Washington Post (12/20, A14, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "Ever since Republicans were routed last month in what was widely seen as a repudiation of his Iraq strategy," Bush "has been busily listing why his policies there will not be changing." Yesterday, in his interview with the Washington Post, Bush "bluntly dismissed the suggestion that the midterm elections meant voters want to bring the mission in that country to closure. He said he interpreted the election results 'as people not satisfied with the progress' in Iraq." The comments "were another strong indication of the president's determination to chart his own way forward on Iraq, no matter the election results nor any amount of free advice from senior statesmen of past administrations."

Smith Contends Situation In Iraq Is "Beyond Our Control. Sen. Gordon Smith (R), on Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (12/19), defended his recent criticism of the war in Iraq by noting he's not calling for "cut and run," instead he's saying "let's fight the war on terror more intelligently, let's fight it smarter. … What you now have in Iraq is a war that has mutated into something very different from what we began. And frankly, the fix here is beyond our control. There are essentially political questions that the Iraqis have to answer as to their own federal system, how they divide the resources and how they live together peacefully." Smith added, "what I won't stand by and watch any longer is…our being targets in a shooting gallery and both of them are shooting at us. … President Bush has done many things right. But frankly, it breaks my heart to see him wrecking his administration on the rocks of Iraq and a war we can't fix."

Rice Says Bush Considering Sending More Troops To Iraq. McClatchy (12/20, Strobel) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday that President Bush is considering a surge of additional US troops into Iraq to help secure Baghdad - despite strong reservations by some US military leaders and the incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee." Said Rice, "The president has to decide whether he thinks some adjustments in American troop levels and what American troops would do is necessitated by current circumstances. … Anything he considers will certainly look at what can be done about the security of Baghdad." Rice "said Bush, who's due to announce his new tactics in early January, wouldn't decide before further consultations with new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and military commanders." But "a number of active and retired generals already have expressed serious doubts about sending more troops to Iraq, saying there's little likelihood that the 20,000 to 30,000 troops under discussion would make a difference."

NBC Nightly News (12/19, story 3, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) said "Democratic lawmakers said any surge in forces would be a tough political sell," and "most military leaders still think the best option is to accelerate the training for the Iraqi forces so they can take over the fight but acknowledge that could still take years." The Washington Post (12/20, A14, Pincus, 690K) reports, "Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), the incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, questioned the purpose of sending an additional 20,000 U.S. troops into Baghdad, the surge option being mentioned as one strategy change in Iraq being considered by President Bush. 'What is the military mission?' Skelton asked yesterday during a meeting with reporters. 'I don't think it will change a thing,' he said, adding: Would the added troops 'exacerbate the problem by being more targets? Is there something to go after that we don't know?'"

Rice Suggests There Will Be No Big US Policy Shift In Iraq, Broader Mideast. The Wall Street Journal (12/20, A4, King, 2.04M) reports, "This should be Condoleezza Rice's moment. The secretary of state's longtime rival, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, is gone. Her ties to President Bush appear as strong as ever. Her popularity remains high, even as support for the president ebbs. And voices on all sides are calling for more diplomacy, more outreach -- core strengths of the department she heads." However, "as she moves into her third year as the nation's top diplomat, she faces doubt over the administration's Iraq strategy and finds herself embattled and increasingly defensive." At the same time, the Secretary is about to embark on "a new diplomatic push in the Middle East to win increased support in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories from what she calls 'mainstream states' such as Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia," but in a roundtable discussion with reporters yesterday, Rice "firmly defended the administration's current approach in the region and made clear that stark shifts aren't in the offing." Seeking to "counter her critics" and to put "a positive gloss on the instability now rippling through the Middle East," Rice "touted what she described as 'a new opportunity' to get moderate forces in the region 'to support the development of stable new governments in Iraq and Lebanon...and to make progress toward the emergence of a Palestinian state that is founded on the same principles.'" As the White House continues to weigh changes to its Iraq strategy, Rice "argues that a new alignment is shaping up in the Middle East that offers fresh promise for a new US diplomatic effort."

Iraq War Costs To Top $110 Billion This Year. The CBS Evening News (12/19, story 2, 0:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported "the financial cost of the war in Iraq is growing by the day. Today, the White House budget office said it will probably top $110 billion for this fiscal year alone."

USA Today (12/20, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman said there was no firm estimate of the costs for fiscal 2007, which began Oct. 1. When he was asked if the $110 billion estimate was now too low, Portman said, 'Yes.' He said the final figure 'depends on a lot of things that are not yet decided. One is the policy moving forward.'" Portman's statement "adds fuel to speculation that the war costs will top last year's record $120 billion." The New York Times (12/20, Stolberg, 1.16M) also notes the story in a brief report.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

NASD Accuses Morgan Stanley Of Using 9/11 As Excuse To Conceal E-Mails. USA Today (12/20, 1B, Farrell, 2.27M) reports, "Once again, an old e-mail issue is coming back to haunt Morgan Stanley. For the second time this year, a national regulator has accused Morgan Stanley of stonewalling requests for documents and withholding crucial e-mails from investigators. The NASD claimed Tuesday that Morgan Stanley hid the existence of millions of e-mails from customers of its Dean Witter brokerage. According to an NASD complaint, executives at Morgan Stanley used the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, as an alibi for their inability to produce a massive trove of e-mails sought by customers who felt they'd been burned by bad advice from Dean Witter brokers." NASD says that while Morgan Stanley's "e-mail servers were, in fact, destroyed in those attacks," the company by Sep. 17, 2001, "was able to use emergency backup tapes to restore all e-mail through Aug. 30, 2001, to the Morgan Stanley internal database."

The Wall Street Journal (12/20, A3, Pessin, 2.04M) reports, ""While the NASD charges focus on arbitration cases involving small individual investors, Morgan Stanley's document-retention problems also played a large role in litigation between the firm and investor Ronald Perelman."

Investors Seen As Unlikely To Reopen Arbitration Cases. The Washington Post (12/20, D1, Johnson, 690K) reports, "Investors have little hope of reopening their arbitration cases, however, because they are unlikely to meet the high standard for doing so, legal analysts said. To prevail, investors would need to prove that individual Morgan Stanley brokers intentionally withheld the e-mail messages or committed fraud -- accusations the NASD stopped short of making yesterday."

Accounting Board Scraps Sarbanes-Oxley Audit Rule. The Washington Post (12/20, D1, Johnson, 690K) reports, "Accounting industry overseers yesterday scrapped an audit rule targeted by businesses as expensive and burdensome, proposing looser guidelines that would direct accountants to focus on the integrity of corporate managers and the most risky aspects of a company's financial reports." The proposal is "designed to address the most contentious part of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, passed by Congress after problems at Enron and WorldCom tarnished the reputation of the accounting profession and rocked investor confidence." Criticism over the rule "and charges that it is prompting fewer companies to list their shares on U.S. markets have gathered momentum in recent months, which was acknowledged by Mark W. Olson, chairman of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board." The "proposed change, which will be subject to more than two months of public comment, 'will help transform the rule into a cornerstone accomplishment rather than a provision that continues to be associated with adverse market trends,' Olson said."

Amid Backdating Practices, Murray Cites Potential "Grand Bargain" Of Greater Prosecution For Less Regulation Of Corporate Behavior. In a column appearing in the Wall Street Journal (12/20, A2, 2.04M) Alan Murray writes, "The prevalence of backdating raises the question: Has the corporate-reform movement really gone too far? Or has it not gone far enough? … In the midst of this rancorous debate, Ira Millstein, who has long labored in corporate governance, is the rare voice of sanity. Mr. Millstein, senior partner at Weil, Gotshal & Manges, rightly argues that some of the post-Enron reforms have gone too far. … [I]n return for those changes, Mr. Millstein wants 'the grand bargain'" Instead of more regulation, more prosecution and more litigation give shareholders more power to oversee the companies in which they invest."

Financial Times Calls McNulty Changes "Semantics." Financial Times (12/20) editorializes, "Last week the head of the [Justice] department's white collar crime fighters, Paul McNulty, announced new guidelines for prosecutors: from now on, they will have to get approval directly from him if they want to ask a company to waive the confidentiality that normally protects communications with its lawyers - and if the company refuses, it can no longer be penalised for doing so…. So far, so laudable. For too long, prosecutors have abused their power by demanding that companies show their willingness to co-operate with the government by waiving the sacred privilege that normally protects communications with their lawyers." However, Financial Times writes, "[I]n one important respect, the changes appear more semantic than real: prosecutors may not penalise companies for refusing to disclose communications with their lawyers - but they may still reward them for doing so. The end result is the same: you waive, or you lose."

Defense lawyers, Others Skeptical Of McNulty Memo. The National Law Journal (12/20, Coyle) reports, "In the wake of newly revised guidelines for federal prosecutors investigating and prosecuting corporations, the key question, according to white-collar criminal defense lawyers, is: Are the guidelines meaningful change or strategic retreat?: William McGuinness, who chairs the New York litigation department at Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson, calls the McNulty memo a "strategic retreat." And "[m]any defense lawyers, legal scholars, and members of a broad coalition of business and civil liberties groups that had lobbied intensely for changes in the Thompson memorandum echoed McGuinness' skepticism."

Forrester CFO Resigns In Option Irregularity. The AP (12/20) reports, "Forrester Research Inc. said late Tuesday its Chief Financial Officer and Treasurer Warren Hadley resigned after an internal investigation found irregularities regarding an option grant for 5,000 shares made to him in 1999."

Empowered Legal Department Can Reduce A Company's Risks. The Wall Street Journal (12/20, Cova, Dance, 2.04M) reports, "Several factors are driving legal risks to the forefront: aggressive development and enforcement of regulations in the U.S. and Europe; more cooperation and communication among regulatory authorities world-wide; and a public and media happy to punish companies that appear to 'misbehave' or break their promises." Noting that "what initially seems to be a marginal legal issue" can grow "into a bet-the-company type of risk," the Journal writes, "A duly empowered legal department can help directors govern better, and shield them from liability. Legal and regulatory issues can be a huge driver of a company's strategy." The Journal adds, "Once a problem has erupted, it is often the legal response that determines whether and how quickly a company recovers, as in the skillfully handled crises at Tyco, Marsh & McLennan, Royal Dutch Shell and others. Some boards' failure to pay attention to legal issues is even more surprising considering that, more and more often, authorities explicitly direct corporations to identify and demonstrate how they are reducing legal risks, such as implementing compliance programs. Increasingly, regulators sternly punish those who fail to do so."

Amtrak Dismisses Five Executives. Law.com (12/20, Palmer) reports, "New Amtrak President Alex Kummant engineered a major management restructuring Monday, firing five top officials and naming Eleanor Acheson, assistant attorney general for policy development under President Bill Clinton, as the passenger rail's general counsel. The move comes after a call earlier this month by outgoing House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee Chairman Don Young, R-Alaska, and Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., for the Department of Justice to investigate Amtrak's legal department and outside counsel after the release of an inspector general's report, which found that Amtrak mismanaged more than $100 million in legal bills." Law.com adds, "In a Dec. 18 letter to Amtrak employees, Kummant announced the firing of Chief Financial Officer David Smith, Assistant Vice President of Transportation Thomas Schmidt, Police Chief Alfred Broadbent, Vice President for Marketing and Sales Barbara Richardson, and Vice President of Corporate Communications William Schulz. The letter also stated that Acheson will replace Alicia Serfaty as general counsel and corporate secretary."

Bond Lawyers Groups Warns Members On Anticompetitive Practices. Bloomberg (12/20, Richard, Preston) reports, "The National Association of Bond Lawyers, a group of attorneys who advise U.S. state and local governments on borrowings, plans to warn members about anti- competitive practices amid a growing government probe of the municipal bond market. The Justice Department investigation into potential bid- rigging in municipal investment contracts prompted the Chicago- based association to schedule a conference call with members to review potential abuses, said Carol Lew, president of the group and a public finance lawyer at Stradling Yocca Carlson & Rauth in Orange County, California." Bloomberg continues, "U.S. state and local governments that borrow in the almost 200-year-old municipal debt market rely on the opinions of attorneys and advisers to assure potential investors that their bonds clear requirements by the Internal Revenue Service and will remain tax-exempt. … The Justice Department's criminal investigation stems from an IRS review that found municipal bond deals robbed federal taxpayers of more than $100 million."

Vitesse Discloses "Wide Array Of Irregularities." The Wall Street Journal (12/20, A14, Seward, 2.04M) reports, "Vitesse Semiconductor Corp. said it had found a wide-ranging array of irregularities at the company, including options backdating, bogus sales invoices, improper revenue recognition, inflated reporting of cash balances and a failure to take write-offs for returned merchandise. The disclosures came as a result of an internal review, which was started in April to examine options practices, by a special committee of Vitesse's board. … The irregularities at Vitesse, based in Camarillo, Calif., were so widespread that the company said it would likely be unable to file restated financials for the 2004 and 2005 fiscal years."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Maryland Court Suspends Executions. The Baltimore Sun (12/20, McMenamin, 257K) reports, "In a narrowly tailored decision with potentially sweeping consequences, Maryland's highest court ordered a halt Tuesday to executions in the state, ruling that procedures for putting prisoners to death were never submitted for the public review required by law." Under the Court of Appeals ruling, "state prison officials face the prospect of having to submit the execution protocols to the scrutiny of a joint legislative committee and schedule a public hearing on the issue. Alternatively, the court ruled, the legislature could exempt the execution procedures from that review process -- something that one state senator characterized as 'very unlikely.'"

The New York Times (12/20, Liptak, 1.16M) reports, "The ruling follows similar developments in two other states on Friday." Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida "suspended executions there after a troubled execution that lasted 34 minutes and required a second dose of lethal chemicals, while a federal judge in California ruled that the state's lethal injection protocol violated the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment."

The Washington Times (12/20, Miller, 88K) reports "the decision set the stage for a debate about capital punishment and lethal injection in the upcoming General Assembly session." The Washington Post (12/20, B1, Rich, Wagner, 690K) says Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) or his Democratic successor, Martin O'Malley, "must act if executions are to resume." Last night, O'Malley, "who takes office Jan. 17, called on Ehrlich to leave the issue for the incoming administration. … An Ehrlich aide said the administration was reviewing the matter and had not decided how to proceed." The Post adds, "Because of the effort required to correct the defect identified by the court, many death penalty opponents said they expect that O'Malley would ultimately chart the state's course." O'Malley "has taken a nuanced position on the issue, saying that he is personally opposed to the death penalty but that his opposition would not prevent him from signing a death warrant."

LATimes Criticizes Schwarzenegger For Trying To Fix, Not End, Death Penalty. The Los Angeles Times (12/20, 850K) says in an editorial, "On ordering changes in the way lethal injections are administered to condemned prisoners in California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is doing the right thing for the wrong reason." But in "promising to redress what" US District Judge Jeremy Fogel "had called a 'pervasive lack of professionalism' in lethal injection, Schwarzenegger didn't emphasize — as the enlightened centrist chief executive he fancies himself should have — the need to spare even convicted murderers cruel and unusual punishment, by a moratorium on executions if necessary. No, Schwarzenegger indicated that he was seeking changes in what is blandly known as Operational Procedure No. 770 to keep judges from thwarting what the governor called 'the will of the people [that] the death penalty is maintained in California.' That death row inmates might be spared excruciating pain would be merely a byproduct of crossing the legal t's and dotting the i's."

Jones Says Gonzales Is Looking At Lacrosse Case. Fox News' On the Record (12/19, 11:44 p.m., Colby) reported, "One congressman is renewing his call for a federal investigation in the Duke rape case. Congressman Walter Jones first lit the fire last week with this stinging question: Did the prosecutor violate the civil rights of the three indicted lacrosse players? He wrote a letter to the attorney general and he called for an investigation into Durham DA Mike Nifong. Well, now he has done it again adding more fuel to the fire with another letter." Jones, speaking with Fox News by phone, said, "I've had two telephone conversations with assistants to Attorney General Gonzales and the assistant on two phone calls told me that they definitely were taking my letter seriously and they were looking into this issue and they had turned the letter over to the civil right division of the Department of Justice."

Justice, FBI To Examine Police Shootings In Georgia. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/20, Gentry, Tagami, 379K) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department and the FBI are looking into fatal police shootings this year in DeKalb County. If civil rights violations are found, appropriate action will be taken,' Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim wrote in a Dec. 12 letter to local activist John Evans, who asked the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division to investigate the DeKalb shootings." DeKalb officers have killed 12 suspects since January, "more than any other police department in metro Atlanta. One officer has also been killed." The Journal-Constitution notes that while "Kim could not be reached for comment Tuesday," a DOJ official "confirmed the federal inquiry into the DeKalb shootings, but would not give details."

US Attorney For Arizona To Leave For Private Practice. The Arizona Republic (12/20, Wagner) reports, "U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton announced Tuesday that that he is quitting his government post to enter private legal practice early next year. Charlton said he will become a partner in the Phoenix-based firm of Gallagher and Kennedy at the end of January. During his stint as the state's top federal lawyer, Charlton oversaw major enforcement initiatives against terrorism, public corruption, illegal immigration and crime in Indian country."

New Mexico US Attorney Asked To Resign. On its Web site, KRQE-TV of Albuquerque (12/19, Herzenberg) reported, "The top federal prosecutor in New Mexico, U.S. Attorney David Iglesias, has been asked to resign and will be giving up the office, KRQE News 13 has learned. Sources confirmed the Department of Justice called Iglesias last week and asked him to resign." KRQE-TV added, "A statement released Monday night by the U.S. Attorney's office spokesman Norm Cairns confirmed Iglesias's departure. … Why Iglesias was asked to resign remains unknown although source said was probably just time for a change."

The Albuquerque Tribune (12/19) added, "After discussions with officials in Washington, D.C., Iglesias decided he would move on, U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman Norm Cairns said. No other information was released. The U.S. Attorney's Office has been involved in two high-profile investigations of public corruption in New Mexico this year with mixed results.

CIVIL LAW:

Suit Focuses Attention On Physicians Not Following Patients' Advance Directives. In a front page story, USA Today (12/20, 1A, Parker, 2.27M) reports on a lawsuit on a case involving Madeline Neumann, who filed an advance directive "instructed doctors not to revive her if she collapsed." After she was found unresponsive in 1995 Neumann "ended up in a hospital, tethered to wires, tubes and life-support machines — just the situation her family says she had hoped to avoid." Although her granddaughters "persuaded doctors to disconnect the machines over the next several days" and she died a week later, they "are suing the Joseph L. Morse Geriatric Center in West Palm Beach and its chief doctor, Jaimy Bensimon, for unspecified damages, claiming they essentially ignored Neumann's wishes." USA Today describes this case as "first time a Florida court has been asked to decide whether a doctor can be held liable for providing treatment at odds with a medical directive." It "could have significant implications for efforts to hold hospitals, nursing homes and physicians accountable if they disregard living wills and advance directives."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

ACLU Document Case Sparks Commentary. USA Today (12/20, 2.27M) editorializes, "Every minute, the U.S. government makes 27 decisions to classify documents. That translates into 1,620 classification decisions every hour, 38,880 every day and 14 million every year. ... it's preposterous to believe that more than a tiny percentage of classifications are justified by national security concerns. They are more probably the result of the bureaucratic impulse to keep secrets and the political instinct to avoid accountability. ... The government should have known [prior restraint] was no way to plug leaks. And it should have realized that the ACLU document wasn't worth making a federal case over."

In an opposing op-ed in USA Today (12/20, 19A, 2.27M), Pepperdine Law Professor Douglas W. Kmiec says, "This was no major victory for civil liberty. It turns out the subpoena sent to the ACLU might have been issued only because the organization's lawyers were looking for a fight. Bad form, even worse constitutional theory. Press freedom cannot be understated in a democratic republic. But it should not be overstated either." Though this "soap opera lends credence to the complaint that too much is kept secret, the remedy is not to take the law into one's own hands."

ACLU Challenges Michigan Anti-Affirmative-Action Initiative. The Detroit News (12/20, Schultz) reports, "The ACLU and NAACP filed suit Tuesday against Proposal 2, the latest salvo in a growing assault just four days before Michigan's ban on affirmative action was to take effect. The challenge was filed on the same day a federal judge agreed to give three Michigan universities a six-month delay before they stop using race as a consideration in admissions and financial aid. The court maneuvers fed a growing concern by affirmative action opponents who fear that the will of the voters, who on Nov. 7 passed the prohibition against using race, is not being respected. Both candidates for governor, and business and other leaders campaigned against the proposal." The News adds, "The ACLU of Michigan, NAACP and others filed a lawsuit on behalf of 19 students, faculty and applicants to U-M asking a judge to allow race and gender preferences to continue in university admissions. Proposal 2 shouldn't undue the U.S. Supreme Court ruling that allows the use of race as a factor in admissions, they argued."

The Detroit Free Press (12/20, Pratt, Bell, 373K) reports, "Civil rights organizations, including the NAACP's Detroit chapter and the American Civil Liberties Union, took their case to federal court. They argued the amendment doesn't apply because of a 2003 U.S. Supreme Court case affirming universities' right to consider race in admissions. … But a Washington-based group that has fought against race and gender preferences said the U.S. Supreme Court already decided the issue when it chose not to hear a challenge to California's Proposition 209, which was passed by voters in 1996. The California law was the model for Proposal 2."

Michigan Universities Win Reprieve From Proposal. Inside Higher Ed (12/20) reports, "A federal judge granted the universities a reprieve from the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative, known as Proposal 2, which was to take effect this week and would bar affirmative action in admissions by public colleges and universities in the state. Michigan State and Wayne State Universities and the University of Michigan sought permission to delay Proposal 2, saying that it would be impractical and unfair for the institutions to change their processes in the middle of an admissions cycle, with some applicants already evaluated and others awaiting review."

Detroit News Sees Assault On Self-Governance. The Detroit News (12/20) editorializes, "The American Civil Liberties Union should add the right of the people to self government to the list of freedoms it is dedicated to protecting. Michigan's ACLU chapter is making a direct assault on that right by asking a federal judge to rewrite the recently passed Proposal 2 anti-affirmative action measure in a way that would render the new law meaningless."

New Jersey Judge Halts Enforcement Of City Gun Law. The New Jersey Law Journal (12/20, Toutant) reports that Hudston County assignment Judge Maurice Gallipoli "on Dec. 13 enjoined enforcement of a Jersey City ordinance limiting handgun purchasers to one gun a month.," saying that "he doubted the ordinance would achieve" it stated end of reducing violence. Also, "he found it pre-empted by the state's extensive gun-control scheme. Gallipoli also said the law violated equal protection grounds, deeming it arbitrary, capricious and lacking a rational basis."

Jury Says New York's' Protester-Arrest Policy Violated Their Rights. The AP (12/20, Neumeister) reports, "New York City violated constitutional rights for a few months when the police department introduced a written policy in May 2001 to require those arrested at demonstrations to be locked up overnight rather than issued desk appearance tickets, a jury found. But the same jury of eight people greatly diminished Monday any potential damages when it rejected a claim that the police department had enforced an unwritten policy to lock up demonstrators for more than two years before it put the policy in writing."

UK Report Envisions Rights For Robots. The Financial Times (12/20, Davoudi) reports that the "idea…we may one day give sentient machines the kind of rights traditionally reserved for humans is raised in a British government-commissioned report which claims to be an extensive look into the future. Visions of the status of robots around 2056 have emerged from one of 270 forward-looking papers sponsored by Sir David King, the UK government's chief scientist." The paper covering robots' rights "was written by a UK partnership of Outsights, the management consultancy, and Ipsos Mori, the opinion research organisation." The Times adds, "The Horizon Scan report argues that if 'correctly managed', this new world of robots' rights could lead to increased labour output and greater prosperity," but it also "points out that the process has casualties and the first one may be the environment, especially in the areas of energy and waste."

ANTITRUST:

Delta Refuses US Airways Buyout Bid. As it filed its reorganization plan Tuesday, Delta refused US Airways' attempted $8.4 billion cash and stock bid to merge the two airlines. This decision generated significant coverage throughout the national and regional print media. For example, the Washington Post (12/20, D3, 690K) reports, :Delta Air Lines filed a reorganization plan Tuesday that calls for it to emerge from bankruptcy protection next spring as a stand-alone company worth as much as $12 billion, which would be more than the market value of the nation's two biggest carriers combined. Delta said that under the plan, its unsecured creditors would recover 63 to 80 percent of their allowed claims. … Delta also said that its board voted to reject US Airways' $8.3 billion hostile takeover bid. 'US Airways is the worst of all potential merger partners,' Delta chief executive Gerald Grinstein said." Bloomberg (12/20, Schlangenstein) notes that Delta's board "unanimously rejected" the offer. The Charlotte Observer (12/20, Harrison, 219K) reports, "Delta Air Lines attacked all facets of the US Airways' plan for a merged airline Tuesday, but its sharpest criticism is that the "new Delta" would be anti-competitive.

DOJ_NMG_0107688

Delta Estimates Value Of $9.4 Billion To $12 Billion After Exiting Chapter 11. USA Today (12/20, 1B, Adams, 2.27M) reports, "Delta said that as an independent, it would be worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion when it exits Chapter 11 protection next spring. US Airways' unsolicited cash-and-stock bid was worth $8.4 billion at US Airways' closing price Tuesday. CEO Gerald Grinstein said Delta believes an independent airline offers investors and creditors greater value and certainty of success than US Airways' proposal. "

Bloomberg adds, "Delta said its plan would let unsecured creditors recover 63 percent to 80 percent of their claims, and that Blackstone Group, a financial adviser, estimates the airline's value at $9.4 billion to $12 billion. Delta's current shares will be worthless once it leaves bankruptcy."

The Pittsburgh Business Times (12/19) reports, "Delta's chief antitrust lawyer added that he doesn't believe the U.S. Department of Justice will approve a merger between Delta Air Lines Inc. and Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways Group Inc. (NYSE: LCC), Pittsburgh International Airport's leading carrier." Jim Weiss, Preston Gates & Ellis LLP partner: "It appears from a factual standpoint, this is a merger that clearly has a lot of antitrust issues attached to it. … The antitrust risk here is quite high."

Delta Cites Antitrust Worries. Bloomberg (12/20, Schlangenstein) reports, "The US Airways offer is unlikely to receive antitrust approval, is based on flawed economic assumptions and would result in the biggest debt load in the industry, Delta, the third-largest U.S. carrier, said today. … Delta wasn't persuaded by US Airways' argument that a combination creating the world's largest airline would add $1.65 billion in annual savings and new revenue. Executives at Atlanta-based Delta have expressed skepticism about US Airways' offer since it was unveiled Nov. 15."

On its Web site, CNN Money (12/20, Isidore) reports, "Executives at Delta Air Lines (tail in front) say a combination with US Airways (tail in rear) would be blocked by regulators because it would hike fares in many East Coast markets. In a call with investors, Delta CEO Jerry Grinstein said US Airways is Delta's primary competitor on the East Coast, and a deal with it would be the one least likely to be approved because of the impact on fares." CNN Money adds, "Delta said there are 2,000 routes where a combined US Airways and Delta would control 90 percent of the flights, which the company argues would prevent U.S. antitrust regulators from agreeing to the deal."

US Airways Vows To Continue Bid. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (12/20, Fitzpatrick, 230K) reports, "US Airways is refusing to back off its $8.4 billion takeover bid for Delta Air Lines despite an official rejection from Delta's board and a pledge that Delta will emerge from bankruptcy next year as a stand-alone company worth as much as $12 billion." US Airways says its plan "would provide at least $1.65 billion in cost savings and new revenue 'beyond the value that could be created by any standalone plan.' Delta creditors would also receive $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock, which closed yesterday at $57.50, up $1.70, or 3 percent." The Post-Gazette adds, "Both airlines have been lobbying the creditors committee, hoping to win support. The committee will now review both plans and is expected to make a decision early next year."

Delta Indicates It Is Open To Other Offers. Dow Jones Newswires (12/19, Kosdrosky) reports, "The Chief Executive of Delta Air Lines Inc. (DALRQ) said Tuesday that US Airways Group Inc.'s merger proposal raises unique antitrust concerns. He added that Delta would 'look at' any other proposal."

Airline Shares Fall. The AP (12/20) reports, "Airline shares slipped in Tuesday trading, after Delta Air Lines Inc. rejected a buyout bid by US Airways Group Inc. The overall Amex Airline Index fell 1 percent, with all 11 of its component stocks marking declines. Many of the index's percentage swings were slight, less than 1 percent. The declines came amid easing crude oil prices, which dropped 29 cents to $61.92 per barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Falling oil prices typically strengthen airline shares, as jet fuel is among the industry's top costs."

Travel Columnist Pans Airline Mergers. In his "Holiday Travel Wish List" on the USA Today Web site (12/20), "On The Road" columnist Bill McGee calls on DoJ not to "rubber-stamp" mergers. McGee writes, "What investors call 'consolidation' is a nice word for worse service and more unemployment. With the ink not even dry on US Airways' marriage with America West, that carrier already is considering a hostile takeover of Delta. … For passengers, a dwindling number of carriers will mean higher prices, fewer flights and a decline in service (yes, it's possible for service to decline further)."

Coffeeshop Owner Accuses Starbucks Of Antitrust Violations. USA Today (12/20, 1B, Iwata, 2.27M) reports that in a "closely watched federal lawsuit," Penny Stafford, who owns the Belvi Coffee and Tea Exchange in Bellevue, WA, "charges that Starbucks illegally maintains its monopoly by barring other coffeehouses from prime downtown high-rises in Seattle and Bellevue through exclusive leases with property owners. Starbucks also drove Stafford and other coffeehouses out of business by buying coffee sellers and flooding neighborhoods with new Starbucks stores that even cannibalized the sales of existing Starbucks shops, the lawsuit alleges." Starbucks spokeswoman Sanja Gould: "Starbucks denies that we have done anything improper, and we intend to rightfully defend ourselves. As Starbucks has grown, so has the industry, all of which benefits coffee consumers and the competitors of Starbucks." USA Today adds, "

Case Comes In "Antitrust's Second Golden Age." In the same article, USA Today adds, "The Starbucks case comes amid what Boston attorneys Thane Scott and Veronica Abreu call 'antitrust's second golden age.' Attorneys are heatedly debating what monopoly practices are predatory. Regulators are weighing whether antitrust law should be upgraded in the new global economy, just as the law was shaped in the early 20th-century industrial economy. And antitrust civil lawsuits are on the rise, reports Competition Law 360, a legal publication. The lawsuit also increases the controversy around fast-growing Starbucks, the target of a vocal backlash in recent years from neighborhood and anti-globalization activists and some consumers."

Ericsson Purchase Of Redback Boosts Net Strategy. The Wall Street Journal (12/20, B2, White, Silver, 2.04M) reports, "Telefon AB L.M. Ericsson's agreement to buy Redback Networks Inc. for $2.1 billion reflects how the explosion in video and other multimedia services over the Internet and a surge in broadband subscribers are driving phone and cable companies to upgrade their networks and spurring big makers of networking hardware to unite. Ericsson, a Swedish provider of equipment and services for telecommunications infrastructure, said it will pay holders of the Silicon Valley seller of routing equipment $25 a share, or 18% more than Redback's share price before the announcement. Ericsson characterized the price as a 60% premium above the 90-day average for Redback stock."

Valassis To Acquire Direct-Mail Firm As Companies Drop Lawsuits. The Wall Street Journal (12/20, A12, 2.04M) reports, "Valassis Communications Inc. agreed to acquire direct-mail marketer Advo Inc. for a reduced amount as the companies dropped lawsuits against each other over their disputed merger agreement. Valassis will pay $33 a share for Advo, or about $1.05 billion, down from $37 a share, or $1.18 billion, under an agreement reached in July. Valassis also will assume about $125 million in debt."

"Tough Political Climate" Awaits AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The Financial Times (12/20, Kirchgaessner, Taylor) reports, "AT&T's $68bn takeover of BellSouth will face a tough political climate in Washington in 2007 when Democrats take control of the Congress, virtually ensuring that the former Ma Bell will have to agree to harsher conditions. The possibility that the telecoms mega-merger would be approved by the Federal Communications Commission before the end of this year appeared to disintegrate on Monday after Robert McDowell, a Republican commissioner at the FCC, said he would abstain from deadlocked negotiations over the transaction at the regulatory agency."

Judge Bars San Francisco Newspapers From Consolidating Business Operations. The AP (12/20) reports, "A federal judge on Tuesday blocked San Francisco Bay area newspapers owned by MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle from consolidating some of their business operations until the outcome of an antitrust lawsuit challenging the move. U.S. District Judge Susan Illston had temporarily barred the consolidation of distribution and national advertising sales. She made her ruling official on Tuesday after giving the news outlets a chance to respond. The organizations said two weeks ago they would not immediately merge operations, but they planned to do so if they prevailed in the antitrust trial scheduled for April."

The San Jose Mercury News (12/20, Carey, 229K) adds, "The order, by U.S. District Court Judge Susan Illston, granted the preliminary injunction sought by Clint Reilly, a San Francisco investor who has filed an antitrust lawsuit to prevent MediaNews from buying the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times. Reilly contends that the purchase, which was assisted by Hearst, owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, would give MediaNews a Bay Area news and advertising monopoly."

Bloomberg (12/20, Gullo) reports, "MediaNews and Hearst agreed in April to try to boost revenue by offering one contract to advertise in the San Francisco Chronicle, owned by Hearst, and the Contra Costa Times and the San Jose Mercury News, both owned by MediaNews. Lawyers for both companies told Illston last month that implementation of the plan wasn't imminent."

FCC To Rule On Measure That Could Help Phone Companies Penetrate Cable Market. The Washington Post (12/20, D1, Sipress, 690K) reports, :Telephone companies could get a major boost today in their efforts to penetrate the cable television market when the Federal Communications Commission considers a measure that would give state and local officials less latitude in awarding cable franchises. FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, a leading advocate of the rule, has argued that government officials often stymie competition by delaying decisions on awarding cable franchises to telephone companies and by imposing exorbitant fees and conditions. As a result, cable operators often have been able to maintain a virtual monopoly on television services, resulting in steadily increasing prices for consumers, according to Martin. He cited an FCC survey"

Attorney Expresses Approval Of New Chinese Merger Laws. In a column published in Financial Times (12/20) Kenneth Chan, head of Allen & Overy's China group, writes, "The merger and acquisition provisions enacted jointly by China's Ministry of Commerce and other ministries in 2003 were overhauled in August this year. … Important changes were made in a number of areas, in recognition of the growing importance of China's private enterprises, the increased international mobility of Chinese entrepreneurs and the significant role they are playing in foreigners' M&A activities. … While their much narrower application – largely confined to two scenarios that are both foreign listing-related – is a disappointment to many, the clearer and more detailed regime that has now been put in place for its implementation is nonetheless a welcome development."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

EPA Rule Change On Toxic Chemical Emissions Would Benefit Big Firms. The Christian Science Monitor (12/20, Clayton, 59K) reports, "In a bid to trim the regulatory burden on small businesses, the Environmental Protection Agency is set to relax the rules on what toxic chemicals they have to report." But "in a twist, the EPA's newly revised Toxics Release Inventory rule will also make it possible for hundreds of large corporations to avoid reporting specific amounts of toxic chemicals they release into the air, land, or water, environmentalists warn." The rule change "has cheered small-business groups, generated widespread public opposition, and caught the eye of some Democratic congressmen, who will take control of Congress next month."

Overseas Shipholding To Pay $37 Million In Maritime Pollution Case. The Los Angeles Times (12/20, Mehren, Krikorian, 850K) reports, "Capping a three-year international investigation, federal officials on Tuesday announced a landmark, $37-million penalty in a maritime pollution case involving" Overseas Shipholding Group, "one of the world's largest publicly traded tanker companies." The fine "is the largest criminal penalty on record concerning deliberate maritime pollution, and it includes a $9.2-million 'community service payment' that will fund maritime environmental projects from coast to coast, including projects off California." The company "pleaded guilty to 33 felony counts related to deliberate dumping of sludge and other contaminants as well as falsification of log entries that such carriers are required to maintain." Acting Associate Attorney General William Mercer, at a news conference in Boston: "To those who cut corners at OSG, discharging waste in the middle of the night to save a few bucks, this case sends a message that crime just does not pay. … We will not see our oceans and our seas used as convenient dumping grounds for corporations."

The AP (12/20, Ngowi) reports, "The criminal penalty is the largest-ever involving deliberate vessel pollution, the U.S. Coast Guard said. Shares of New York-based Overseas Shipholding closed unchanged at $59.05 on the New York Stock Exchange. The Department of Justice and the U.S. Coast Guard opened their investigation after a tip from Canadian officials, who reported that official records of one of the company's ships failed to account for the disposal of oil waste. An investigation showed 150,000 gallons of oil-contaminated waste was dumped in the waters between Maine and Massachusetts, officials said."

The Washington Times (12/20, Seper, 88K) reports, "New York-based OSG, which has 4,000 employees, transports crude oil, petroleum products and dry bulk commodities throughout the world. The company owns an international fleet of 106 operating vessels and has 30 under construction. The guilty plea involves 12 of its ships. The ports where the pollution occurred were identified as Boston; Portland, Maine; Los Angeles; San Francisco; Wilmington, N.C.; and Beaumont, Texas."

USA Today (12/20, Johnson, 2.27M) notes, "In one instance described in government documents, an unidentified engineer aboard the M/T Overseas Shirley alerted managers to the "criminal" dumping of an estimated 40,600 gallons of sludge, or concentrated black waste oil. In another case, the government cited the tanker M/T Uranus for routinely releasing "oily waste" into the waters off Maine and Massachusetts from August 2001 to October 2003."

The Boston Herald (12/20, Fitzgerald, 184K) reports, "The multi-state investigation was launched in Boston after Canadian officials tipped off local Coast Guard authorities that records for one of OSG's ships showed bilge waste was being disposed into the sea - even though other records indicated the ship was complying with environmental laws."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Suspected Cartel Leader Accused Of Ordering Murders Of Deputy Police Chief, Officers. In San Diego, the AP (12/20) reports the "suspected kingpin of one of Mexico's oldest and most notorious drug cartels ordered the murder of Tijuana's deputy police chief and the beheadings of three police officers, according to a federal indictment unsealed Tuesday. Francisco Javier Arellano Felix, 37, would be eligible for the death penalty if convicted on a count of running a criminal enterprise, part of the new seven-count indictment. The killings were included as evidence of the criminal enterprise that authorities say extended into the United States."

Indoor Marijuana Seizures Rise In California. On its Web site, NPR's All Things Considered (12/19) reports federal agents in California "say the pot farms they raided have all the markings of organized crime. The farms were found in unexpected places, many of them at suburban homes near Sacramento." Gordon Taylor is the Assistant Special Agent in Charge of the DEA office in Sacramento. He "says the plants seized from 41 homes linked to the case were capable of producing $74 million worth of pot in a year. Eight people have been arrested. … Law enforcement officials say it's not an isolated problem. Seizures of indoor marijuana plants in California are up 81 percent this year."

California Marijuana Dispensary Ordered To Close. On its Web site, KESQ-TV, Palm Desert, California (12/20) reports CannaHelp, the medical marijuana dispensary in Palm Desert "is being told to close up shop. The city has sent the business a cease and desist letter. Palm Desert City Attorney David Irwin told NewsChannel 3 CannaHelp violated its agreement with the city and its business license is now revoked. CannaHelp was raided a little more than two weeks ago when authorities believed the dispensary was selling pot for profit."

Owner To Defy Order. The Palm Springs Desert Sun (12/19) reported CannaHelp "is staying open in defiance of a cease-and-desist letter from the city. 'I'm going to stay open by myself,' said owner Stacy Hochanadel, after sending his other employees home."

Needle-Exchange Program Approved In New Jersey. The New York Times (12/20, Chen, 1.16M) reports New Jersey yesterday "became the last state in the country to offer needle exchange programs for intravenous drug users, when Gov. Jon S. Corzine signed legislation authorizing a pilot program for up to six towns. The law allows drug users to exchange used syringes for new ones, and provides $10 million for drug treatment facilities."

In Tucson, Unwritten Rule Said To Allow Some Drug Smugglers To Be Freed. Nogales International (12/20) reports, "Many people want a fence built along the Mexico/United States border as a means to stop drug smuggling, terrorism and illegal immigration, but the truth is that drug smugglers can be caught red-handed, and still go free - as long as they're carrying less than 500 pounds of marijuana. Several local officials have said that the unwritten rule at the Tucson office of the U.S. Attorney is that if a smuggler is accused of moving less than 500 pounds of pot through a port of entry, that person will walk away, generally.

… All the local officials said that they do not blame the U.S. Attorney's Office. They say the office staff is too small and overworked. … Some officials feel that they have an obligation to try the cases left dormant by the federal government, but others feel that by cleaning up after the feds their good deeds will be expected to become regular."

Reporting Continues On Marijuana Cash Crop Report. BBC News (12/19) reported marijuana "is the top cash crop in the US, a report released on Monday says. It says that despite intensive eradication plans, $35bn (£18bn) worth of the illegal drug is produced a year - more than corn and wheat combined. … Activists seeking the decriminalization of the substance, say the report backs the need for change, a position rejected by government officials." The ONDCP's Tom Riley "rejected any economic arguments for legalizing marijuana saying marijuana use was an 'inherently harmful activity.'"

Parole Board Member Testifies FBI Agents Threatened Him Over Boston Mob Murder. The AP (12/20) reports, "A former member of the state Parole Board said Tuesday that two FBI agents tried to intimidate him into keeping a wrongly convicted man in prison for a 1960s gangland slaying." Former Springfield Mayor Michael Albano "testified in a lawsuit filed by the families of four men who say the FBI allowed them to be framed to protect a mobster informant. … Lawyers for the men's families asked Albano if the FBI, after being contacted by the parole board as it considered petitions to commute their sentences, ever turned over evidence it had that the men were not involved in the murder of Deegan. 'No such information was provided,' Albano testified. Albano also made a brief reference in his testimony to a 1983 'unannounced visit' from former FBI Agents John Connolly and John Morris as the board was considering a petition to commute Limone's sentence," and "outside the courtroom, Albano said Connolly and Morris urged him to vote against commuting Limone's sentence and said that if he voted in favor of commuting his sentence it could hurt his career. 'They intimidated me and tried to get me to change my vote,' Albano told reporters."

FBI Releasing Final Lennon Documents. The Los Angeles Times (12/20, Weinstein, 850K) reports, "The FBI agreed Tuesday to make public the final 10 documents about the surveillance of John Lennon that it had withheld for 25 years from a UC Irvine historian on the grounds that releasing them could cause 'military retaliation against the United States.' Despite the fierce battle the government waged to keep the documents secret, the files contain information that is hardly shocking, just new details about Lennon's ties to New Left leaders and antiwar groups in London in the early 1970s, said the historian, Jon Wiener. … 'The content of the files released today is an embarrassment to the U.S. government,' said Wiener, 62, who has written two books on the late Beatles." Wiener added, "Today, we can see that the national security claims that the FBI has been making for 25 years were absurd from the beginning." The Times notes, "The documents will be posted on the Internet today at http://www.LennonFBIfiles.com."

IMMIGRATION:

Iowa Officials Write Chertoff To Criticize Swift Raids. The Des Moines Register (12/20, Jacobs, 160K) reports Gov. Tom Vilsack and Maj. Gen. Ron Dardis, the top officer of the Iowa National Guard, wrote "a blunt and stinging letter" to DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff Tuesday calling the ICE raids at Swift & Co. "'completely unacceptable,' saying agents undermined the public's trust in government, potentially jeopardized the safety of law enforcement personnel in Iowa and could have compromised undercover operations." Vilsack and Dardis "said they will not cooperate with federal immigration officials in the future unless they act more responsibly and provide better coordination with state officials." They "said ICE officials failed to advise the Iowa National Guard of the size and scope of the raid, which 'could have led to unacceptable risks to Guard personnel and property.'"

The Des Moines Register (12/20, Norman, 160K) reported in a separate letter to Chertoff Tuesday, Sen. Tom Harkin wrote "to say he is 'appalled' by the process used to detain and deport" Swift workers. He criticized "a telephone hotline for information for family members that was set up by the government" and said it had "been 'almost impossible' for lawyers and members of the clergy to gain access to workers who were detained, and workers were taken to other states without being granted access to lawyers." Harkin "said he hopes Chertoff shares his belief that 'the failure to ensure that basic legal rights and humanitarian protections are afforded to individuals in our immigration system reflects poorly on the principles that have made the United States strong.'"

Raids Seen As Having Solidified Positions On Guest-Worker Program. The Rocky Mountain News (12/20, Sprengelmeyer) reports "lawmakers from competing sides of the debate over a proposed guest-worker plan" have used the Swift arrests "to bolster their locked-in positions. That could set the stage for another difficult debate in coming months, after Democrats take control of both houses of Congress and try to advance a plan President Bush has long favored." Rep. Tom Tancredo "called it 'hogwash' that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff began his press conference detailing the arrests by talking about the need for a guest-worker plan, which could grant legal status to millions who have entered the country illegally. Chertoff said tough enforcement was only one part of solving immigration problems." It "was a common theme all week, as longtime backers of the proposed guest-worker plan, including Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., said the arrests signaled a clarion call for a comprehensive approach to solving immigration problems."

Those Arrested In Raids Begin Facing Charges. The Denver Post (12/20, Finley, 256K) reports, "Meatpacking workers detained during last week's federal raids began facing immigration judges Tuesday in Colorado and five other states. Some were released after relatives posted bond of at least $1,500. In Colorado, Immigration Judge Donn Livingston saw 27 detainees at the regional detention facility in Aurora and set court hearings where they are to be informed of charges against them. Meanwhile, a federal grand jury in Minnesota indicted 20 detained workers on criminal-immigration offenses and charges related to identity theft."

La Raza Releases Study On Hunger Rates Among Hispanics In The US. The Washington Post (12/20, A4, Aizenman, 690K) reports, "Nearly one in five Hispanics lacks sufficient access to nutritious food and one in 20 regularly goes hungry, posing serious health and economic risks to the nation's largest and fastest-growing minority group, according to a new study. The National Council of La Raza, a Latino advocacy group, noted in its study that the 'food insecurity' rate of Hispanics is nearly as high as that of non-Hispanic blacks and substantially greater than that of non-Hispanic whites.'"

50 Arrested In Fugitive Operations Team Sweep In Miami. The Miami Herald (12/20, 286K) reports, "Immigration authorities have arrested 50 undocumented immigrants who ignored orders to leave the country and another 12 who were in violation of US immigration laws, many of them with criminal histories, US Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said today. Among those arrested was a 38-year-old Honduran convicted of sex crimes and deported in 2000. Jose Mario Lara now faces criminal charges for returning illegally to the United States. … 'Our officers are working tirelessly to ensure that our nation's laws are upheld,' Michael Rozos, field office director for the ICE Office of Detention and Removal Operations in Florida, said in a statement. 'Those who break our immigration laws shouldn't be surprised if they are arrested, charged and deported.' The weeklong sweep by ICE's Miami Fugitive Operations team ended Friday with the arrest of 62 fugitives and violators."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts, Alito Seen As Moving Court To The Right. USA Today (12/20, 2.27M) reports although "most of the major decisions in their first full term together won't be announced for months, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito have signaled a readiness to move the court to the right." In recent cases "involving abortion, global warming and school integration, Roberts and Alito have been aggressive and sometimes feisty proponents of conservative views and particularly sympathetic to arguments by the Bush administration." Their tactics have "added flair to the court's public sessions and have contrasted sharply with the tentative approach that moderate Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Anthony Kennedy often took in disputes over abortion, affirmative action and other key issues." Legal and political conservatives "have been pleased with the new justices' approach. At the annual meeting of the conservative Federalist Society last month, outgoing Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., praised Roberts' and Alito's confirmation to the high court as 'signature achievements' of the Congress that Republicans controlled for more than a decade."

Brownback Wants To Re-Question Judicial Nominee On Gay Marriage. The AP (12/20, Dvorak) reports Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback (R), "who wants to champion social conservatives in the presidential race, said Tuesday he wants a Senate panel to re-question a judicial nominee who attended a same-sex union ceremony." Brownback "said he wants Michigan state judge Janet Neff to testify about her role in the 2002 Massachusetts ceremony, her legal views on same-sex unions and her ability to be impartial if called upon to rule on such cases." In Iowa "to meet with GOP activists, Brownback said he only wants a chance to question Neff about her role in the 2002 ceremony. Brownback also wants a recorded vote in the Senate."

Durbin Seeks Update On Iraq, Afghanistan Detainee Abuse Probe. The AP (12/20, Jordan) reports Sen. Richard Durbin has asked "the Justice Department on Monday for an update on its progress prosecuting government employees who were accused in at least 17 cases of abusing detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan. In response, a Justice spokesman said at least some of the cases are still under investigation." In a letter "sent Monday to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales," Durbin "noted that the department began looking into the allegations of abuse two and a half years ago." Durbin said, "In that time, there have not been any indictments in any of these cases." Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse "said at least a few of the estimated 17 remaining cases are still open."

OTHER NEWS:

Cheney To Testify At Libby Trial. In what some media reports are portraying as another headache for the Administration, the AP (12/20, Apuzzo) says this morning Vice President Dick Cheney "will be called to testify on behalf of his former chief of staff in the CIA leak case, defense attorneys said Tuesday, ending months of speculation over what would be historic testimony. 'We're calling the vice president,' attorney Ted Wells said in court. Wells represents defendant I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, who is charged with perjury and obstruction."

The Wall Street Journal (12/20, A4, McKinnon, 2.04M), under the headline "Cheney Testimony Could Exacerbate White House Woes," reports "Cheney's testimony…will add to White House political problems, at a time when President Bush will be seeking to rebuild his eroded standing. … A Cheney spokeswoman suggested he doesn't plan to resist. 'We've cooperated fully in this matter and will continue to do so,' said Lea Anne McBride." The Journal adds, "The spectacle of the vice president testifying in court is likely to deepen the White House's public-relations problems, as Democrats on Capitol Hill also will launch investigations of the administration in a number of areas, including its conduct of the Iraq war."

The New York Times (12/20, Johnston, 1.16M) reports, "The prospect of Mr. Cheney's testimony suggested that Mr. Libby's trial could be transformed from a narrowly gauged perjury case into a riveting courtroom drama with the taciturn vice president as the star witness. He would testify under oath and be exposed to cross-examination by prosecutors."

Georgia School Board Abandons Evolution Sticker Case. AP (12/20, Gross) reports, "A suburban Atlanta school board that put stickers in high school science books saying evolution is 'a theory, not a fact' abandoned its legal battle to keep them Tuesday after four years. The Cobb County board agreed in federal court never to use a similar sticker or to undermine the teaching of evolution in science classes."

Many States Preempted Congress On Minimum Wage Hikes. The New York Times (12/20, Uchitelle, 1.16M) reports congressional Democrats are "making a much-delayed increase in the minimum wage their signature attempt to lift incomes and quiet widespread economic anxiety. But the party's modest proposal does not catch up with what the states have already done to raise the wages of tens of millions of workers." In the "last election alone, voters in six states approved minimums higher than the federal level, and in some states cost-of-living clauses automatically increase the minimums — a step that Congress has never taken and that most Democrats still balk at." Some advocates "wonder whether Congress can regain the lead, or should." The Democrats "plan to introduce a bill in Congress next month that would increase the federal minimum for the first time in a decade — to $7.25 an hour in the spring of 2009, reaching that level in three steps from the present $5.15 an hour. More than 13 million workers earning less than $7.25 an hour today, or just above that, would get raises."

Abramoff Christmas List From 2001 Included Lavish Gifts. The Washington Post (12/20, A21, Smith, 690K) reports that while former Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff "makes no more than 40 cents an hour for his labors at the federal prison camp at Cumberland, Md.," Christmas in 2001 "was a far more high-flying holiday" when he was "paid as much as $500 an hour." Before he

"pleaded guilty to defrauding banks in a deal to buy a casino cruise line -- Abramoff was a top rainmaker at Greenberg Traurig's Washington office and liked to be generous at this time of year, at least to those who could help him. He compiled a list of 45 people to whom his staff was supposed to send gifts such as a Baccarat crystal bowl and a platinum Tiffany clock." A copy of "his holiday gift list, obtained by The Washington Post, details one of the methods that Washington lobbyists can use to flatter clients and lawmakers. It shows that those who had helped enrich Abramoff got a reward, and his father and brother and their wives got either cookies or a fruit basket." Three members of Congress "and one staff member were among his intended gift recipients, according to the list. Three of them received a more lavish item than House ethics rules allowed, if Abramoff's assistants followed his instructions."

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 16

TERRORISM NEWS:

American Convicted Of Aiding Taliban Arrested For Violating Parole. The AP (12/20, Jordan) reports James Ujaama, "an American convicted of helping the Taliban was back in federal court Tuesday for violating the terms of his probation, authorities said." Ujaama, "a Muslim convert from Seattle, was arrested over the weekend in Belize — where, under the terms of his supervised release, he was not supposed to be, Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said." Ujaama was "brought back Tuesday to the United States, and waived his rights to a removal hearing in U.S. District Court in Miami."

The Washington Times (12/20, Seper, 88K) reports Ujaama "pleaded guilty in 2003 to conspiring to provide cash, computers and fighters to the Taliban, but fled after agreeing to cooperate in ongoing investigations." Authorities said Ujaama "entered Belize, a small country on the eastern coast of Central America, 10 days ago using a phony Mexican passport." Ujaama, who "served two years in a plea agreement on charges of dealing with al Qaeda and providing various types of material support to the Taliban, has since been turned over to U.S. authorities, said Leonard Hill, deputy chief of mission at the U.S. Embassy."

Administration Freezes Assets Of British Citizen Over Alleged Terror Ties. The AP (12/20, Aversa) reports the Bush Administration "took action Tuesday to freeze financial accounts and assets of a naturalized British citizen for allegedly providing 'material and logistical' support to al-Qaida and other terror groups." The action "against Mohammed Al Ghabra means that any bank accounts or other financial assets belonging to him found in the United States must be frozen." The Treasury Department "alleged that Al Ghabra had organized travel to Pakistan for people seeking to meet with senior al-Qaida officials and to undertake jihad training. Several of those people returned to the United Kingdom to engage in covert activity on behalf of al-Qaida, the department said."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Al-Haramain NSA Surveillance Suit Consolidated With Others In California. The Oregonian (12/20, Green, 318K) reports, "An Oregon lawsuit challenging a federal warrantless eavesdropping program has been shipped to a judge in San Francisco who is handling dozens of similar cases. The move, ordered by a judicial panel that consolidates groups of lawsuits with related legal issues, takes the Oregon case away from U.S. District Judge Garr M. King in Portland." The Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation "case has been sent to U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker, who earlier this year refused the federal government's attempt to dismiss a similar case that accuses AT&T of illegally cooperating with the program."

US Cancels Order For 75 Million Doses Of Anthrax Vaccine. The New York Times (12/20, Lipton, 1.16M) reports that in a "major setback to the Bush administration's biodefense efforts, the government announced Tuesday that it had canceled an order for 75 million doses of a new anthrax vaccine, the single biggest purchase planned for the nation's antiterror drug stockpile." Since "VaxGen of Brisbane, Calif., won the contract two years ago, skeptics have questioned the ability of the company, a small biotechnology business, to deliver on such a large order, as well as the administration's capacity to properly manage the overall $5.6 billion program, known as BioShield." Department of Health and Human Services officials "terminated the $877 million contract Tuesday after VaxGen failed to start required clinical trials, a delay caused by troubles with the vaccine formula."

The Washington Post (12/20, A1, Merle, 690K) reports, "Federal health officials yesterday scuttled the largest piece of the Bush administration's two-year program to counter bioterrorism, canceling an $877.5 million contract with VaxGen to develop an anthrax vaccine after the company missed a deadline to begin human testing." The decision,

"delivered in a one-page letter, ends a troubled effort by the small California firm that has come to symbolize the failures of the government's ambitious $5.6 billion Project BioShield. The termination occurred on the same day President Bush signed legislation attempting to salvage the program by reorganizing its management and pumping more money into firms doing the work."

CIA Reports Success With New Recruiting Program. Fox News' Special Report (12/19, Hume) reported the Central Intelligence Agency "has found itself with some good news to report at the end of the year. 2006, as it turns out, has been a record recruiting year. Five years after 9/11, more Americans than ever before want to work for the CIA." A new recruiting campaign "is apparently working. In 2006 134,000 people applied for jobs, more than double the number of applicants in 2001, the year of the September 11 attacks. And one in four new CIA employees is fluent in a foreign language like Arabic or Korean. The White House has ordered the agency to bolster staff by record numbers." CIA Chief of Human Resources Cindy Bower: "We have been directed by the President to increase hiring in a number of areas, including analysis, engineering, that requires obviously some administrative support."

Intelligence Agencies, Military Rely On Technology For Translation. USA Today (12/20, 1A, Willing, 2.27M) reports that intelligence agencies "and the military are turning to technology developed for call centers, sporting events and television shopping channels to compensate for an ongoing shortage of qualified translators, interviews and public documents show." In "Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, the Defense Department's research arm is testing portable translation devices that allow English-speaking soldiers to hold conversations with Iraqis." Government-backed researchers are also "working to convert broadcasts and website postings from Arabic and Mandarin Chinese into English and to build search engines that can extract complex information from the translated texts. These efforts are part of a government plan to bolster the thin ranks of skilled translators, say researchers and experts, so human translators can focus on more demanding projects."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says US "Not Winning" In Iraq, Plans Boost In Overall Size Of Armed Forces. Under the headline "US Not Winning War In Iraq, Bush Says For 1st Time," the Washington Post (12/20, A1, Baker, 690K) reports on its Oval Office interview with President Bush. The President told the Post he "plans to expand the overall size of the 'stressed' US armed forces to meet the challenges of a long-term global struggle against terrorists." In addition, "as he searches for a new strategy for Iraq, Bush has now adopted the formula advanced by his top military adviser to describe the situation. 'We're not winning, we're not losing,' Bush said." That "assessment was a striking reversal for a president who, days before the November elections, declared, 'Absolutely, we're winning.'" The Post adds, "In another turnaround, Bush said he has ordered Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates to develop a plan to increase the troop strength of the Army and Marine Corps, heeding warnings from the Pentagon and Capitol Hill that multiple deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan are stretching the armed forces toward the breaking point."

Bush's interview with the Washington Post is generating extensive, generally positive media coverage. Much of it focuses on the announcement about the expansion of the Armed Forces' size. USA Today (12/20, Kelley, Brook, 2.27M) reports "members of Congress and military experts welcomed Bush's comments Tuesday, saying that a larger military would ease the strain on today's troops." Rep. Ike Skelton, "a Missouri Democrat and incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, 'would welcome anyone' supporting a larger military, said his spokeswoman Loren Dealy." Democratic Sen. Jack Reed, "a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said in a statement that an increase has been needed for years and called on Bush to fund it in his budget."

ABC World News (12/19, story 4, Karl, 8.78M) said "the President has seen the Army is stretched so thin, that his hands as Commander in Chief are tied. If he wants to surge more troops into Iraq, he's told he can only do it at a short period of time. If another crisis breaks out elsewhere in the world, he is told he has only has 10,000 available troops trained and ready to go." The CBS Evening News (12/19, lead story, 2:55, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "When President Bush met with defense leaders last week at the Pentagon, he got an earful from the Joint Chiefs of Staff about how badly the military is feeling the strain of fighting wars in Iraq and Afghanistan with no end in sight." CBS also reported, "The services are currently meeting their recruiting goals. To bring in more, they will have to increase the number of recruiters out there, and also, undoubtedly, increase the financial incentives for signing up."

The announcement is being portrayed as a sharp departure from the approach advocated by former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. NBC Nightly News (12/19, story 3, 2:50, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "This is a total reversal of the Pentagon's former policy under…Rumsfeld and comes only one day after Rumsfeld stepped down. Amid growing concern that the war in Iraq could break the US Army and Marines, President Bush told the Washington Post today he wants to expand the size of the armed forces to fight the long-term war against terrorists." The New York Times (12/20, Shanker, Rutenberg, 1.16M) also says Bush's comments "indicated that the administration was breaking abruptly with the stance taken by…Rumsfeld, the former Pentagon chief, who championed the view that better intelligence and technological advancements could substitute for a bigger military."

Bush Says Election An Indication Voters "Not Satisfied With Progress In Iraq." In an analysis piece, the Washington Post (12/20, A14, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "Ever since Republicans were routed last month in what was widely seen as a repudiation of his Iraq strategy," Bush "has been busily listing why his policies there will not be changing." Yesterday, in his interview with the Washington Post, Bush "bluntly dismissed the suggestion that the midterm elections meant voters want to bring the mission in that country to closure. He said he interpreted the election results 'as people not satisfied with the progress' in Iraq." The comments "were another strong indication of the president's determination to chart his own way forward on Iraq, no matter the election results nor any amount of free advice from senior statesmen of past administrations."

Smith Contends Situation In Iraq Is "Beyond Our Control. Sen. Gordon Smith (R), on Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (12/19), defended his recent criticism of the war in Iraq by noting he's not calling for "cut and run," instead he's saying "let's fight the war on terror more intelligently, let's fight it smarter. … What you now have in Iraq is a war that has mutated into something very different from what we began. And frankly, the fix here is beyond our control. There are essentially political questions that the Iraqis have to answer as to their own federal system, how they divide the resources and how they live together peacefully." Smith added, "what I won't stand by and watch any longer is…our being targets in a shooting gallery and both of them are shooting at us. … President Bush has done many things right. But frankly, it breaks my heart to see him wrecking his administration on the rocks of Iraq and a war we can't fix."

Rice Says Bush Considering Sending More Troops To Iraq. McClatchy (12/20, Strobel) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday that President Bush is considering a surge of additional US troops into Iraq to help secure Baghdad - despite strong reservations by some US military leaders and the incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee." Said Rice, "The president has to decide whether he thinks some adjustments in American troop levels and what American troops would do is necessitated by current circumstances. … Anything he considers will certainly look at what can be done about the security of Baghdad." Rice "said Bush, who's due to announce his new tactics in early January, wouldn't decide before further consultations with new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and military commanders." But "a number of active and retired generals already have expressed serious doubts about sending more troops to Iraq, saying there's little likelihood that the 20,000 to 30,000 troops under discussion would make a difference."

NBC Nightly News (12/19, story 3, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) said "Democratic lawmakers said any surge in forces would be a tough political sell," and "most military leaders still think the best option is to accelerate the training for the Iraqi forces so they can take over the fight but acknowledge that could still take years." The Washington Post (12/20, A14, Pincus, 690K) reports, "Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), the incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, questioned the purpose of sending an additional 20,000 U.S. troops into Baghdad, the surge option being mentioned as one strategy change in Iraq being considered by President Bush. 'What is the military mission?' Skelton asked yesterday during a meeting with reporters. 'I don't think it will change a thing,' he said, adding: Would the added troops 'exacerbate the problem by being more targets? Is there something to go after that we don't know?'"

Rice Suggests There Will Be No Big US Policy Shift In Iraq, Broader Mideast. The Wall Street Journal (12/20, A4, King, 2.04M) reports, "This should be Condoleezza Rice's moment. The secretary of state's longtime rival, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, is gone. Her ties to President Bush appear as strong as ever. Her popularity remains high, even as support for the president ebbs. And voices on all sides are calling for more diplomacy, more outreach -- core strengths of the department she heads." However, "as she moves into her third year as the nation's top diplomat, she faces doubt over the administration's Iraq strategy and finds herself embattled and increasingly defensive." At the same time, the Secretary is about to embark on "a new diplomatic push in the Middle East to win increased support in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories from what she calls 'mainstream states' such as Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia," but in a roundtable discussion with reporters yesterday, Rice "firmly defended the administration's current approach in the region and made clear that stark shifts aren't in the offing." Seeking to "counter her critics" and to put "a positive gloss on the instability now rippling through the Middle East," Rice "touted what she described as 'a new opportunity' to get moderate forces in the region 'to support the development of stable new governments in Iraq and Lebanon...and to make progress toward the emergence of a Palestinian state that is founded on the same principles.'" As the White House continues to weigh changes to its Iraq strategy, Rice "argues that a new alignment is shaping up in the Middle East that offers fresh promise for a new US diplomatic effort."

Iraq War Costs To Top $110 Billion This Year. The CBS Evening News (12/19, story 2, 0:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported "the financial cost of the war in Iraq is growing by the day. Today, the White House budget office said it will probably top $110 billion for this fiscal year alone."

USA Today (12/20, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman said there was no firm estimate of the costs for fiscal 2007, which began Oct. 1. When he was asked if the $110 billion estimate was now too low, Portman said, 'Yes.' He said the final figure 'depends on a lot of things that are not yet decided. One is the policy moving forward.'" Portman's statement "adds fuel to speculation that the war costs will top last year's record $120 billion." The New York Times (12/20, Stolberg, 1.16M) also notes the story in a brief report.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

NASD Accuses Morgan Stanley Of Using 9/11 As Excuse To Conceal E-Mails. USA Today (12/20, 1B, Farrell, 2.27M) reports, "Once again, an old e-mail issue is coming back to haunt Morgan Stanley. For the second time this year, a national regulator has accused Morgan Stanley of stonewalling requests for documents and withholding crucial e-mails from investigators. The NASD claimed Tuesday that Morgan Stanley hid the existence of millions of e-mails from customers of its Dean Witter brokerage. According to an NASD complaint, executives at Morgan Stanley used the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, as an alibi for their inability to produce a massive trove of e-mails sought by customers who felt they'd been burned by bad advice from Dean Witter brokers." NASD says that while Morgan Stanley's "e-mail servers were, in fact, destroyed in those attacks," the company by Sep. 17, 2001, "was able to use emergency backup tapes to restore all e-email through Aug. 30, 2001, to the Morgan Stanley internal database."

The Wall Street Journal (12/20, A3, Pessin, 2.04M) reports, ""While the NASD charges focus on arbitration cases involving small individual investors, Morgan Stanley's document-retention problems also played a large role in litigation between the firm and investor Ronald Perelman."

Investors Seen As Unlikely To Reopen Arbitration Cases. The Washington Post (12/20, D1, Johnson, 690K) reports, "Investors have little hope of reopening their arbitration cases, however, because they are unlikely to meet the high standard for doing so, legal analysts said. To prevail, investors would need to prove that individual Morgan Stanley brokers intentionally withheld the e-mail messages or committed fraud -- accusations the NASD stopped short of making yesterday."

Accounting Board Scraps Sarbanes-Oxley Audit Rule. The Washington Post (12/20, D1, Johnson, 690K) reports, "Accounting industry overseers yesterday scrapped an audit rule targeted by businesses as expensive and burdensome, proposing looser guidelines that would direct accountants to focus on the integrity of corporate managers and the most risky aspects of a company's financial reports." The proposal is "designed to address the most contentious part of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, passed by Congress after problems at Enron and WorldCom tarnished the reputation of the accounting profession and rocked investor confidence." Criticism over the rule "and charges that it is prompting fewer companies to list their shares on U.S. markets have gathered momentum in recent months, which was acknowledged by Mark W. Olson, chairman of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board." The "proposed change, which will be subject to more than two months of public comment, 'will help transform the rule into a cornerstone accomplishment rather than a provision that continues to be associated with adverse market trends,' Olson said."

Amid Backdating Practices, Murray Cites Potential "Grand Bargain" Of Greater Prosecution For Less Regulation Of Corporate Behavior. In a column appearing in the Wall Street Journal (12/20, A2, 2.04M) Alan Murray writes, "The prevalence of backdating raises the question: Has the corporate-reform movement really gone too far? Or has it not gone far enough? … In the midst of this rancorous debate, Ira Millstein, who has long labored in corporate governance, is the rare voice of sanity. Mr. Millstein, senior partner at Weil, Gotshal & Manges, rightly argues that some of the post-Enron reforms have gone too far. … [I]n return for those changes, Mr. Millstein wants 'the grand bargain'" Instead of more regulation, more prosecution and more litigation give shareholders more power to oversee the companies in which they invest."

Financial Times Calls McNulty Changes "Semantics." Financial Times (12/20) editorializes, "Last week the head of the [Justice] department's white collar crime fighters, Paul McNulty, announced new guidelines for prosecutors: from now on, they will have to get approval directly from him if they want to ask a company to waive the confidentiality that normally protects communications with its lawyers - and if the company refuses, it can no longer be penalised for doing so…. So far, so laudable. For too long, prosecutors have abused their power by demanding that companies show their willingness to co-operate with the government by waiving the sacred privilege that normally protects communications with their lawyers." However, Financial Times writes, "[I]n one important respect, the changes appear more semantic than real: prosecutors may not penalise companies for refusing to disclose communications with their lawyers - but they may still reward them for doing so. The end result is the same: you waive, or you lose."

Defense lawyers, Others Skeptical Of McNulty Memo. The National Law Journal (12/20, Coyle) reports, "In the wake of newly revised guidelines for federal prosecutors investigating and prosecuting corporations, the key question, according to white-collar criminal defense lawyers, is: Are the guidelines meaningful change or strategic retreat?: William McGuinness, who chairs the New York litigation department at Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson, calls the McNulty memo a "strategic retreat." And "[m]any defense lawyers, legal scholars, and members of a broad coalition of business and civil liberties groups that had lobbied intensely for changes in the Thompson memorandum echoed McGuinness' skepticism."

Forrester CFO Resigns In Option Irregularity. The AP (12/20) reports, "Forrester Research Inc. said late Tuesday its Chief Financial Officer and Treasurer Warren Hadley resigned after an internal investigation found irregularities regarding an option grant for 5,000 shares made to him in 1999."

Empowered Legal Department Can Reduce A Company's Risks. The Wall Street Journal (12/20, Cova, Dance, 2.04M) reports, "Several factors are driving legal risks to the forefront: aggressive development and enforcement of regulations in the U.S. and Europe; more cooperation and communication among regulatory authorities world-wide; and a public and media happy to punish companies that appear to 'misbehave' or break their promises." Noting that "what initially seems to be a marginal legal issue" can grow "into a bet-the-company type of risk," the Journal writes, "A duly empowered legal department can help directors govern better, and shield them from liability. Legal and regulatory issues can be a huge driver of a company's strategy:" The Journal adds, "Once a problem has erupted, it is often the legal response that determines whether and how quickly a company recovers, as in the skillfully handled crises at Tyco, Marsh & McLennan, Royal Dutch Shell and others. Some boards' failure to pay attention to legal issues is even more surprising considering that, more and more often, authorities explicitly direct corporations to identify and demonstrate how they are reducing legal risks, such as implementing compliance programs. Increasingly, regulators sternly punish those who fail to do so."

Amtrak Dismisses Five Executives. Law.com (12/20, Palmer) reports, "New Amtrak President Alex Kummant engineered a major management restructuring Monday, firing five top officials and naming Eleanor Acheson, assistant attorney general for policy development under President Bill Clinton, as the passenger rail's general counsel. The move comes after a call earlier this month by outgoing House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee Chairman Don Young, R-Alaska, and Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., for the Department of Justice to investigate Amtrak's legal department and outside counsel after the release of an inspector general's report, which found that Amtrak mismanaged more than $100 million in legal bills." Law.com adds, "In a Dec. 18 letter to Amtrak employees, Kummant announced the firing of Chief Financial Officer David Smith, Assistant Vice President of Transportation Thomas Schmidt, Police Chief Alfred Broadbent, Vice President for Marketing and Sales Barbara Richardson, and Vice President of Corporate Communications William Schulz. The letter also stated that Acheson will replace Alicia Serfaty as general counsel and corporate secretary."

Bond Lawyers Groups Warns Members On Anticompetitive Practices. Bloomberg (12/20, Richard, Preston) reports, "The National Association of Bond Lawyers, a group of attorneys who advise U.S. state and local governments on borrowings, plans to warn members about anti- competitive practices amid a growing government probe of the municipal bond market. The Justice Department investigation into potential bid- rigging in municipal investment contracts prompted the Chicago- based association to schedule a conference call with members to review potential abuses, said Carol Lew, president of the group and a public finance lawyer at Stradling Yocca Carlson & Rauth in Orange County, California." Bloomberg continues, "U.S. state and local governments that borrow in the almost 200-year-old municipal debt market rely on the opinions of attorneys and advisers to assure potential investors that their bonds clear requirements by the Internal Revenue Service and will remain tax-exempt. … The Justice Department's criminal investigation stems from an IRS review that found municipal bond deals robbed federal taxpayers of more than $100 million."

Vitesse Discloses "Wide Array Of Irregularities." The Wall Street Journal (12/20, A14, Seward, 2.04M) reports, "Vitesse Semiconductor Corp. said it had found a wide-ranging array of irregularities at the company, including options backdating, bogus sales invoices, improper revenue recognition, inflated reporting of cash balances and a failure to take write-offs for returned merchandise. The disclosures came as a result of an internal review, which was started in April to examine options practices, by a special committee of Vitesse's board. … The irregularities at Vitesse, based in Camarillo, Calif., were so widespread that the company said it would likely be unable to file restated financials for the 2004 and 2005 fiscal years."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Maryland Court Suspends Executions. The Baltimore Sun (12/20, McMenamin, 257K) reports, "In a narrowly tailored decision with potentially sweeping consequences, Maryland's highest court ordered a halt Tuesday to executions in the state, ruling that procedures for putting prisoners to death were never submitted for the public review required by law." Under the Court of Appeals ruling, "state prison officials face the prospect of having to submit the execution protocols to the scrutiny of a joint legislative committee and schedule a public hearing on the issue. Alternatively, the court ruled, the legislature could exempt the execution procedures from that review process -- something that one state senator characterized as 'very unlikely.'"

The New York Times (12/20, Liptak, 1.16M) reports, "The ruling follows similar developments in two other states on Friday." Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida "suspended executions there after a troubled execution that lasted 34 minutes and required a second dose of lethal chemicals, while a federal judge in California ruled that the state's lethal injection protocol violated the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment."

The Washington Times (12/20, Miller, 88K) reports "the decision set the stage for a debate about capital punishment and lethal injection in the upcoming General Assembly session." The Washington Post (12/20, B1, Rich, Wagner, 690K) says Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) or his Democratic successor, Martin O'Malley, "must act if executions are to resume." Last night, O'Malley, "who takes office Jan. 17, called on Ehrlich to leave the issue for the incoming administration. … An Ehrlich aide said the administration was reviewing the matter and had not decided how to proceed." The Post adds, "Because of the effort required to correct the defect identified by the court, many death penalty opponents said they expect that O'Malley would ultimately chart the state's course." O'Malley "has taken a nuanced position on the issue, saying that he is personally opposed to the death penalty but that his opposition would not prevent him from signing a death warrant."

LATimes Criticizes Schwarzenegger For Trying To Fix, Not End, Death Penalty. The Los Angeles Times (12/20, 850K) says in an editorial, "On ordering changes in the way lethal injections are administered to condemned prisoners in California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is doing the right thing for the wrong reason." But in "promising to redress what" US District Judge Jeremy Fogel "had called a 'pervasive lack of professionalism' in lethal injection, Schwarzenegger didn't emphasize — as the enlightened centrist chief executive he fancies himself should have — the need to spare even convicted murderers cruel and unusual punishment, by a moratorium on executions if necessary. No, Schwarzenegger indicated that he was seeking changes in what is blandly known as Operational Procedure No. 770 to keep judges from thwarting what the governor called 'the will of the people [that] the death penalty is maintained in California.' That death row inmates might be spared excruciating pain would be merely a byproduct of crossing the legal t's and dotting the i's."

Jones Says Gonzales Is Looking At Lacrosse Case. Fox News' On the Record (12/19, 11:44 p.m., Colby) reported, "One congressman is renewing his call for a federal investigation in the Duke rape case. Congressman Walter Jones first lit the fire last week with this stinging question: Did the prosecutor violate the civil rights of the three indicted lacrosse players? He wrote a letter to the attorney general and he called for an investigation into Durham DA Mike Nifong. Well, now he has done it again adding more fuel to the fire with another letter." Jones, speaking with Fox News by phone, said, "I've had two telephone conversations with assistants to Attorney General Gonzales and the assistant on two phone calls told me that they definitely were taking my letter seriously and they were looking into this issue and they had turned the letter over to the civil right division of the Department of Justice."

Justice, FBI To Examine Police Shootings In Georgia. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/20, Gentry, Tagami, 379K) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department and the FBI are looking into fatal police shootings this year in DeKalb County. If civil rights violations are found, appropriate action will be taken,' Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim wrote in a Dec. 12 letter to local activist John Evans, who asked the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division to investigate the DeKalb shootings." DeKalb officers have killed 12 suspects since January, "more than any other police department in metro Atlanta. One officer has also been killed." The Journal-Constitution notes that while "Kim could not be reached for comment Tuesday," a DOJ official "confirmed the federal inquiry into the DeKalb shootings, but would not give details."

US Attorney For Arizona To Leave For Private Practice. The Arizona Republic (12/20, Wagner) reports, "U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton announced Tuesday that that he is quitting his government post to enter private legal practice early next year. Charlton said he will become a partner in the Phoenix-based firm of Gallagher and Kennedy at the end of January. During his stint as the state's top federal lawyer, Charlton oversaw major enforcement initiatives against terrorism, public corruption, illegal immigration and crime in Indian country."

New Mexico US Attorney Asked To Resign. On its Web site, KRQE-TV of Albuquerque (12/19, Herzenberg) reported, "The top federal prosecutor in New Mexico, U.S. Attorney David Iglesias, has been asked to resign and will be giving up the office, KRQE News 13 has learned. Sources confirmed the Department of Justice called Iglesias last week and asked him to resign." KRQE-TV added, "A statement released Monday night by the U.S. Attorney's office spokesman Norm Cairns confirmed Iglesias's departure. … Why Iglesias was asked to resign remains unknown although source said was probably just time for a change."

The Albuquerque Tribune (12/19) added, "After discussions with officials in Washington, D.C., Iglesias decided he would move on, U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman Norm Cairns said. No other information was released. The U.S. Attorney's Office has been involved in two high-profile investigations of public corruption in New Mexico this year with mixed results.

CIVIL LAW:

Suit Focuses Attention On Physicians Not Following Patients' Advance Directives. In a front page story, USA Today (12/20, 1A, Parker, 2.27M) reports on a lawsuit on a case involving Madeline Neumann, who filed an advance directive "instructed doctors not to revive her if she collapsed." After she was found unresponsive in 1995 Neumann "ended up in a hospital, tethered to wires, tubes and life-support machines — just the situation her family says she had hoped to avoid." Although her granddaughters "persuaded doctors to disconnect the machines over the next several days" and she died a week later, they "are suing the Joseph L. Morse Geriatric Center in West Palm Beach and its chief doctor, Jaimy Bensimon, for unspecified damages, claiming they essentially ignored Neumann's wishes." USA Today describes this case as "first time a Florida court has been asked to decide whether a doctor can be held liable for providing treatment at odds with a medical directive." It "could have significant implications for efforts to hold hospitals, nursing homes and physicians accountable if they disregard living wills and advance directives."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

ACLU Document Case Sparks Commentary. USA Today (12/20, 2.27M) editorializes, "Every minute, the U.S. government makes 27 decisions to classify documents. That translates into 1,620 classification decisions every hour, 38,880 every day and 14 million every year. ... it's preposterous to believe that more than a tiny percentage of classifications are justified by national security concerns. They are more probably the result of the bureaucratic impulse to keep secrets and the political instinct to avoid accountability. ... The government should have known [prior restraint] was no way to plug leaks. And it should have realized that the ACLU document wasn't worth making a federal case over."

In an opposing op-ed in USA Today (12/20, 19A, 2.27M), Pepperdine Law Professor Douglas W. Kmiec says, "This was no major victory for civil liberty. It turns out the subpoena sent to the ACLU might have been issued only because the organization's lawyers were looking for a fight. Bad form, even worse constitutional theory. Press freedom cannot be understated in a democratic republic. But it should not be overstated either." Though this "soap opera lends credence to the complaint that too much is kept secret, the remedy is not to take the law into one's own hands."

ACLU Challenges Michigan Anti-Affirmative-Action Initiative. The Detroit News (12/20, Schultz) reports, "The ACLU and NAACP filed suit Tuesday against Proposal 2, the latest salvo in a growing assault just four days before Michigan's ban on affirmative action was to take effect. The challenge was filed on the same day a federal judge agreed to give three Michigan universities a six-month delay before they stop using race as a consideration in admissions and financial aid. The court maneuvers fed a growing concern by affirmative action opponents who fear that the will of the voters, who on Nov. 7 passed the prohibition against using race, is not being respected. Both candidates for governor, and business and other leaders campaigned against the proposal." The News adds, "The ACLU of Michigan, NAACP and others filed a lawsuit on behalf of 19 students, faculty and applicants to U-M asking a judge to allow race and gender preferences to continue in university admissions. Proposal 2 shouldn't undue the U.S. Supreme Court ruling that allows the use of race as a factor in admissions, they argued."

The Detroit Free Press (12/20, Pratt, Bell, 373K) reports, "Civil rights organizations, including the NAACP's Detroit chapter and the American Civil Liberties Union, took their case to federal court. They argued the amendment doesn't apply because of a 2003 U.S. Supreme Court case affirming universities' right to consider race in admissions. … But a Washington-based group that has fought against race and gender preferences said the U.S. Supreme Court already decided the issue when it chose not to hear a challenge to California's Proposition 209, which was passed by voters in 1996. The California law was the model for Proposal 2."

Michigan Universities Win Reprieve From Proposal. Inside Higher Ed (12/20) reports, "A federal judge granted the universities a reprieve from the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative, known as Proposal 2, which was to take effect this week and would bar affirmative action in admissions by public colleges and universities in the state. Michigan State and Wayne State Universities and the University of Michigan sought permission to delay Proposal 2, saying that it would be impractical and unfair for the institutions to change their processes in the middle of an admissions cycle, with some applicants already evaluated and others awaiting review."

Detroit News Sees Assault On Self-Governance. The Detroit News (12/20) editorializes, "The American Civil Liberties Union should add the right of the people to self government to the list of freedoms it is dedicated to protecting. Michigan's ACLU chapter is making a direct assault on that right by asking a federal judge to rewrite the recently passed Proposal 2 anti-affirmative action measure in a way that would render the new law meaningless."

New Jersey Judge Halts Enforcement Of City Gun Law. The New Jersey Law Journal (12/20, Toutant) reports that Hudston County assignment Judge Maurice Gallipoli "on Dec. 13 enjoined enforcement of a Jersey City ordinance limiting handgun purchasers to one gun a month.," saying that "he doubted the ordinance would achieve" it stated end of reducing violence. Also, "he found it pre-empted by the state's extensive gun-control scheme. Gallipoli also said the law violated equal protection grounds, deeming it arbitrary, capricious and lacking a rational basis."

Jury Says New York's' Protester-Arrest Policy Violated Their Rights. The AP (12/20, Neumeister) reports, "New York City violated constitutional rights for a few months when the police department introduced a written policy in May 2001 to require those arrested at demonstrations to be locked up overnight rather than issued desk appearance tickets, a jury found. But the same jury of eight people greatly diminished Monday any potential damages when it rejected a claim that the police department had enforced an unwritten policy to lock up demonstrators for more than two years before it put the policy in writing."

UK Report Envisions Rights For Robots. The Financial Times (12/20, Davoudi) reports that the "idea…we may one day give sentient machines the kind of rights traditionally reserved for humans is raised in a British government-commissioned report which claims to be an extensive look into the future. Visions of the status of robots around 2056 have emerged from one of 270 forward-looking papers sponsored by Sir David King, the UK government's chief scientist." The paper covering robots' rights "was written by a UK partnership of Outsights, the management consultancy, and Ipsos Mori, the opinion research organisation." The Times adds, "The Horizon Scan report argues that if 'correctly managed', this new world of robots' rights could lead to increased labour output and greater prosperity," but it also "points out that the process has casualties and the first one may be the environment, especially in the areas of energy and waste."

ANTITRUST:

Delta Refuses US Airways Buyout Bid. As it filed its reorganization plan Tuesday, Delta refused US Airways' attempted $8.4 billion cash and stock bid to merge the two airlines. This decision generated significant coverage throughout the national and regional print media. For example, the Washington Post (12/20, D3, 690K) reports, :Delta Air Lines filed a reorganization plan Tuesday that calls for it to emerge from bankruptcy protection next spring as a stand-alone company worth as much as $12 billion, which would be more than the market value of the nation's two biggest carriers combined. Delta said that under the plan, its unsecured creditors would recover 63 to 80 percent of their allowed claims. … Delta also said that its board voted to reject US Airways' $8.3 billion hostile takeover bid. 'US Airways is the worst of all potential merger partners,' Delta chief executive Gerald Grinstein said." Bloomberg (12/20, Schlangenstein) notes that Delta's board "unanimously rejected" the offer. The Charlotte Observer (12/20, Harrison, 219K) reports, "Delta Air Lines attacked all facets of the US Airways' plan for a merged airline Tuesday, but its sharpest criticism is that the "new Delta" would be anti-competitive.

Delta Estimates Value Of $9.4 Billion To $12 Billion After Exiting Chapter 11. USA Today (12/20, 1B, Adams, 2.27M) reports, "Delta said that as an independent, it would be worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion when it exits Chapter 11 protection next spring. US Airways' unsolicited cash-and-stock bid was worth $8.4 billion at US Airways' closing price Tuesday. CEO Gerald Grinstein said Delta believes an independent airline offers investors and creditors greater value and certainty of success than US Airways' proposal. "

Bloomberg adds, "Delta said its plan would let unsecured creditors recover 63 percent to 80 percent of their claims, and that Blackstone Group, a financial adviser, estimates the airline's value at $9.4 billion to $12 billion. Delta's current shares will be worthless once it leaves bankruptcy."

The Pittsburgh Business Times (12/19) reports, "Delta's chief antitrust lawyer added that he doesn't believe the U.S. Department of Justice will approve a merger between Delta Air Lines Inc. and Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways Group Inc. (NYSE: LCC), Pittsburgh International Airport's leading carrier." Jim Weiss, Preston Gates & Ellis LLP partner: "It appears from a factual standpoint, this is a merger that clearly has a lot of antitrust issues attached to it. … The antitrust risk here is quite high."

Delta Cites Antitrust Worries. Bloomberg (12/20, Schlangenstein) reports, "The US Airways offer is unlikely to receive antitrust approval, is based on flawed economic assumptions and would result in the biggest debt load in the industry, Delta, the third-largest U.S. carrier, said today. … Delta wasn't persuaded by US Airways' argument that a combination creating the world's largest airline would add $1.65 billion in annual savings and new revenue. Executives at Atlanta-based Delta have expressed skepticism about US Airways' offer since it was unveiled Nov. 15."

On its Web site, CNN Money (12/20, Isidore) reports, "Executives at Delta Air Lines (tail in front) say a combination with US Airways (tail in rear) would be blocked by regulators because it would hike fares in many East Coast markets. In a call with investors, Delta CEO Jerry Grinstein said US Airways is Delta's primary competitor on the East Coast, and a deal with it would be the one least likely to be approved because of the impact on fares." CNN Money adds, "Delta said there are 2,000 routes where a combined US Airways and Delta would control 90 percent of the flights, which the company argues would prevent U.S. antitrust regulators from agreeing to the deal."

US Airways Vows To Continue Bid. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (12/20, Fitzpatrick, 230K) reports, "US Airways is refusing to back off its $8.4 billion takeover bid for Delta Air Lines despite an official rejection from Delta's board and a pledge that Delta will emerge from bankruptcy next year as a stand-alone company worth as much as $12 billion." US Airways says its plan "would provide at least $1.65 billion in cost savings and new revenue 'beyond the value that could be created by any standalone plan.' Delta creditors would also receive $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock, which closed yesterday at $57.50, up $1.70, or 3 percent." The Post-Gazette adds, "Both airlines have been lobbying the creditors committee, hoping to win support. The committee will now review both plans and is expected to make a decision early next year."

Delta Indicates It Is Open To Other Offers. Dow Jones Newswires (12/19, Kosdrosky) reports, "The Chief Executive of Delta Air Lines Inc. (DALRQ) said Tuesday that US Airways Group Inc.'s merger proposal raises unique antitrust concerns. He added that Delta would 'look at' any other proposal."

Airline Shares Fall. The AP (12/20) reports, "Airline shares slipped in Tuesday trading, after Delta Air Lines Inc. rejected a buyout bid by US Airways Group Inc. The overall Amex Airline Index fell 1 percent, with all 11 of its component stocks marking declines. Many of the index's percentage swings were slight, less than 1 percent. The declines came amid easing crude oil prices, which dropped 29 cents to $61.92 per barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Falling oil prices typically strengthen airline shares, as jet fuel is among the industry's top costs."

Travel Columnist Pans Airline Mergers. In his "Holiday Travel Wish List" on the USA Today Web site (12/20), "On The Road" columnist Bill McGee calls on DoJ not to "rubber-stamp" mergers. McGee writes, "What investors call 'consolidation' is a nice word for worse service and more unemployment. With the ink not even dry on US Airways' marriage with America West, that carrier already is considering a hostile takeover of Delta. … For passengers, a dwindling number of carriers will mean higher prices, fewer flights and a decline in service (yes, it's possible for service to decline further)."

Coffeeshop Owner Accuses Starbucks Of Antitrust Violations. USA Today (12/20, 1B, Iwata, 2.27M) reports that in a "closely watched federal lawsuit," Penny Stafford, who owns the Belvi Coffee and Tea Exchange in Bellevue, WA, "charges that Starbucks illegally maintains its monopoly by barring other coffeehouses from prime downtown high-rises in Seattle and Bellevue through exclusive leases with property owners. Starbucks also drove Stafford and other coffeehouses out of business by buying coffee sellers and flooding neighborhoods with new Starbucks stores that even cannibalized the sales of existing Starbucks shops, the lawsuit alleges." Starbucks spokeswoman Sanja Gould: "Starbucks denies that we have done anything improper, and we intend to rightfully defend ourselves. As Starbucks has grown, so has the industry, all of which benefits coffee consumers and the competitors of Starbucks." USA Today adds, "

Case Comes In "Antitrust's Second Golden Age." In the same article, USA Today adds, "The Starbucks case comes amid what Boston attorneys Thane Scott and Veronica Abreu call 'antitrust's second golden age.' Attorneys are heatedly debating what monopoly practices are predatory. Regulators are weighing whether antitrust law should be upgraded in the new global economy, just as the law was shaped in the early 20th-century industrial economy. And antitrust civil lawsuits are on the rise, reports Competition Law 360, a legal publication. The lawsuit also increases the controversy around fast-growing Starbucks, the target of a vocal backlash in recent years from neighborhood and anti-globalization activists and some consumers."

Ericsson Purchase Of Redback Boosts Net Strategy. The Wall Street Journal (12/20, B2, White, Silver, 2.04M) reports, "Telefon AB L.M. Ericsson's agreement to buy Redback Networks Inc. for $2.1 billion reflects how the explosion in video and other multimedia services over the Internet and a surge in broadband subscribers are driving phone and cable companies to upgrade their networks and spurring big makers of networking hardware to unite. Ericsson, a Swedish provider of equipment and services for telecommunications infrastructure, said it will pay holders of the Silicon Valley seller of routing equipment $25 a share, or 18% more than Redback's share price before the announcement. Ericsson characterized the price as a 60% premium above the 90-day average for Redback stock."

Valassis To Acquire Direct-Mail Firm As Companies Drop Lawsuits. The Wall Street Journal (12/20, A12, 2.04M) reports, "Valassis Communications Inc. agreed to acquire direct-mail marketer Advo Inc. for a reduced amount as the companies dropped lawsuits against each other over their disputed merger agreement. Valassis will pay $33 a share for Advo, or about $1.05 billion, down from $37 a share, or $1.18 billion, under an agreement reached in July. Valassis also will assume about $125 million in debt."

"Tough Political Climate" Awaits AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The Financial Times (12/20, Kirchgaessner, Taylor) reports, "AT&T's $68bn takeover of BellSouth will face a tough political climate in Washington in 2007 when Democrats take control of the Congress, virtually ensuring that the former Ma Bell will have to agree to harsher conditions. The possibility that the telecoms mega-merger would be approved by the Federal Communications Commission before the end of this year appeared to disintegrate on Monday after Robert McDowell, a Republican commissioner at the FCC, said he would abstain from deadlocked negotiations over the transaction at the regulatory agency."

Judge Bars San Francisco Newspapers From Consolidating Business Operations. The AP (12/20) reports, "A federal judge on Tuesday blocked San Francisco Bay area newspapers owned by MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle from consolidating some of their business operations until the outcome of an antitrust lawsuit challenging the move. U.S. District Judge Susan Illston had temporarily barred the consolidation of distribution and national advertising sales. She made her ruling official on Tuesday after giving the news outlets a chance to respond. The organizations said two weeks ago they would not immediately merge operations, but they planned to do so if they prevailed in the antitrust trial scheduled for April."

The San Jose Mercury News (12/20, Carey, 229K) adds, "The order, by U.S. District Court Judge Susan Illston, granted the preliminary injunction sought by Clint Reilly, a San Francisco investor who has filed an antitrust lawsuit to prevent MediaNews from buying the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times. Reilly contends that the purchase, which was assisted by Hearst, owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, would give MediaNews a Bay Area news and advertising monopoly."

Bloomberg (12/20, Gullo) reports, "MediaNews and Hearst agreed in April to try to boost revenue by offering one contract to advertise in the San Francisco Chronicle, owned by Hearst, and the Contra Costa Times and the San Jose Mercury News, both owned by MediaNews. Lawyers for both companies told Illston last month that implementation of the plan wasn't imminent."

FCC To Rule On Measure That Could Help Phone Companies Penetrate Cable Market. The Washington Post (12/20, D1, Sipress, 690K) reports, :Telephone companies could get a major boost today in their efforts to penetrate the cable television market when the Federal Communications Commission considers a measure that would give state and local officials less latitude in awarding cable franchises. FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, a leading advocate of the rule, has argued that government officials often stymie competition by delaying decisions on awarding cable franchises to telephone companies and by imposing exorbitant fees and conditions. As a result, cable operators often have been able to maintain a virtual monopoly on television services, resulting in steadily increasing prices for consumers, according to Martin. He cited an FCC survey"

Attorney Expresses Approval Of New Chinese Merger Laws. In a column published in Financial Times (12/20) Kenneth Chan, head of Allen & Overy's China group, writes, "The merger and acquisition provisions enacted jointly by China's Ministry of Commerce and other ministries in 2003 were overhauled in August this year. … Important changes were made in a number of areas, in recognition of the growing importance of China's private enterprises, the increased international mobility of Chinese entrepreneurs and the significant role they are playing in foreigners' M&A activities. … While their much narrower application – largely confined to two scenarios that are both foreign listing-related – is a disappointment to many, the clearer and more detailed regime that has now been put in place for its implementation is nonetheless a welcome development."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

EPA Rule Change On Toxic Chemical Emissions Would Benefit Big Firms. The Christian Science Monitor (12/20, Clayton, 59K) reports, "In a bid to trim the regulatory burden on small businesses, the Environmental Protection Agency is set to relax the rules on what toxic chemicals they have to report." But "in a twist, the EPA's newly revised Toxics Release Inventory rule will also make it possible for hundreds of large corporations to avoid reporting specific amounts of toxic chemicals they release into the air, land, or water, environmentalists warn." The rule change "has cheered small-business groups, generated widespread public opposition, and caught the eye of some Democratic congressmen, who will take control of Congress next month."

Overseas Shipholding To Pay $37 Million In Maritime Pollution Case. The Los Angeles Times (12/20, Mehren, Krikorian, 850K) reports, "Capping a three-year international investigation, federal officials on Tuesday announced a landmark, $37-million penalty in a maritime pollution case involving" Overseas Shipholding Group, "one of the world's largest publicly traded tanker companies." The fine "is the largest criminal penalty on record concerning deliberate maritime pollution, and it includes a $9.2-million 'community service payment' that will fund maritime environmental projects from coast to coast, including projects off California." The company "pleaded guilty to 33 felony counts related to deliberate dumping of sludge and other contaminants as well as falsification of log entries that such carriers are required to maintain." Acting Associate Attorney General William Mercer, at a news conference in Boston: "To those who cut corners at OSG, discharging waste in the middle of the night to save a few bucks, this case sends a message that crime just does not pay. … We will not see our oceans and our seas used as convenient dumping grounds for corporations."

The AP (12/20, Ngowi) reports, "The criminal penalty is the largest-ever involving deliberate vessel pollution, the U.S. Coast Guard said. Shares of New York-based Overseas Shipholding closed unchanged at $59.05 on the New York Stock Exchange. The Department of Justice and the U.S. Coast Guard opened their investigation after a tip from Canadian officials, who reported that official records of one of the company's ships failed to account for the disposal of oil waste. An investigation showed 150,000 gallons of oil-contaminated waste was dumped in the waters between Maine and Massachusetts, officials said."

The Washington Times (12/20, Seper, 88K) reports, "New York-based OSG, which has 4,000 employees, transports crude oil, petroleum products and dry bulk commodities throughout the world. The company owns an international fleet of 106 operating vessels and has 30 under construction. The guilty plea involves 12 of its ships. The ports where the pollution occurred were identified as Boston; Portland, Maine; Los Angeles; San Francisco; Wilmington, N.C.; and Beaumont, Texas."

USA Today (12/20, Johnson, 2.27M) notes, "In one instance described in government documents, an unidentified engineer aboard the M/T Overseas Shirley alerted managers to the "criminal" dumping of an estimated 40,600 gallons of sludge, or concentrated black waste oil. In another case, the government cited the tanker M/T Uranus for routinely releasing "oily waste" into the waters off Maine and Massachusetts from August 2001 to October 2003."

The Boston Herald (12/20, Fitzgerald, 184K) reports, "The multi-state investigation was launched in Boston after Canadian officials tipped off local Coast Guard authorities that records for one of OSG's ships showed bilge waste was being disposed into the sea - even though other records indicated the ship was complying with environmental laws."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Suspected Cartel Leader Accused Of Ordering Murders Of Deputy Police Chief, Officers. In San Diego, the AP (12/20) reports the "suspected kingpin of one of Mexico's oldest and most notorious drug cartels ordered the murder of Tijuana's deputy police chief and the beheadings of three police officers, according to a federal indictment unsealed Tuesday. Francisco Javier Arellano Felix, 37, would be eligible for the death penalty if convicted on a count of running a criminal enterprise, part of the new seven-count indictment. The killings were included as evidence of the criminal enterprise that authorities say extended into the United States."

Indoor Marijuana Seizures Rise In California. On its Web site, NPR's All Things Considered (12/19) reports federal agents in California "say the pot farms they raided have all the markings of organized crime. The farms were found in unexpected places, many of them at suburban homes near Sacramento." Gordon Taylor is the Assistant Special Agent in Charge of the DEA office in Sacramento. He "says the plants seized from 41 homes linked to the case were capable of producing $74 million worth of pot in a year. Eight people have been arrested. … Law enforcement officials say it's not an isolated problem. Seizures of indoor marijuana plants in California are up 81 percent this year."

California Marijuana Dispensary Ordered To Close. On its Web site, KESQ-TV, Palm Desert, California (12/20) reports CannaHelp, the medical marijuana dispensary in Palm Desert "is being told to close up shop. The city has sent the business a cease and desist letter. Palm Desert City Attorney David Irwin told NewsChannel 3 CannaHelp violated its agreement with the city and its business license is now revoked. CannaHelp was raided a little more than two weeks ago when authorities believed the dispensary was selling pot for profit."

Owner To Defy Order. The Palm Springs Desert Sun (12/19) reported CannaHelp "is staying open in defiance of a cease-and-desist letter from the city. 'I'm going to stay open by myself,' said owner Stacy Hochanadel, after sending his other employees home."

Needle-Exchange Program Approved In New Jersey. The New York Times (12/20, Chen, 1.16M) reports New Jersey yesterday "became the last state in the country to offer needle exchange programs for intravenous drug users, when Gov. Jon S. Corzine signed legislation authorizing a pilot program for up to six towns. The law allows drug users to exchange used syringes for new ones, and provides $10 million for drug treatment facilities."

In Tucson, Unwritten Rule Said To Allow Some Drug Smugglers To Be Freed. Nogales International (12/20) reports, "Many people want a fence built along the Mexico/United States border as a means to stop drug smuggling, terrorism and illegal immigration, but the truth is that drug smugglers can be caught red-handed, and still go free - as long as they're carrying less than 500 pounds of marijuana. Several local officials have said that the unwritten rule at the Tucson office of the U.S. Attorney is that if a smuggler is accused of moving less than 500 pounds of pot through a port of entry, that person will walk away, generally. … All the local officials said that they do not blame the U.S. Attorney's Office. They say the office staff is too small and overworked. … Some officials feel that they have an obligation to try the cases left dormant by the federal government, but others feel that by cleaning up after the feds their good deeds will be expected to become regular."

Reporting Continues On Marijuana Cash Crop Report. BBC News (12/19) reported marijuana "is the top cash crop in the US, a report released on Monday says. It says that despite intensive eradication plans, $35bn (£18bn) worth of the illegal drug is produced a year - more than corn and wheat combined. … Activists seeking the decriminalization of the substance, say the report backs the need for change, a position rejected by government officials." The ONDCP's Tom Riley "rejected any economic arguments for legalizing marijuana saying marijuana use was an 'inherently harmful activity.'"

Parole Board Member Testifies FBI Agents Threatened Him Over Boston Mob Murder. The AP (12/20) reports, "A former member of the state Parole Board said Tuesday that two FBI agents tried to intimidate him into keeping a wrongly convicted man in prison for a 1960s gangland slaying." Former Springfield Mayor Michael Albano "testified in a lawsuit filed by the families of four men who say the FBI allowed them to be framed to protect a mobster informant. … Lawyers for the men's families asked Albano if the FBI, after being contacted by the parole board as it considered petitions to commute their sentences, ever turned over evidence it had that the men were not involved in the murder of Deegan. 'No such information was provided,' Albano testified. Albano also made a brief reference in his testimony to a 1983 'unannounced visit' from former FBI Agents John Connolly and John Morris as the board was considering a petition to commute Limone's sentence," and "outside the courtroom, Albano said Connolly and Morris urged him to vote against commuting Limone's sentence and said that if he voted in favor of commuting his sentence it could hurt his career. 'They intimidated me and tried to get me to change my vote,' Albano told reporters."

FBI Releasing Final Lennon Documents. The Los Angeles Times (12/20, Weinstein, 850K) reports, "The FBI agreed Tuesday to make public the final 10 documents about the surveillance of John Lennon that it had withheld for 25 years from a UC Irvine historian on the grounds that releasing them could cause 'military retaliation against the United States.' Despite the fierce battle the government waged to keep the documents secret, the files contain information that is hardly shocking, just new details about Lennon's ties to New Left leaders and antiwar groups in London in the early 1970s, said the historian, Jon Wiener. … 'The content of the files released today is an embarrassment to the U.S. government,' said Wiener, 62, who has written two books on the late Beatles." Wiener added, "Today, we can see that the national security claims that the FBI has been making for 25 years were absurd from the beginning." The Times notes, "The documents will be posted on the Internet today at http://www.LennonFBIfiles.com."

IMMIGRATION:

Iowa Officials Write Chertoff To Criticize Swift Raids. The Des Moines Register (12/20, Jacobs, 160K) reports Gov. Tom Vilsack and Maj. Gen. Ron Dardis, the top officer of the Iowa National Guard, wrote "a blunt and stinging letter" to DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff Tuesday calling the ICE raids at Swift & Co. "'completely unacceptable,' saying agents undermined the public's trust in government, potentially jeopardized the safety of law enforcement personnel in Iowa and could have compromised undercover operations." Vilsack and Dardis "said they will not cooperate with federal immigration officials in the future unless they act more responsibly and provide better coordination with state officials." They "said ICE officials failed to advise the Iowa National Guard of the size and scope of the raid, which 'could have led to unacceptable risks to Guard personnel and property.'"

The Des Moines Register (12/20, Norman, 160K) reported in a separate letter to Chertoff Tuesday, Sen. Tom Harkin wrote "to say he is 'appalled' by the process used to detain and deport" Swift workers. He criticized "a telephone hotline for information for family members that was set up by the government" and said it had "been 'almost impossible' for lawyers and members of the clergy to gain access to workers who were detained, and workers were taken to other states without being granted access to lawyers." Harkin "said he hopes Chertoff shares his belief that 'the failure to ensure that basic legal rights and humanitarian protections are afforded to individuals in our immigration system reflects poorly on the principles that have made the United States strong.'"

Raids Seen As Having Solidified Positions On Guest-Worker Program. The Rocky Mountain News (12/20, Sprengelmeyer) reports "lawmakers from competing sides of the debate over a proposed guest-worker plan" have used the Swift arrests "to bolster their locked-in positions. That could set the stage for another difficult debate in coming months, after Democrats take control of both houses of Congress and try to advance a plan President Bush has long favored." Rep. Tom Tancredo "called it 'hogwash' that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff began his press conference detailing the arrests by talking about the need for a guest-worker plan, which could grant legal status to millions who have entered the country illegally. Chertoff said tough enforcement was only one part of solving immigration problems." It "was a common theme all week, as longtime backers of the proposed guest-worker plan, including Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., said the arrests signaled a clarion call for a comprehensive approach to solving immigration problems."

Those Arrested In Raids Begin Facing Charges. The Denver Post (12/20, Finley, 256K) reports, "Meatpacking workers detained during last week's federal raids began facing immigration judges Tuesday in Colorado and five other states. Some were released after relatives posted bond of at least $1,500. In Colorado, Immigration Judge Donn Livingston saw 27 detainees at the regional detention facility in Aurora and set court hearings where they are to be informed of charges against them. Meanwhile, a federal grand jury in Minnesota indicted 20 detained workers on criminal-immigration offenses and charges related to identity theft."

La Raza Releases Study On Hunger Rates Among Hispanics In The US. The Washington Post (12/20, A4, Aizenman, 690K) reports, "Nearly one in five Hispanics lacks sufficient access to nutritious food and one in 20 regularly goes hungry, posing serious health and economic risks to the nation's largest and fastest-growing minority group, according to a new study. The National Council of La Raza, a Latino advocacy group, noted in its study that the 'food insecurity' rate of Hispanics is nearly as high as that of non-Hispanic blacks and substantially greater than that of non-Hispanic whites.'"

50 Arrested In Fugitive Operations Team Sweep In Miami. The Miami Herald (12/20, 286K) reports, "Immigration authorities have arrested 50 undocumented immigrants who ignored orders to leave the country and another 12 who were in violation of US immigration laws, many of them with criminal histories, US Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said today. Among those arrested was a 38-year-old Honduran convicted of sex crimes and deported in 2000. Jose Mario Lara now faces criminal charges for returning illegally to the United States. … 'Our officers are working tirelessly to ensure that our nation's laws are upheld,' Michael Rozos, field office director for the ICE Office of Detention and Removal Operations in Florida, said in a statement. 'Those who break our immigration laws shouldn't be surprised if they are arrested, charged and deported.' The weeklong sweep by ICE's Miami Fugitive Operations team ended Friday with the arrest of 62 fugitives and violators."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts, Alito Seen As Moving Court To The Right. USA Today (12/20, 2.27M) reports although "most of the major decisions in their first full term together won't be announced for months, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito have signaled a readiness to move the court to the right." In recent cases "involving abortion, global warming and school integration, Roberts and Alito have been aggressive and sometimes feisty proponents of conservative views and particularly sympathetic to arguments by the Bush administration." Their tactics have "added flair to the court's public sessions and have contrasted sharply with the tentative approach that moderate Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Anthony Kennedy often took in disputes over abortion, affirmative action and other key issues." Legal and political conservatives "have been pleased with the new justices' approach. At the annual meeting of the conservative Federalist Society last month, outgoing Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., praised Roberts' and Alito's confirmation to the high court as 'signature achievements' of the Congress that Republicans controlled for more than a decade."

Brownback Wants To Re-Question Judicial Nominee On Gay Marriage. The AP (12/20, Dvorak)

reports Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback (R), "who wants to champion social conservatives in the presidential race, said Tuesday he wants a Senate panel to re-question a judicial nominee who attended a same-sex union ceremony." Brownback "said he wants Michigan state judge Janet Neff to testify about her role in the 2002 Massachusetts ceremony, her legal views on same-sex unions and her ability to be impartial if called upon to rule on such cases." In Iowa "to meet with GOP activists, Brownback said he only wants a chance to question Neff about her role in the 2002 ceremony. Brownback also wants a recorded vote in the Senate."

Durbin Seeks Update On Iraq, Afghanistan Detainee Abuse Probe. The AP (12/20, Jordan) reports Sen. Richard Durbin has asked "the Justice Department on Monday for an update on its progress prosecuting government employees who were accused in at least 17 cases of abusing detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan. In response, a Justice spokesman said at least some of the cases are still under investigation." In a letter "sent Monday to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales," Durbin "noted that the department began looking into the allegations of abuse two and a half years ago." Durbin said, "In that time, there have not been any indictments in any of these cases." Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse "said at least a few of the estimated 17 remaining cases are still open."

OTHER NEWS:

Cheney To Testify At Libby Trial. In what some media reports are portraying as another headache for the Administration, the AP (12/20, Apuzzo) says this morning Vice President Dick Cheney "will be called to testify on behalf of his former chief of staff in the CIA leak case, defense attorneys said Tuesday, ending months of speculation over what would be historic testimony. 'We're calling the vice president,' attorney Ted Wells said in court. Wells represents defendant I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, who is charged with perjury and obstruction."

The Wall Street Journal (12/20, A4, McKinnon, 2.04M), under the headline "Cheney Testimony Could Exacerbate White House Woes," reports "Cheney's testimony…will add to White House political problems, at a time when President Bush will be seeking to rebuild his eroded standing. … A Cheney spokeswoman suggested he doesn't plan to resist. 'We've cooperated fully in this matter and will continue to do so,' said Lea Anne McBride." The Journal adds, "The spectacle of the vice president testifying in court is likely to deepen the White House's public-relations problems, as Democrats on Capitol Hill also will launch investigations of the administration in a number of areas, including its conduct of the Iraq war."

The New York Times (12/20, Johnston, 1.16M) reports, "The prospect of Mr. Cheney's testimony suggested that Mr. Libby's trial could be transformed from a narrowly gauged perjury case into a riveting courtroom drama with the taciturn vice president as the star witness. He would testify under oath and be exposed to cross-examination by prosecutors."

Georgia School Board Abandons Evolution Sticker Case. AP (12/20, Gross) reports, "A suburban Atlanta school board that put stickers in high school science books saying evolution is 'a theory, not a fact' abandoned its legal battle to keep them Tuesday after four years. The Cobb County board agreed in federal court never to use a similar sticker or to undermine the teaching of evolution in science classes."

Many States Preempted Congress On Minimum Wage Hikes. The New York Times (12/20, Uchitelle, 1.16M) reports congressional Democrats are "making a much-delayed increase in the minimum wage their signature attempt to lift incomes and quiet widespread economic anxiety. But the party's modest proposal does not catch up with what the states have already done to raise the wages of tens of millions of workers." In the "last election alone, voters in six states approved minimums higher than the federal level, and in some states cost-of-living clauses automatically increase the minimums — a step that Congress has never taken and that most Democrats still balk at." Some advocates "wonder whether Congress can regain the lead, or should." The Democrats "plan to introduce a bill in Congress next month that would increase the federal minimum for the first time in a decade — to $7.25 an hour in the spring of 2009, reaching that level in three steps from the present $5.15 an hour. More than 13 million workers earning less than $7.25 an hour today, or just above that, would get raises."

Abramoff Christmas List From 2001 Included Lavish Gifts. The Washington Post (12/20, A21, Smith, 690K) reports that while former Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff "makes no more than 40 cents an hour for his labors at the federal prison camp at Cumberland, Md.," Christmas in 2001 "was a far more high-flying holiday" when he was "paid as much as $500 an hour." Before he "pleaded guilty to defrauding banks in a deal to buy a casino cruise line -- Abramoff was a top rainmaker at Greenberg Traurig's Washington office and liked to be generous at this time of year, at least to those who could help him. He compiled a list of 45 people to whom his staff was supposed to send gifts such as a Baccarat crystal bowl and a platinum Tiffany clock." A copy of "his holiday gift list, obtained by The Washington Post, details one of the methods that Washington lobbyists can use to flatter clients and lawmakers. It shows that those who had helped enrich Abramoff got a reward, and his father and brother and their wives got either cookies or a fruit basket." Three members of Congress "and one staff member were among his intended gift recipients, according to the list. Three of them received a more lavish item than House ethics rules allowed, if Abramoff's assistants followed his instructions."

Convict In Terror Case Back In Court (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

An American convicted of helping the Taliban was back in federal court Tuesday for violating the terms of his probation, authorities said.

James Ujaama, a Muslim convert from Seattle, was arrested over the weekend in Belize — where, under the terms of his supervised release, he was not supposed to be, Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said.

Ujaama was brought back Tuesday to the United States, and waived his rights to a removal hearing in U.S. District Court in Miami. Sierra said Ujaama soon will be transferred to Seattle, where he was sentenced in 2003.

The full terms of Ujaama's three-year probation period were not immediately available.

Ujaama, who was born James Earnest Thompson, was charged in 2002 with trying to set up a terrorist training camp for Muslim cleric Abu Hamza al-Masri.

He pleaded guilty a year later to lesser charges: conspiring to provide cash, computers and fighters to the Taliban. In exchange, Ujaama served two years in prison and agreed to cooperate with terrorism investigations until 2013.

Federal officials have said Ujaama's help was crucial in the 2004 indictment of al-Masri on charges of trying to establish the training camp in Bly, Ore., and providing aid to al-Qaida. Authorities also questioned Ujaama in the case of Haroon Rashid Aswat, linked to the July 2005 transit bombings in London that killed 56 people.

Ujaama's attorney in Seattle, Peter Offenbecher, declined to say whether he had recently spoken with his client.

"We're investigating the facts to determine the appropriate course of action," Offenbecher said. He refused further comment.

Emily Langlie, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Seattle, said it was unclear when Ujaama would appear there. "It's determined by when the marshals get him here," Langlie said.

U.S. Fugitive With Al Qaeda Ties Arrested (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 20, 2006

Police in Belize yesterday arrested an American Muslim with ties to al Qaeda who pleaded guilty in 2003 to conspiring to provide cash, computers and fighters to the Taliban, but fled after agreeing to cooperate in ongoing investigations.

Authorities said James Ujaama, who was wanted for parole violation, entered Belize, a small country on the eastern coast of Central America, 10 days ago using a phony Mexican passport.

"The police conducted an investigation, and some time around midnight last night or earlier this morning, this fugitive was apprehended here in Belize City," said acting Police Chief Eduardo Wade, adding that one Belizean police inspector was treated and later released for injuries he received when Ujaama "attempted to escape during his apprehension."

Ujaama, who served two years in a plea agreement on charges of dealing with al Qaeda and providing various types of material support to the Taliban, has since been turned over to U.S. authorities, said Leonard Hill, deputy chief of mission at the U.S. Embassy.

Mr. Hill said Ujaama's immediate crime was a parole violation, but he could face additional charges and also is being held as a material witness in other terror-related cases.

"One indication of his status may be that federal officials sent down a private plane to bring him back to the States," Mr. Hill said.

Ujaama, also known as Ernest James Thompson, was first arrested in Denver in July 2002 as a material witness and later named in a federal grand jury indictment of providing resources to al Qaeda. The indictment said he was attempting to create a camp for training terrorists near Bly, Ore., between October and December of 1999.

In April 2003, the government filed a superseding complaint saying Ujaama took money, computer equipment and women to Taliban officials in Afghanistan. In February 2004, he agreed to cooperate with U.S. prosecutors -- especially for what he knew about radical London cleric Abu Hamza al-Masri, who has since been convicted in Britain of inciting murder and racial hatred.

Al-Masri, the one-eyed former head of the Finsbury Park mosque in north London, preached hatred to hundreds of young Muslims, including Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person charged in the U.S. in connection with the September 11 attacks.

Ujaama, a former community activist in Seattle, converted to Islam in the post-civil rights era. While traveling in England in 1999, he purportedly met with al-Masri and then traveled to Afghanistan to study Shariah, according to family friends. Shariah refers to the legal framework within which public and some private aspects of life are regulated for those living in a legal system based on Muslim principles of jurisprudence.

As part of the plea agreement, which limited his prison terms to just two years, he admitted delivering currency and other items to persons in the territory of Afghanistan controlled by the Taliban, and that with the assistance of the Taliban, he entered the country to install software programs he had brought with him on computers belonging to Taliban officials.

U.S. Freezes Accounts Of British Citizen (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, December 20, 2006

The Bush administration took action Tuesday to freeze financial accounts and assets of a naturalized British citizen for allegedly providing "material and logistical" support to al-Qaida and other terror groups.

The action against Mohammed Al Ghabra means that any bank accounts or other financial assets belonging to him found in the United States must be frozen. Americans also are prohibited from doing business with him.

The Treasury Department alleged that Al Ghabra had organized travel to Pakistan for people seeking to meet with senior al-Qaida officials and to undertake jihad training. Several of those people returned to the United Kingdom to engage in covert activity on behalf of al-Qaida, the department said.

Al Ghabra also allegedly provided support and facilitated travel of people based in the United Kingdom to Iraq to support the insurgents' fight against coalition forces, the department said.

Wiretap Suit Joins Others In Bay Area (OREGONIAN)

The Oregonian, December 20, 2006

An Oregon lawsuit challenging a federal warrantless eavesdropping program has been shipped to a judge in San Francisco who is handling dozens of similar cases.

The move, ordered by a judicial panel that consolidates groups of lawsuits with related legal issues, takes the Oregon case away from U.S. District Judge Garr M. King in Portland.

Earlier this year, King refused the government's motion to dismiss the suit filed by the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, a defunct Ashland-based organization that claims to have been the subject of illegal wiretapping.

The case has been sent to U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker, who earlier this year refused the federal government's attempt to dismiss a similar case that accuses AT&T of illegally cooperating with the program.

The government claims letting the lawsuits go forward will reveal state secrets and threaten national security.

The Oregon case was transferred along with two suits from New York and one from Missouri.

A federal judge in Detroit earlier this year said the warrantless wiretapping program was illegal and unconstitutional. That case is under appeal and not subject to the transfer order.

The Bush administration has defended the legality of the program, which entails monitoring conversations between U.S. citizens and suspected terrorists elsewhere in the world.

U.S. Cancels Order For 75 Million Doses Of Anthrax Vaccine (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 19 — In a major setback to the Bush administration's biodefense efforts, the government announced Tuesday that it had canceled an order for 75 million doses of a new anthrax vaccine, the single biggest purchase planned for the nation's antiterror drug stockpile.

DOJ_NMG_0107719

Since VaxGen of Brisbane, Calif., won the contract two years ago, skeptics have questioned the ability of the company, a small biotechnology business, to deliver on such a large order, as well as the administration's capacity to properly manage the overall $5.6 billion program, known as BioShield.

VaxGen, which has no other major customers and has never made a successful vaccine or drug, was supposed to deliver enough vaccine to inoculate 25 million Americans after an anthrax attack, each with three doses.

Officials at the Department of Health and Human Services terminated the $877 million contract Tuesday after VaxGen failed to start required clinical trials, a delay caused by troubles with the vaccine formula.

"With any type of scientific endeavor or research, it is always an unpredictable path that you will follow," said Bill Hall, a department spokesman.

VaxGen's genetically engineered vaccine was selected because it was expected to produce fewer side effects and was effective with fewer doses than the only alternative, a 1950s-era vaccine now manufactured by Emergent BioSolutions of Rockville, Md.

A modern anthrax vaccine had been under development for a decade by Army scientists, before VaxGen won its contract after lining up a licensing agreement with the military researchers.

"This is a great disappointment and a very real setback," said D. A. Henderson, the former director of the Department of Health and Human Services office that helped create the BioShield program.

By the end of this year, VaxGen was supposed to have delivered its first 25 million doses to the stockpile. But as it was testing the vaccine, the company noticed that it was breaking down too quickly, apparently because of an unexpected interaction with an additive intended to bolster the vaccine's effectiveness, said Lance Ignon, a company spokesman.

The Department of Health and Human Services, under pressure from Congress to reduce the risk of relying on a single company, has separately bought nine million doses of the Emergent BioSolutions vaccine, which has been widely used by the military since 1998 to inoculate more than 1.5 million members of the military. The mandatory vaccinations led to lawsuits and complaints of serious side effects.

Mr. Hall said the Department of Health and Human Services was committed to finding a manufacturer to develop the modern version of the vaccine. But he said he could not predict how long that would take.

The vaccine is not the nation's only defense against an anthrax attack. The department has also bought enough antibiotics to treat about 40 million Americans, in the event that multiple cities are struck at once. The recommended treatment after confirmed exposure to anthrax is a combination of a vaccine and antibiotics because anthrax spores are so hardy they can outlive the 60-day antibiotic course and still possibly threaten an exposed person.

VaxGen's future is now in jeopardy, as the company was entitled to no compensation until it began to make deliveries to the stockpile. The company, which has about 230 employees, has invested more than $150 million on the project, Mr. Ignon said.

This is the second high-profile failure for VaxGen. The 11-year-old company's planned AIDS vaccine was abandoned in 2003 after it proved ineffective.

Project BioShield was created in July 2004 by an act of Congress at the request of the president. It was supposed to greatly expand the nation's stockpile of a variety of drugs and vaccines to protect against a biological, nuclear or chemical attack. But progress has been slow, in part because large pharmaceutical companies have shied from the venture and the government has taken a long time to decide what it wants.

Anthrax Vaccine Contract Voided, Thwarting Administration (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Federal health officials yesterday scuttled the largest piece of the Bush administration's two-year program to counter bioterrorism, canceling an $877.5 million contract with VaxGen to develop an anthrax vaccine after the company missed a deadline to begin human testing.

The decision, delivered in a one-page letter, ends a troubled effort by the small California firm that has come to symbolize the failures of the government's ambitious $5.6 billion Project BioShield. The termination occurred on the same day President

Bush signed legislation attempting to salvage the program by reorganizing its management and pumping more money into firms doing the work.

"It's very disappointing that they took such aggressive and dramatic action without engaging in a discussion with us about potential ways for salvaging all the work that has gone into this program," said Lance Ignon, VaxGen's vice president of corporate affairs. "We believe there is a high probability that this technology would lead to a modern anthrax vaccine."

The company has spent more than $175 million of its own money on the project, its only current contract, he said.

The cancellation means the government will continue to depend on a controversial anthrax vaccine, used by the military and made by Emergent BioSolutions of Gaithersburg, years longer than expected. A spokesman for the Department of Health and Human Services said the agency remains committed to developing a next-generation anthrax vaccine but has not decided whether to hold another competition.

"We are moving as aggressively and quickly as we can to reach that goal," said Bill Hall, a department spokesman.

VaxGen was picked for the project in 2004 despite having never successfully produced a drug. It was known for a failed attempt at an AIDS vaccine, and the company has had accounting and management problems, which caused it be delisted from the Nasdaq Stock Market.

In signing on to develop an anthrax vaccine, the company agreed to meet the government's aggressive timetable, producing a drug in five years, half the industry standard for such a product. VaxGen was to be paid as it began delivering the 75 million doses to the government, enough for 25 million people, roughly the equivalent of the population in the New York and Washington areas combined.

But VaxGen struggled from the beginning. The product's expected delivery was delayed two years as the company attempted to improve the vaccine's potency and reliability. In November, the company suffered another blow when the Food and Drug Administration refused to allow the firm to begin human testing because of those long-standing concerns.

The cancellation throws the company's survivability into doubt. VaxGen has said it has enough funds to work through 2007, but its only other product is a smallpox vaccine for which it doesn't have a contract. The anthrax contract was canceled for default, meaning the government does not plan to reimburse VaxGen for its costs and could even hold the company liable if there are extra costs from buying the product from another source.

VaxGen is exploring its legal and strategic options, Ignon said. The company could appeal the decision. "Fortunately, we are well capitalized," he said.

The government now hopes a reorganization of the program, signed into law yesterday, will address the delays and other complaints lobbed at Project BioShield by the private sector for the past two years. The legislation creates the Biomedical Advanced Research and Development Authority, within HHS, to manage the effort. It also allocates $1 billion over three years for research and attempts to pump more government money into the private sector sooner by making payments as companies meet milestones, instead of waiting until they begin delivering the product.

Yesterday's cancellation of the VaxGen effort "is a step back for an anthrax vaccine, but I think we have said this was a flaw in BioShield," said Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.), one of the chief architects of the legislation revamping the program. "I would like to think if that happened under the new system, we would have caught the problem at a much earlier point."

Until a new vaccine is developed, the government will rely on its stockpiles of antibiotics, including ciprofloxacin, for dealing with anthrax exposure and 10 million doses of an older vaccine made by Emergent. Some soldiers have complained of significant side effects from the Emergent vaccine and have refused to take it, though the FDA says it's safe. VaxGen had aimed to require fewer doses over a shorter period than Emergent's to produce immunity.

U.S. Turns To Tech For Translators (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, December 20, 2006

Intelligence agencies and the military are turning to technology developed for call centers, sporting events and television shopping channels to compensate for an ongoing shortage of qualified translators, interviews and public documents show.

DOJ_NMG_0107721

In Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, the Defense Department's research arm is testing portable translation devices that allow English-speaking soldiers to hold conversations with Iraqis.

Government-backed researchers are working to convert broadcasts and website postings from Arabic and Mandarin Chinese into English and to build search engines that can extract complex information from the translated texts.

These efforts are part of a government plan to bolster the thin ranks of skilled translators, say researchers and experts, so human translators can focus on more demanding projects.

"Human language specialists are precious assets," says John Hall, a former Navy SEAL who is president of VoxTec International. The Annapolis, Md., company makes a handheld translation device being tested in Iraq. "You're never going to have enough of them," Hall says. "But if a machine can do some basic tasks, that frees up (a translator) for other work."

In-Q-Tel, a venture-capital company funded by the CIA, has invested in a company that produces software that helps private companies glean information from recorded customer-service calls.

The technology could help intelligence analysts decipher subtleties, such as differences in accents and pronunciations, that can change the meanings of spoken words, its makers say.

Much of the spending is classified, but available public contracting and budget documents show that the Pentagon has at least $22 million to spend this year on research. In November 2005, the Pentagon announced $26 million worth of contracts for translation software.

This month, the Iraq Study Group reported that only 33 of 1,000 workers in the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad speak Arabic, including only six fluent speakers.

The group recommended that the State and Defense departments and the director of national intelligence "accord the highest possible priority" to language and cultural training.

In October, the FBI reported that only 33 of about 12,000 agents have even limited Arabic proficiency. The CIA does not disclose its officers' language capabilities, but Robert Baer, a retired CIA agent, estimates that he was the agency's only undercover officer fluent in Arabic when he operated in Beirut in the mid-1980s.

It takes about eight years to train a CIA officer to be "completely comfortable" speaking Arabic, says Baer, author of two books about the intelligence community and foreign policy.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Not Winning War In Iraq, Bush Says For 1st Time (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

President Bush acknowledged for the first time yesterday that the United States is not winning the war in Iraq and said he plans to expand the overall size of the "stressed" U.S. armed forces to meet the challenges of a long-term global struggle against terrorists.

As he searches for a new strategy for Iraq, Bush has now adopted the formula advanced by his top military adviser to describe the situation. "We're not winning, we're not losing," Bush said in an interview with The Washington Post. The assessment was a striking reversal for a president who, days before the November elections, declared, "Absolutely, we're winning."

In another turnaround, Bush said he has ordered Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates to develop a plan to increase the troop strength of the Army and Marine Corps, heeding warnings from the Pentagon and Capitol Hill that multiple deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan are stretching the armed forces toward the breaking point. "We need to reset our military," said Bush, whose administration had opposed increasing force levels as recently as this summer.

But in a wide-ranging session in the Oval Office, the president said he interpreted the Democratic election victories six weeks ago not as a mandate to bring the U.S. involvement in Iraq to an end but as a call to find new ways to make the mission there succeed. He confirmed that he is considering a short-term surge in troops in Iraq, an option that top generals have resisted out of concern that it would not help.

A substantial military expansion will take years and would not immediately affect the war in Iraq. But it would begin to address the growing alarm among commanders about the state of the armed forces. Although the president offered no specifics, other U.S. officials said the administration is preparing plans to bolster the nation's permanent active-duty military with as many as 70,000 additional troops.

A force structure expansion would accelerate the already-rising costs of war. The administration is drafting a supplemental request for more than $100 billion in additional funds for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, on top of the $70 billion already approved for this fiscal year, according to U.S. officials. That would be over 50 percent more than originally projected for fiscal 2007, making it by far the costliest year since the 2003 invasion.

Since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Congress has approved more than $500 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as for terrorism-related operations elsewhere. An additional $100 billion would bring overall expenditures to $600 billion, exceeding those for the Vietnam War, which, adjusted for inflation, cost $549 billion, according to the Congressional Research Service.

For all the money, commanders have grown increasingly alarmed about the burden of long deployments and the military's ability to handle a variety of threats around the world simultaneously. Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, warned Congress last week that the active-duty Army "will break" under the strain of today's war-zone rotations. Former secretary of state Colin L. Powell, a retired chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said on CBS News's "Face the Nation" on Sunday that "the active Army is about broken."

Democrats have been calling for additional troops for years. Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) proposed an increase of 40,000 troops during his 2004 campaign against Bush, only to be dismissed by the administration. As recently as June, the Bush administration opposed adding more troops because restructuring "is enabling our military to get more war-fighting capability from current end strength."

But Bush yesterday had changed his mind. "I'm inclined to believe that we do need to increase our troops -- the Army, the Marines," he said. "And I talked about this to Secretary Gates, and he is going to spend some time talking to the folks in the building, come back with a recommendation to me about how to proceed forward on this idea."

In describing his decision, Bush tied it to the broader struggle against Islamic extremists around the world rather than to Iraq specifically. "It is an accurate reflection that this ideological war we're in is going to last for a while and that we're going to need a military that's capable of being able to sustain our efforts and to help us achieve peace," he said.

Bush chose a different term than Powell. "I haven't heard the word 'broken,' " he said, "but I've heard the word, 'stressed.' . . . We need to reset our military. There's no question the military has been used a lot. And the fundamental question is, 'Will Republicans and Democrats be able to work with the administration to assure our military and the American people that we will position our military so that it is ready and able to stay engaged in a long war?' "

Democrats pounced on Bush's comments. "I am glad he has realized the need for increasing the size of the armed forces . . . but this is where the Democrats have been for two years," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the new House Democratic Caucus chairman. Kerry issued a statement calling Bush's move a "pragmatic step needed to deal with the warnings of a broken military," but he noted that he opposes increasing troops in Iraq. Even before news of Bush's interview, Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, told reporters that the military is "bleeding" and "we have to apply the tourniquet and strengthen the forces."

The Army has already temporarily increased its force level from 482,000 active-duty soldiers in 2001 to 507,000 today and soon to 512,000. But the Army wants to make that 30,000-soldier increase permanent and then add between 20,000 and 40,000 more on top of that, according to military and civilian officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity. Every additional 10,000 soldiers would cost about $1.2 billion a year, according to the Army. Because recruitment and training take time, officials cautioned that any boost would not be felt in a significant way until at least 2008.

Bush, who has always said that the United States is headed for victory in Iraq, conceded yesterday what Gates, Powell and most Americans in polls have already concluded. "An interesting construct that General Pace uses is, 'We're not winning, we're not losing,' " Bush said, referring to Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the Joint Chiefs chairman, who was spotted near the Oval Office before the interview. "There's been some very positive developments. . . . [But] obviously the real problem we face is the sectarian violence that needs to be dealt with."

Asked yesterday about his "absolutely, we're winning" comment at an Oct. 25 news conference, the president recast it as a prediction rather than an assessment. "Yes, that was an indication of my belief we're going to win," he said.

Bush said he has not yet made a decision about a new strategy for Iraq and would wait for Gates to return from a trip there to assess the situation. "I need to talk to him when he gets back," Bush said. "I've got more consultations to do with the national security team, which will be consulting with other folks. And I'm going to take my time to make sure that the policy, when it comes out, the American people will see that we . . . have got a new way forward."

Among the options under review by the White House is sending 15,000 to 30,000 more troops to Iraq for six to eight months. The idea has the support of important figures such as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and has been pushed by some inside the White House, but the Joint Chiefs have balked because they think advocates have not adequately defined the mission, according to U.S. officials.

The chiefs have warned that a short-term surge could lead to more attacks against U.S. troops, according to the officials, who described the review on the condition of anonymity because it is not complete. Bush would not discuss such ideas in detail but said "all options are viable."

While top commanders question the value of a surge, they have begun taking moves that could prepare for one, should Bush order it. Defense officials said yesterday that the U.S. Central Command has made two separate requests to Gates for additional forces in the Middle East, including an Army brigade of about 3,000 troops to be used as a reserve force in Kuwait and a second Navy carrier strike group to move to the Persian Gulf.

Gates has yet to approve the moves, which could increase U.S. forces in the region by as many as 10,000 troops, officials said. The previous theater reserve force, the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, was recently moved to Iraq's Anbar province to help quell insurgent violence. Gen. George W. Casey, the U.S. commander in Iraq, has called for the additional brigade -- likely the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division -- to be positioned to move into Iraq hotspots if needed.

The additional carrier strike group would give Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of the Central Command, more flexibility in a volatile region, said one official. While such a move would certainly send a pointed message to Iran, the official said it would also allow additional strike capabilities in Iraq.

President Bush On Iraq, Elections And Immigration (WP)

By Peter Baker, Michael A. Fletcher And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

This 25-minute interview was conducted yesterday in the Oval Office by Washington Post staff writers Peter Baker, Michael A. Fletcher and Michael Abramowitz.

President Bush: Listen, a couple of things before we get going. Obviously, I've been thinking about -- and talking to a lot of people about -- the way forward in Iraq and the way forward in this ideological struggle. I want to share one thought I had with you, and I'm inclined to believe that we do need to increase our troops, the Army, the Marines. And I talked about this to [Defense] Secretary [Robert M.] Gates, and he is going to spend some time talking to the folks in the building, come back with a recommendation to me about how to proceed forward on this idea. I want to give him a little time to get his feet on the ground. And so I'll be addressing this after consultations with him. I just want to share that with you before we get going.

You're talking about troops in Iraq, not --

No, I'm talking about overall size.

-- overall size of the Army. Do you have a rough idea how much --

I'm going to wait for Secretary Gates. As I say, I'm inclined to believe it's important and necessary to do so. The reason why is, it is an accurate reflection that this ideological war we're in is going to last for a while, and that we're going to need a military that's capable of being able to sustain our efforts and to help us achieve peace.

DOJ_NMG_0107724

So you've not made a decision about Iraq, per se, about what to do --

I have not, Mike, I have not. And we'll spend some more time -- Secretary Gates, as he indicated, is going to head to the region at some point in time. I need to talk to him when he gets back. I've got more consultations to do with the national security team, which will be consulting with other folks. And I'm going to take my time to make sure that the policy, when it comes out, the American people will see that we are -- have got a new way forward to achieve an important objective, which is a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself.

And one thing that will be clear is that I want the American people to know that -- and the Iraqi people to know that -- we expect the Iraqi people to continue making hard choices and doing hard work necessary to succeed, and our job is to help them do so.

Are we winning in Iraq, in your estimation?

You know, I think an interesting construct that General [Peter] Pace uses is, "We're not winning, we're not losing." There's been some very positive developments. And you take a step back and look at progress in Iraq, you say, well, it's amazing -- constitutional democracy in the heart of the Middle East, which is a remarkable development in itself.

I think one of the -- obviously, the real problem we face is the sectarian violence that needs to be dealt with. So part of my policy review is how do we deal with that in a way that then enables the Iraqi people to live in a more secure society so that the government can prove its worth to the people -- saying, we can help you. And one of the main functions of government is to provide security for its people. Our job is to help the Iraqis provide that security. And I'll come forward with a plan that will enable us to achieve that objective.

There's other threats, by the way. It's a multiple-front war, if you really think about it. You got Shia discord in the south; you've got Sunni attacks, much of that -- many of them are caused by al-Qaeda. A lot of them, former Baathists and regimists who are angry that Saddam is no longer in power, and they are a source of conflict in al-Anbar province. And we've got a very robust effort -- I said the other day something that, I guess, people didn't pay that much attention to -- but for October and November and the first week of December, our actions on the ground have -- as a result of action on the ground, we killed or captured nearly 5,900 people. My point in making that point is our troops and coalition troops are on the offense in a lot of areas.

And then the third area of conflict, the one that gets a lot of attention, as it should, is the sectarian violence taking place in Baghdad. And I fully understand that we've got to help the Iraqis deal with that. So my thinking is -- and a lot of our strategy sessions revolve around how best to deal with this problem, and how best to help the Iraqis deal with it. And I've got some more work to do, and I'll come forth at the appropriate time and explain the way forward to the country.

Given the election results, is increasing the troop level in Iraq even a viable possibility or option?

Yes, Mike, all options are viable.

-- given the political will out there?

Well, all options are viable. I think what the people want is -- they want a couple of things. They want to see Democrats and Republicans work together to achieve a common objective, and they want us to win in Iraq. A lot of people understand that if we leave Iraq, there will be dire consequences -- in other words, if we leave before the job is done. There are some, a fair number of people, who say, "Get out now." So I view the election results as people are not satisfied with the progress being made in Iraq and expect to see a different strategy to achieve an important objective.

But the election results seemed people wanted to bring the venture in Iraq to closure. That seemed to be the strong lesson. And what indications are there that you're actually listening to that sentiment?

Oh, Mike, look, I want to achieve the objective. I think the American people -- I know the American people are very worried about an external threat and that they recognize that failure in Iraq would embolden that external threat, and they expect this administration to listen with people, to work with Democrats, to work with the military, to work with the Iraqis to put a plan in place that achieves the objective. There's not a lot of people saying, "Get out now." Most Americans are saying, "We want to achieve the objective."

But there are a lot of people who are saying, "Let's get out with a phased deployment over a certain period of time."

If they felt -- if that leads to victory, it needs to be seriously considered. And I'm considering all options and listening very carefully to a lot of good people who have got different opinions about how to proceed.

DOJ_NMG_0107725

Can we come back to General Pace's formulation about winning, not losing? You said October 24th, "Absolutely, we're winning." And I wanted to --

Yes, that was an indication of my belief we're going to win. Look, I've got four constituencies I speak to on a regular basis; one is the American people, who are justifiably frustrated at the progress in Iraq. And they expect the commander in chief and the people in Washington to support our troops. Supporting our troops not only means good equipment, good [pay], good housing -- it also means a plan that helps achieve the objective.

The second constituency is the enemy. I'm not through yet.

Sure.

The enemy wants to know whether or not the United States has the will to stay engaged in this ideological struggle. They don't believe we do. That's what they say. And I believe that's what they believe.

The third group of people I speak to are the Iraqis. They wonder whether the United States has got the will to help them achieve their objectives. That's what they wonder. The leaders I have talked to wonder whether or not -- what the elections mean, or what the Baker-Hamilton commission means, or what changing [former defense] secretary [Donald H.] Rumsfeld means -- that's what they wonder. But in the back of their mind, they're saying, "Are they going to leave us again?" And that's an important question for them to have answered, because in order to make difficult choices and to take risk for peace, they're going to have to be assured that they'll get support. This is a group of people that have had their hopes dashed in the past.

And the fourth group is the military. Our troops wonder whether or not our country supports them, and they do. They wonder whether or not the mission and the sacrifice and the toil that they're making is worth it. And they need to know from the commander in chief: Not only is it worth it, but I strongly support them and believe that their work will lead to victory. That's what I believe.

Anyway, you just need to know that's who I'm speaking to when I speak. And to you, of course. You're the objective filter through which my -- (Laughter.)

I suspect your message gets out. (Laughter.)

I do want to say something about the press. I hope you realize that, one, I enjoy the relationship, and two, know it is vital for my presidency. You can't exist without me, and I can't exist without you. And I generally respect the hard work of the press corps. I don't necessarily generally respect every word you write, but nevertheless, I do respect the fact that you're a hardworking group of people seeking the truth. And we're necessary for each other. And that relationship can either be a positive relationship or a suspicious, harmful relationship. And I have worked hard to make it a positive relationship. And I think it is, generally, I do believe it is. And I bear no ill will, and I don't think you do, either.

We appreciate that, and you've certainly been good for business --

Good. That's what decision-makers do, Peter, people who seize the moment and make decisions to lead give people things to write about.

Some of the supporters of the war and you from the beginning have begun to ask the question publicly: Was it, in fact, the idea that turned out not so great, or the execution that turned out not so great?

The idea of?

The idea of the war in the first place, and the --

I've never really asked that question. I believe it's justifiable and necessary. Obviously, the war has not -- the results on the ground haven't happened as quickly as I hoped, and part of this review process is to develop new strategies and tactics so that we can expedite success. Look, I of all people would like to see the troops come home. But I don't want them to come home without achieving our objective, because I understand what happens if there's failure. And I'm going to keep repeating this over and over again, that I believe we're in an ideological struggle that is -- that our country will be dealing with for a long time.

Can I ask you a question about history?

Yes.

President Lincoln fired a number of his generals in the Civil War until he found Grant.

Is that what triggered your question, looking at Abe?

DOJ_NMG_0107726

Why haven't you fired any generals? And does the fact that you haven't fired generals suggest that you are satisfied with the military strategy that they have pursued?

We're reviewing the strategy, because it has -- the results aren't -- we haven't achieved the results as quickly as we wanted -- precisely what the secretary of defense said, by the way. And the chain-of-command issues are issues that percolate up through the Pentagon. And there is a clear chain of command that I adhere to, and I think it's important for the commander in chief to do just that.

I've often talked about how it's important to trust the judgment of the military when they're making military plans as the key advisers to the president, as opposed to the president determining the tactics on the ground, which has happened in previous wars. And so I'm a strict adherer to the command structure.

But isn't there a point in which you say, "We screwed up the amount of troops we need there, we screwed up the WMD, someone ought to pay a penalty for that"?

There is a constant review of the commanders, and I support that constant review. And to the extent that people think they can do -- somebody can do a better job, those recommendations will come forward.

Sir, when you look back at last month's election, do you see that strictly as a repudiation of Iraq and the fact that we're not winning in Iraq, or is it also a judgment of your leadership in general?

Michael, I said in my press conference, I think it's -- no question Iraq was a significant part of the elections. People were troubled by the lack of progress. War is difficult for people, particularly the American people are very compassionate people. When you turn on your TV screens and see bombings and deaths, and read about beheadings or sectarian violence, it troubles America. And they wonder or not -- whether or not we have a plan that succeeds. And I can understand that level of frustration.

Secondly, there's a sense that people's votes were being taken for granted, in a way. We had ethics disputes, and just a lot of signals that said that it's time to -- that people wanted a change. There was a lot of -- look, you've got a guy using earmarks to enrich himself; there was sex and all kinds of issues that sent the signal that perhaps it was time to give another group a chance to lead. I also believe that people are sick and tired of the needless partisanship in Washington. And there's a lot of it. And for some, every expression of position by somebody is an opportunity to attack, and people are tired of it. And there's some big issues that we need to work together.

I will tell you that I view the elections as an opportunity to say to all of us in Washington, "Let's work together." People want that. And what are some issues we can work together on -- energy, or immigration, budgetary reforms. I mean, there's a lot -- education, No Child Left Behind reauthorization. I believe there are some wonderful opportunities --

So you don't think you're out of the policy business with the Democrats in charge on the Hill?

Do what now?

You're not out of the domestic policy business --

Quite the contrary. Quite the contrary. The microphone of the president has never been louder, and I think we have a good -- in other words, to talk about what I think is important. But it turns out that what I think is important, the Democrat leadership thinks is important, as well -- energy security, immigration reform, education -- and Republicans on the Hill agree. And so my task is going to be to talk about big issues that the American people expect us to work on, and work with both Republicans and Democrats.

Will it be easier with Democrats, in some ways? Are there some issues --

I think the legislative process, Peter, is always hard, from the executive-branch perspective. They're pretty independent-minded people, they -- no matter who's in charge, they tend to take some ideas from the president, but they've got their own minds. And the task is to work together in a collegial and constructive spirit to solve some big problems.

I'll tell you one I want to work on, as well, is entitlements. And that's a hard issue, as you know. Social Security is viewed as the third rail of American politics. I've campaigned on it every time -- two times I ran for president. I've talked about it in the State of the Union every time. It's an issue that's -- a president is just going to have to keep talking about to convince people it's worthwhile to take the risk, the political -- so-called political risk to work together to get something done. And we will continue to do so. [Treasury Secretary Henry M.] Paulson is going to take the lead for us up there, working with members of both parties.

DOJ_NMG_0107727

I will tell you this: In an issue like this, unless the president tries, nothing is going to happen. Without presidential involvement, nothing will happen. So we have a chance, and I'm going to work it. And I think that's -- I know that's the job of the president, is to say, "This is important to the future of the country, let us work together."

Yes, sir.

Just on that point, are you willing to sit down with Democrats in a commission that puts all the options on Social Security on the table? Not just reductions and benefits, not just private accounts, but also some kind of revenue increases, tax increases?

I don't see how you can move forward without people feeling comfortable about putting ideas on the table. I have made it clear that I've got a way forward that can do it and I want to hear other people's opinions. And that's what Hank Paulson is telling both Republicans and Democrats. It's going to be very important for people to feel there can be a full, wide-ranging discussion about how to move forward.

And specifically, tax increases on the table then?

Well, specifically, personal accounts; specifically, everything that the Democrats think will work, as well.

Well, they talk about tax increases.

Well, let them; that's fine. They can come to the table and talk about them. I proposed a way forward that doesn't require tax increases. Nevertheless, I look forward to hearing their opinions.

[Incoming Speaker of the House] Mrs. Pelosi has identified six or seven things that she wants the House to do in the first 100 hours. Can I just mention -- ask you in a bullet-point way just your point on this?

No. (Laughter.)

Minimum-wage increase -- generally supportive or against it?

Generally supportive. But, no, the answer is no, you can't. (Laughter.)

Look, here's the challenge. The challenge is to find out specifically what they have in mind and to explain to them areas where we can work together and can't work together. I'm pleased with our initial round of discussions. I fully understand that they're going to come out with this -- they made it very clear. And I want to work with them on issues where we can find common ground.

On immigration -- you mentioned immigration. Can you envision supporting a deal --

See, now you're getting me to negotiate with myself --

No, no, no, but this is a policy --

Same thing he's trying to do. (Laughter.) It's a classic ploy. (Laughter.)

This is about your policy, Sir, in terms of can you envision a deal in which you would agree with Democrats that would not necessarily have a majority support among Republicans --

Peter, remember the speech I gave right here in the Oval Office?

I remember several.

The one on immigration. I gave a comprehensive speech to the country from the Oval Office, prime time, about how I thought we ought to move forward on immigration. I still feel very strongly about that. And I hope that Congress will join me on a comprehensive bill, and I would hope that the majority of both parties support it.

[Former House] speaker Hastert had a policy that he would not put forward a bill that didn't have a majority support of his caucus. Is that important to you, having majority support of the Republican caucuses?

I'm interested in getting a comprehensive bill out, because I believe it is vital to solving the pressure we have on our border.

One of the interesting things that, if you notice from the recent enforcement activities that ICE took, there are a lot of people who are using forged documents to do jobs Americans are not doing. And my attitude is that there ought to be a way for people to come to this country on a temporary basis and fill those jobs in an open way, a transparent way, that doesn't cause there to be, one, a smuggling operation that's vibrant and making money, a housing operation that is illegal, and a document forgery operation that clearly is in effect.

There is a better way to treat people, and there's a better way to deal with the issue of finding workers Americans are not doing, to fill on a temporary basis. And, therefore, there need -- and that in itself will take pressure off our border. In other words, if people feel like they can come in on a temporary, legal basis, they're not going to have to sneak in, which in itself does away with -- that in itself does away with this kind of underground industry that has sprung up.

The point I make to you on that is that it's a comprehensive reform of the immigration system that is going to make our borders more secure. I strongly believe that is important, and look forward to working with people on the way forward. It's hard for me to predict the dynamics yet on how the Congress is going to handle the immigration bill. The point I'm telling you is that I think it's vital and necessary, and this is an area where we can work together to get it done.

I'd like to come back to your first statement, because I'd like to expand a little bit. You talked about the size of the military. Colin Powell said on a Sunday show that the Army was nearly broken. Do you believe that's true? And, if so, do you feel responsible for that? Do you --

I heard -- we have been transforming our Army to make it lighter, more lethal and easier to move, and that transformation has been very important. Secondly, we have been changing our force posture around the world to reflect the threats of the 21st century, and that has been a very important reform.

I also believe that the suggestions I've heard from outside our government, plus people inside the government -- particularly, the Pentagon -- that we need to think about increasing our force structure makes sense, and I will work with Secretary Gates to do so. He's going to come back and report --

So is our Army nearly broken, or not?

The people that would know best are those in the Pentagon. I haven't heard the word "broken," but I've heard the word "stressed." I know that we need to -- and my budgetary requests will reflect what a lot of people in Congress have been saying and in the Pentagon, and that is we need to reset our military. There's no question the military has been used a lot. And the fundamental question is, will Republicans and Democrats be able to work with the administration to assure our military and the American people that we will position our military so that it is ready and able to stay engaged in a long war, and this ideological struggle?

Can I ask a hometown question?

Final question -- yes, which one, Crawford, Midland, Houston, Dallas or Washington?

Washington. Do you support a bill that would give the District of Columbia residents a vote in the House of Representatives?

This is a Fletcher question. This is a Fletcher question.

He's not asking about a specific question. We're asking about your broad view on --

Do the residents of the District of Columbia -- should they have a vote in the House?

I will look at what Congress proposes. I will look carefully at what Congress proposes.

But what is your philosophical view of that? Because we've gone to Iraq to provide freedom for people in Iraq, and the people in this country --

I understand that. You're trying to get me to opine on specific legislation that may be forthcoming, and I look forward to working with Congress on that.

I'm actually asking you to opine on general --

That's my answer. (Laughter.)

-- philosophy on whether --

I know what you're trying to ask me to opine on, and I'm answering that there is -- I will look and see what Congress proposes.

Is Vice President Cheney correct, do you believe that secretary Rumsfeld was the best defense secretary?

I think he was one of the finest defense secretaries, and I said that there have been more profound change -- policy change under his leadership than at any time since the formation of the Defense Department.

Thank you.

Bush Calls For Increase In Number Of Troops (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Tuesday he wants to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps to help ease problems caused by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In an interview with The Washington Post posted online Tuesday, Bush said the military needed to grow because "this ideological war we're in is going to last a while."

The new troops, Bush said, would not be added specifically to fight in either Iraq or Afghanistan but would be available for military needs worldwide.

ON DEADLINE: Read the interview

Bush said he directed Defense Secretary Robert Gates to recommend how to expand the military, which Pentagon officials have told Bush is "stressed."

Bush's comments come as he prepares to announce in early January his new plan for the war in Iraq, which has claimed the lives of at least 2,950 U.S. troops since it began in March 2003.

Military leaders and their supporters in Congress have recently stepped up their calls for more troops.

Last week, Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker said he wanted to increase the 500,000 active-duty Army beyond the 30,000 soldiers that had been authorized in recent years. The Army could add between 6,000 and 7,000 soldiers a year, he told Congress. Without such an increase, Schoomaker said, the Army "will break."

There are about 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. Pentagon records show that one-fifth of the Army's soldiers have served multiple tours of duty in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Members of Congress and military experts welcomed Bush's comments Tuesday, saying that a larger military would ease the strain on today's troops.

Rep. Ike Skelton, a Missouri Democrat and incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, "would welcome anyone" supporting a larger military, said his spokeswoman Loren Dealy.

Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., and a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said in a statement that an increase has been needed for years and called on Bush to fund it in his budget.

"It is imperative that this administration step up and honestly budget for the long-term commitment they have made in Iraq," Reed said.

Adding 10,000 troops, about the size of a division, will cost about $1.2 billion a year, Skelton and Reed said.

It will take two to three years to recruit and train those troops, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said late last month.

It makes sense to increase the military's size regardless of the Iraq war, said Frederick Kagan, a military analyst at the American Enterprise Institute think tank. The military has been short of the troops it needs since the 1990s, Kagan said.

The Iraq war's demand for people and resources means the Pentagon is stretched too thin, according to a report released Dec. 6 by the Iraq Study Group: "A continuing Iraqi commitment of American ground forces at present levels will leave no reserve available to meet other contingencies."

Former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, whom Gates replaced Monday, resisted increasing the size of the military, Kagan said.

Rumsfeld, Kagan said, "saw soldiers as detracting from the transformation program he wanted the military to go through."

Also Tuesday:

• In Baghdad, 13 men convicted of murder, kidnapping and other crimes were hanged in a televised execution at a Baghdad jail.

• U.S. Sens. John Kerry and Chris Dodd, both Democrats and critics of the Bush administration's Iraq policies, arrived in Syria to talk about efforts to bring stability to neighboring Iraq. The administration has refused direct talks with Syria, which was also recommended by the Iraq Study Group.

• The U.S. military announced the death of a Marine in the insurgent stronghold of Anbar province, bringing to 61 the number of American military personnel killed in December.

President Wants To Increase Size Of Armed Forces (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 19 — President Bush said Tuesday that the United States should expand the size of its armed forces, acknowledging that the military had been strained by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and would need to grow to cope with what he suggested would be a long battle against Islamic extremism.

"I'm inclined to believe it's important and necessary to do," Mr. Bush said. He said this was an "accurate reflection that this ideological war we're in is going to last for a while, and that we're going to need a military that's capable of being able to sustain our efforts and help us achieve peace."

Speaking in an interview with The Washington Post, Mr. Bush did not specify how large an increase he was contemplating or put a dollar figure on the cost. He said that he had asked his new defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, to bring him a proposal, and that the budget he unveils at the beginning of February would seek approval for the plan from Congress, where many members of both parties have been urging an increase in the military's size.

In interviews on Tuesday, administration officials said the president was speaking generally about the broader campaign against terrorism and was not foreshadowing a decision on whether to send additional troops into Iraq in coming months in an effort to stabilize Baghdad. Any big change in the size of the American military would take years to accomplish.

Mr. Bush told The Post, which excerpted the interview Tuesday on its Web site, that he had not made a decision about sending more troops to Iraq.

Coming the day after Mr. Gates was sworn in as defense secretary, Mr. Bush's comments indicated that the administration was breaking abruptly with the stance taken by Donald H. Rumsfeld, the former Pentagon chief, who championed the view that better intelligence and technological advancements could substitute for a bigger military.

Mr. Bush said his plan would focus on ground forces rather than on the Navy and the Air Force, telling The Post, "I'm inclined to believe that we do need to increase our troops — the Army, the Marines." There are about 507,000 active-duty Army soldiers and 180,000 active-duty marines.

Mr. Bush's comments were his most direct assessment that the armed forces were facing strain so serious that the nation should invest billions of dollars in expanding the military. Asked directly whether the United States was winning in Iraq, Mr. Bush quoted what he called the "construct" of Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff: "We're not winning. We're not losing."

The president has come under increasing pressure from allies and critics, including Democrats and Republicans in Congress, and former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, who have warned that the Army could break under the stress of the demands it faces.

"I also believe that the suggestions I've heard from outside our government, plus people inside the government — particularly the Pentagon — that we need to think about increasing our force structure makes sense, and I will work with Secretary Gates to do so," Mr. Bush said.

Congress authorized a 30,000-soldier increase in the active-duty Army after the Sept. 11 attacks — when the Army stood at about 484,000 — in what was described as a temporary measure. Army officials say they hope to reach that authorized total troop strength of 514,000 by next year and would like to make that a permanent floor, not a ceiling.

To that end, the Army already has drawn up proposals to grow to up to 540,000, with some retired officers advocating an even larger increase.

The active-duty Army peaked at 1.6 million troops during the Korean conflict and stood at just below that figure during the war in Vietnam, before hovering around 800,000 for much of the 1970s and 1980s, according to Pentagon statistics. Following the first Persian Gulf war, which coincided with the collapse of communism in Eastern Europe, the Army's active-duty force dropped first to below 600,000 and then below 500,000 before the increases ordered after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Any decision to increase the size of the Army and the Marine Corps would do little to meet the need for more troops should Mr. Bush order a significant increase of American forces in Iraq in 2007, as it takes considerable time to recruit, train and deploy new troops. Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, said last week that the Army could probably grow by only 6,000 to 7,000 soldiers per year.

Army officials have estimated that for each addition of 10,000 soldiers to the force, it would cost about $1.2 billion.

While it is not likely to determine the administration's decision about a short-term increase in troop levels in Iraq, a substantial increase in the size of the American military could give the United States more flexibility in setting and maintaining troop levels there over the long run. Army officials had already drawn up proposals for sustaining the Iraq and Afghanistan missions by drawing heavily on the National Guard and Reserves over the next several years.

But the prospect of mobilizing large numbers of those part-time soldiers would present Mr. Bush with a hugely vexing political problem as the Republican Party prepares for a campaign to hold the White House in 2008. The administration has promised to limit overseas deployments for the Guard and the Reserve, which have been used extensively since the Sept. 11 attacks.

Pentagon and military officials who were briefed on the president's discussions with the Joint Chiefs of Staff last week said that the classified briefing ranged broader than just how to win in Iraq.

The chiefs argued that the nation must not let the military's other capabilities lapse from commitments of personnel, equipment and money for Iraq, these officials said.

In particular, the chiefs expressed concerns that the United States must show enough strength to deter potential adversaries from aggressive moves based on an assumption that American power was bogged down in Iraq. That led to a discussion on the merits of expanding the military, officials said.

The president's statements were applauded by leading members of Congress who specialize in military affairs. Loren Dealy, spokeswoman for Democrats on the House Armed Services Committee, said that Representative Ike Skelton of Missouri, who will become chairman of the panel in the new Congress, said after Mr. Bush spoke that "Mr. Skelton has long supported the idea of increasing the end strength in both the Army and the Marine Corps."

Senator Jack Reed, a Rhode Island Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Tuesday night: "I am pleased President Bush has finally recognized the need to increase the overall size of our military. I have been calling for such an expansion for several years." But Mr. Reed, who served in the 82nd Airborne Division, warned that the battle over troop numbers was not over.

"Now that the president is asking for an increase, he needs to follow through and put the money in the budget to pay for these soldiers," Mr. Reed said. "It is imperative that this administration step up and honestly budget for the long-term commitment they have made in Iraq. If the president doesn't put forward a plan to pay for this in his annual budget request then this announcement is meaningless."

On The War, Determined To Go His Own Way (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Ever since Republicans were routed last month in what was widely seen as a repudiation of his Iraq strategy, President Bush has been busily listing why his policies there will not be changing.

There will be no timetable for removing American troops, no high-level dialogue with Iran and Syria, and no slackening of support for the widely criticized government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Meanwhile, White House aides are reported to be pushing a major "surge" of troops to Baghdad while preparing a fresh infusion of tens of billions of dollars for the war effort.

Yesterday, in an interview with The Washington Post, while acknowledging that the United States is not winning in Iraq, Bush bluntly dismissed the suggestion that the midterm elections meant voters want to bring the mission in that country to closure. He said he interpreted the election results "as people not satisfied with the progress" in Iraq.

"A lot of people understand that if we leave Iraq, there will be dire consequences," Bush said in the Oval Office. "They expect this administration to listen with people, to work with Democrats, to work with the military, to work with the Iraqis to put a plan in place that achieves the objective. There's not a lot of people saying, 'Get out now.' Most Americans are saying, 'We want to achieve the objective.' "

The comments were another strong indication of the president's determination to chart his own way forward on Iraq, no matter the election results nor any amount of free advice from senior statesmen of past administrations. Bush may well announce a major drawdown of the U.S. presence in Iraq when he appears before the nation after the turn of the year, but that possibility seems remote after statements from him and his aides that suggest an intention to keep the basic contours of the Iraq policy in place -- and possibly even raise the ante by sending more troops.

"There hasn't been a change from the president," observed Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), the incoming House majority leader. "The president may be trapped in his own policy, sensing, 'If I don't succeed, it will be a huge blot on my record, and so therefore I have no choice but to try to succeed.' "

Hoyer pointedly added: "I don't think the Democratic Congress is going to say, 'Well, that's okay.' "

Clad in a gray suit and red tie, Bush was relaxed and engaged during the 25-minute interview, going out of his way to say how much he enjoys his relationship with the media despite indications to the contrary. At the end, he talked a bit about recent books -- he mentioned having just finished "King Leopold's Ghost," an account of the plundering of the Congo in the late 19th century -- and expressed some befuddlement at the suggestion that some people do not think he reads.

He gestured at the portrait on his office wall of Abraham Lincoln by George H. Story when asked why he has fired no generals when Lincoln fired a number before settling on Ulysses S. Grant. "Is that what triggered your questioning, looking at Abe?" he asked, before explaining how important it was, in his view, to adhere to the command structure at the Pentagon.

As he reviews what to do in Iraq, Bush said he is considering all options and "listening to a lot of good people who have got different opinions about how to proceed." But he left little doubt that he continues to believe in achieving "victory," a goal that many foreign policy experts believe is fast slipping out of reach. When his new policy comes out next month, he said, the American people will see "a new way forward to achieve an important objective, which is a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself."

For the second time in a week, Bush noted the number of dead insurgents, something that he has been extremely reluctant to do, given the way such numerical indicators presented a false picture of progress during the Vietnam War. But perhaps seeking to keep the American people engaged in the unpopular mission, Bush noted that U.S. ground forces in Iraq in the past two months have killed or captured nearly 5,900 people.

"My point in making that point is our troops and coalition troops are on the offense in a lot of areas," Bush said.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, said he could not think of anyone more "stubborn and isolated" than the president. "The American people have spoken, and voices inside and outside the national security apparatus . . . have all come to the conclusion: Doing more of the same and hoping for a different result is not going to be successful," Emanuel said.

More than stubbornness may explain the president's adherence to his basic policy despite election results and polls suggesting a widespread desire for change from the electorate. Frederick W. Kagan, a military historian at the American Enterprise Institute, said it is not at all clear to him that the public wants out of Iraq, and said he believes many pundits have overinterpreted the election results.

Americans "are not going to support a strategy that looks like more of the same, and they shouldn't," said Kagan, who has met with the president to discuss his idea of bringing more troops to Iraq. But he said the electorate may be willing to support a more forceful strategy for victory: "The choice is pretty stark -- between doing what's necessary to win, which includes changing strategy and committing the necessary resources, and losing, and I don't think the American people are ready to lose yet if they think if there is a chance to win."

Bush himself seemed to hang on to this possibility during the interview yesterday. The risk is that if his prescription for what to do in Iraq is insufficiently bold, he will find himself back in the same stalemate six months from now. "If he is unable to change course and he is unable to produce results, he is going to be in trouble," said Democratic pollster Jeremy Rosner, who was on the staff of President Bill Clinton's National Security Council.

But Bush may not be thinking in those terms. "I, of all people, would like to see the troops come home," he said during the interview. "But I don't want them to come home without achieving our objective, because I understand what happens if there's failure. And I'm going to keep repeating this over and over again, that I believe we're in an ideological struggle that is -- that our country will be dealing with for a long time."

Rice Confirms President Bush Is Considering More Troops For Iraq (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday that President Bush is considering a surge of additional U.S. troops into Iraq to help secure Baghdad - despite strong reservations by some U.S. military leaders and the incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

"The president has to decide whether he thinks some adjustments in American troop levels and what American troops would do is necessitated by current circumstances," Rice said.

"Anything he considers will certainly look at what can be done about the security of Baghdad," Rice said, describing sectarian violence in the capital as the main stumbling block to a more peaceful Iraq.

Rice said Bush, who's due to announce his new tactics in early January, wouldn't decide before further consultations with new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and military commanders.

But a number of active and retired generals already have expressed serious doubts about sending more troops to Iraq, saying there's little likelihood that the 20,000 to 30,000 troops under discussion would make a difference.

Rice's predecessor as secretary of state, retired Gen. Colin Powell, said Sunday that sending more troops would strain the overstretched U.S. Army and wouldn't necessarily do much good.

"What mission is it these troops are to accomplish? Is it to secure Baghdad? In which case, the American Army isn't large enough to secure Baghdad, and we should not use our troops as policemen," Powell told CBS News.

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., incoming chairman of the House Armed Service Committee, told reporters Tuesday that sending more troops probably wouldn't stop the violence and "could actually exacerbate the situation even further."

The White House sought to play down reports of a rift over Iraq strategy with the uniformed military.

"I think people are trying to create a fight between the president and the Joint Chiefs where one does not exist," White House spokesman Tony Snow said. He confirmed that the president is considering more troops but emphasized that Bush has made no final decisions.

Rice's comments on Iraq came during an hour-long interview with McClatchy Newspapers and other papers, much of which she spent defending U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East and elsewhere from rising public criticism.

On another topic, Cuba, Rice reiterated that should ailing leader Fidel Castro die, the United States won't try to engage his brother, Raul, who's temporarily in charge and is Fidel's presumed successor.

Giving an impression of American outreach "from one dictator to another" would be "the worst betrayal" of Cubans, she said.

With Iraq in near chaos, Palestinian factions fighting in the streets of Gaza, and Iran flexing its muscle throughout the Middle East, Rice's stewardship of foreign policy has come under increasing criticism.

In an implicit rebuke two weeks ago, the Iraq Study Group called on the administration to open talks with Iran and Syria, a move Bush and Rice almost immediately rejected.

Rice dismissed the idea that the administration might back off pushing for democracy in the Middle East, a course that critics say has added to instability and increased the strength of Islamists.

Asked what would be new about U.S. foreign policy in 2007, Rice replied: "Let's talk first about what is constant."

The Middle East, Rice argued, is at a "clarifying moment," with extremists on one side and moderate forces on the other. In the first camp she put Iran and Syria; in the second, mainstream states such as Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia.

In the coming year, "the one possible opportunity is to have a coalescence of these more mainstream, moderate forces," she said. The goal would be to build support for the fragile democratic governments of Lebanon and Iraq, and to make progress toward the establishment of a Palestinian state.

DOJ_NMG_0107734

Rice plans to travel to the Middle East in the first half of January, after Bush's speech on Iraq, to resume diplomacy in the Arab-Israeli dispute.

But the effort is complicated by the failure of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and the Hamas-led Palestinian assembly to form a national unity government.

Rice's critics say that the Middle East she sees - where democracy is slowly but unevenly on the rise - isn't matched by the chaotic reality on the ground.

"I'm not arguing that it's just going great - no," Rice responded. But, comparing the current era to the onset of the Cold War in the late 1940s, she said: "At the beginning of big historical transitions, everything is on the table. Yes, it can go wrong. But yes, it can go right."

Lawmaker Opposes More Troops For Baghdad (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), the incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, questioned the purpose of sending an additional 20,000 U.S. troops into Baghdad, the surge option being mentioned as one strategy change in Iraq being considered by President Bush.

"What is the military mission?" Skelton asked yesterday during a meeting with reporters. "I don't think it will change a thing," he said, adding: Would the added troops "exacerbate the problem by being more targets? Is there something to go after that we don't know?"

Sending 15,000 to 30,000 more troops for a mission of possibly six to eight months is among the proposals on the table in the White House policy review to reverse the steady deterioration in Iraq. Bush has said he will not make up his mind until next month, and after receiving recommendations from his new defense secretary, Robert M. Gates.

Skelton, in a news conference to outline his strategic priorities for the committee next year, took the time to voice his opposition to the surge proposal and, in so doing, seemed to reflect the position taken by members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "The time for a troop increase," he said, "was about 3 1/2 years ago, when we initially went into Iraq." Referring to the 2003 suggestion of Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, the Army chief of staff then, that several hundred thousand troops may be needed, Skelton said: "If we had done that, I don't think we would be in the situation we are today."

Skelton told reporters: "I'm not real optimistic about Iraq." During a 25-minute meeting last week that Vice President Cheney attended, "I told the president that personally," the Missouri Democrat said.

Skelton said he told Bush "that we should at least begin to do some redeployment right away to show the American people that we are not there forever [and] to show the Iraqi government . . . that the future of Iraq is in the hands of the Iraqis."

Next year, he said, his committee will focus on Iraq, Afghanistan, the fight against terrorism and "the fixing of U.S. forces." The full panel will provide oversight on Iraq, and the reconstituted oversight investigations subcommittee will explore matters such as the Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad.

"We're going to look at every issue, and the fact that we will do a stronger oversight should mean something within the administration," he said.

Rice Stands Firm, Embarks On New Push (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- This should be Condoleezza Rice's moment.

The secretary of state's longtime rival, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, is gone. Her ties to President Bush appear as strong as ever. Her popularity remains high, even as support for the president ebbs. And voices on all sides are calling for more diplomacy, more outreach -- core strengths of the department she heads.

Yet, as she moves into her third year as the nation's top diplomat, she faces doubt over the administration's Iraq strategy and finds herself embattled and increasingly defensive. Criticism of the administration's foreign policy is on the rise, not only among Democrats, but from Republican stalwarts such as former Secretary of State James Baker, and even from close ally Britain.

DOJ_NMG_0107735

Ms. Rice is about to embark on a new diplomatic push in the Middle East to win increased support in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories from what she calls "mainstream states" such as Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

In a roundtable discussion with reporters yesterday, Ms. Rice firmly defended the administration's current approach in the region and made clear that stark shifts aren't in the offing.

Seeking to counter her critics and to put a positive gloss on the instability now rippling through the Middle East, Ms. Rice touted what she described as "a new opportunity" to get moderate forces in the region "to support the development of stable new governments in Iraq and Lebanon...and to make progress toward the emergence of a Palestinian state that is founded on the same principles."

In trying to solidify this block of moderate states, she said, the U.S. also would be marginalizing Iran and Syria, which she said has become "a sort of handmaiden to Iran."

While the White House continues to weigh changes to its Iraq strategy, Ms. Rice argues that a new alignment is shaping up in the Middle East that offers fresh promise for a new U.S. diplomatic effort. She described a campaign in which the U.S. is calling upon Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Egypt and key Gulf states to help calm the sectarian passions in Iraq, even going so far as to recognize the current Shiite-led government in Baghdad, a move most of Iraq's Sunni neighbors have avoided. U.S. allies in the region also are being asked to ramp up support for the embattled Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and for Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora to weaken Iranian-aided radical groups such as Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian territories.

In exchange, the Bush administration is promising its Arab partners to try to reinvigorate the long-moribund peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians, assuming President Abbas can emerge as a viable interlocutor in place of the Hamas-led government. The U.S. also is reassuring allies it won't pull precipitously out of Iraq.

None of this suggests a dramatic shift in the U.S. diplomatic strategy. Calls for such a shift have soared, especially after the release three weeks ago of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group report, which criticized nearly every aspect of the administration's policies in the Middle East.

Ms. Rice defended the administration's endeavors in the Middle East, including its quest for democracy at the expense of stability, by arguing that the old order in the region was rotten at heart and an incubator for terrorism. "When people speak of returning to the stability of the old Middle East, I wonder, what stability was that?" she said.

This year has offered plenty of frustrations for a secretary of state who took over in January 2005 promising a push to spread freedom around the world.

The administration's biggest gamble, the Iraq invasion, is now widely seen as having backfired in several ways. Iran is surging as a regional power -- and, perhaps soon, as a nuclear one, too. Efforts in the United Nations Security Council to punish Iran over its nuclear ambitions continue to run afoul of Russian objections. Syria's position has been strengthened by the U.S. entanglement in Iraq, while Lebanon next door teeters on the edge of civil war. An emboldened North Korea, months after its first nuclear test, demands wide-ranging concessions from the U.S. and others before making a move to give up its nuclear program.

Ms. Rice has notched some successes. She won a quick U.N. resolution to slap sanctions on North Korea after its Oct. 9 nuclear test, a move that gained the support even of Pyongyang's longtime ally, China. She also won congressional approval of a landmark civilian nuclear deal with India that the administration considers key to a new strategic relationship with New Delhi.

But moving into the administration's last two years, critics say, the big question for Ms. Rice is whether she will hold to the administration's guiding principles -- that you preempt your enemies, but don't talk with them -- or will turn more toward trying to fix pressing problems, no matter who sits at the table.

"She is caught in a very difficult situation," said Aaron Miller, who advised six secretaries of state on Middle East issues and is now a scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center. "She is showing signs of an emerging pragmatism, but is still locked in a set of principles that give her very little leeway and make it impossible for her to succeed."

Ms. Rice, however, repeatedly looked back to the challenges of the Cold War to argue that the turmoil in the Middle East will turn out for the better. "These are changes that take time," she said, adding that one will not be able to judge the success of the administration's actions for "decades. And I mean decades."

Budget Chief: 2007's War Costs Will Exceed Projected $110 Billion (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Iraq war will cost more this year than the $110 billion the Bush administration had forecast, the head of the White House budget office said Tuesday.

Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman said there was no firm estimate of the costs for fiscal 2007, which began Oct. 1. When he was asked if the $110 billion estimate was now too low, Portman said, "Yes."

He said the final figure "depends on a lot of things that are not yet decided. One is the policy moving forward."

Portman's statement adds fuel to speculation that the war costs will top last year's record $120 billion. Lawmakers have already approved $70 billion in supplemental spending for the Iraq war this year. The White House will issue a request for supplemental funding for the war in February.

A number of lawmakers, including Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., and Rep. Jim Cooper, D-Tenn., have said they expect the supplemental request to exceed $100 billion, putting the total cost for the year at more than $170 billion.

"We'll review it and scrutinize it very closely," Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., the incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee said at a news conference Tuesday of the supplemental request.

Portman said increased tax revenues are helping offset the war's higher price tag, reducing the strain on the nation's budget deficit.

"Revenues are up because of the growing economy," he said. "That has enabled us not just to afford the relatively high supplementals, higher than expected, but also to have a declining deficit."

The Bush administration is trying to offer more information to lawmakers and the public about how much the war is projected to cost, Portman said.

"It's our intention to be more transparent about it than we have been in the past," he said. "It's a tough issue because the military will tell you, it's tough to predict a year out, much less 18 months, 24 months out."

Cost Of Wars Rises (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

Government spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan will exceed the Bush administration's original estimate of $110 billion for the 2007 fiscal year, and is likely to top $120 billion, White House officials said. That would set a record for annual wartime spending under President Bush. In an interview, the White House budget director, Rob Portman, said his original $110 billion estimate would "end up being low." Congress has already approved $70 billion in emergency spending for the war, and Mr. Portman's office is preparing an additional emergency request. Mr. Portman said he did not know what the final figure would be, but a senior administration official said it was "highly unlikely" that total wartime spending for 2007 would fall below the record $120 billion spent in 2006.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

NASD: Morgan Stanley Hid Trove Of E-mail (USAT)

By Greg Farrell, Usa Today

USA Today, December 20, 2006

Broker used 9/11 to avoid request, complaint says

Once again, an old e-mail issue is coming back to haunt Morgan Stanley. For the second time this year, a national regulator has accused Morgan Stanley of stonewalling requests for documents and withholding crucial e-mails from investigators.

The NASD claimed Tuesday that Morgan Stanley hid the existence of millions of e-mails from customers of its Dean Witter brokerage. According to an NASD complaint, executives at Morgan Stanley used the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, as an alibi for their inability to produce a massive trove of e-mails sought by customers who felt they'd been burned by bad advice from Dean Witter brokers.

The firm's e-mail servers were, in fact, destroyed in those attacks, the NASD acknowledged. But by Sept. 17, 2001, the company was able to use emergency backup tapes to restore all e-email through Aug. 30, 2001, to the Morgan Stanley internal database.

Nevertheless, from October 2001 through March 2005, Morgan Stanley executives rebuffed requests from customers and regulators for internal e-mails predating the attacks, claiming they had been destroyed. The NASD alleged Morgan Stanley compounded that error by allowing the pre-Sept. 11 e-mails to be gradually overwritten on the company's internal system and lost forever.

The Securities and Exchange Commission settled a similar matter with Morgan Stanley in May, extracting a $15 million fine. But the SEC settlement only involved the firm's failure to provide documents to regulators. It didn't address the alleged harm done to customers who had filed arbitration claims against Dean Witter.

The NASD action specifically charges that Morgan Stanley hurt retail investors who filed arbitration claims against the brokerage firm. By denying those investors access to e-mails in the years leading up to September 2001, Morgan Stanley made it nearly impossible for its customers to present evidence on their own behalf.

In March 2005, during a civil trial brought against it in Florida, Morgan Stanley admitted the existence of the pre-Sept. 11 e-mails. Since then, the firm has pledged to cooperate with regulators.

But in a statement Tuesday, Morgan Stanley said it would fight the NASD's action. "Current management has made extensive efforts to reach a fair and appropriate settlement of this matter, but the NASD's disproportionate and unprecedented demands leave us no choice but to litigate. We look forward to having this issue heard by an impartial hearing panel."

Morgan Stanley reported fiscal 2006 earnings up 44% to $7.5 billion on Tuesday. Its stock rose $1.33 to $81.70.

Morgan Stanley Used 9/11 As Excuse, NASD Says (WSJ)

By Jaime Levy Pessin

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

Complaint Alleges Emails Linked to Arbitration Cases Weren't Lost After Attacks

Morgan Stanley used 9/11 as an excuse for failing to produce millions of emails in hundreds of arbitration claims, even though it turned out not to be the case, the National Association of Securities Dealers charged yesterday.

The NASD is proceeding to litigate the case after the big Wall Street firm declined to settle it.

In its complaint, the NASD alleges that the brokerage arm of Morgan Stanley falsely claimed millions of its emails were destroyed in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, where Morgan Stanley had a large brokerage operation. The complaint alleges that the firm recovered most of those emails within days of the attacks.

"There was a lengthy attempt to reach the settlement," said James Shorris, the NASD's enforcement chief. "Had the firm been willing to settle this appropriately and compensate all the individual investors who had been hurt, we would have been happy to settle it."

According to people familiar with Morgan Stanley's position on the matter, the firm was willing to compensate some investors whose claims might have been affected had the emails been produced. They said the NASD wanted the firm to compensate more than 1,000 investors who filed arbitration claims between October 2001 and March 2005, even if those claims were without merit altogether, or didn't involve email at all.

In an emailed statement, Morgan Stanley called the NASD's settlement demands "disproportionate and unprecedented."

In its statement, Morgan Stanley said that once its prior management realized backup emails were available, it informed regulators and lawyers, built searchable databases, produced newly discovered emails and cooperated fully with the NASD.

While the NASD charges focus on arbitration cases involving small individual investors, Morgan Stanley's document-retention problems also played a large role in litigation between the firm and investor Ronald Perelman. In 2005, a Florida state court ruled against Morgan Stanley in a case focused on the firm's actions surrounding the sale of a company controlled by Mr.

Perelman to Sunbeam Corp., which was a Morgan Stanley client. The court railed against Morgan Stanley's repeated inability to produce documents, and the jury awarded Mr. Perelman $1.58 billion. Morgan Stanley has appealed that verdict.

Last year, Morgan Stanley paid $15 million to settle a civil lawsuit with the Securities and Exchange Commission over failure to produce tens of thousands of emails during probes of conflicts of interest among Wall Street analysts and other issues between late 2000 and mid-2005.

Morgan Stanley's brokerage-unit email servers were kept in its World Trade Center offices at the time of the terrorist attacks on lower Manhattan. Although the servers were destroyed, the NASD's complaint says, the firm was able to restore millions of emails by using backup tapes.

Despite restoring the emails, the NASD alleges, Morgan Stanley repeatedly told regulators and investors involved in arbitration claims that all emails had been destroyed. The complaint also says that when Morgan Stanley discovered that backup copies of emails still existed, "it made the affirmative determination not to preserve the restored messages or the tapes used to restore them to the servers."

According to the NASD's complaint, many arbitration proceedings were concluded between October 2001 and March 2005 "without the benefit of potentially valuable evidence that [the firm] possessed but falsely denied having."

Because of the nature of the NASD's arbitration process, it is unlikely investors will be able to reopen their claims should old emails turn up, Mr. Shorris and lawyers who represent investors said. Mr. Shorris said he didn't think Morgan Stanley's behavior rose to the level of fraud -- one of the conditions that would allow investors to reopen their cases.

Instead, Mr. Shorris said, his top priority in litigating the case will be to seek a remedy that will directly benefit investors whose claims may have been dismissed unfairly: possibly a new process to adjudicate claims, possibly direct compensation or possibly a combination of those options.

Since Sept. 11, 2001, Morgan Stanley has been involved in scores of arbitration cases, regulatory settlements and legal judgments in which it said it couldn't produce email evidence. Morgan Stanley told one Kansas City investor her files were destroyed even though there were no trades in her account until October 2001. The firm blamed a "simple and honest mistake," apologized and agreed to settle.

But last year, the firm informed regulators and lawyers for individual investors that it had discovered email sources thought to have been destroyed in the World Trade Center. The email sources were discovered as part of an internal review of email retention related to the Perelman case, according to people familiar with the matter.

Lawyers who represent investors cheered the NASD's complaint against Morgan Stanley. "It's long overdue," said Charles Austin, a Richmond, Va., lawyer who had a client denied documents that had supposedly been destroyed in the terrorist attacks. "Morgan Stanley repeatedly misrepresented the status and existence of emails and some of the stories they told were patently incredible."

Firm Accused Of Deleting Missing E-Mail (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Morgan Stanley Said Files Were Lost After Sept. 11

Securities regulators charged Morgan Stanley DW Inc. with failing to hand over millions of e-mail messages to investigators and plaintiffs by falsely saying that the documents had been lost in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attack on the World Trade Center, according to a complaint filed yesterday.

The NASD alleged that the retail brokerage destroyed nearly 8 million electronic messages between September 2001 and March 2005, a period when documents preserved on backup tapes and on the computers of individual employees were deleted during the normal course of business.

Morgan Stanley had told regulators and plaintiffs seeking to recover money lost in disputes with company brokers over investment strategy that its computer servers had fallen victim to terror attacks in New York. Documents dated before Sept. 11 were no longer available for review, the company said. In fact, the firm had backed up its systems as of Aug. 30, according to investigators.

"The firm's actions undermined the integrity of the regulatory and arbitration processes, potentially leaving in question the validity of the outcomes in hundreds of cases," said James S. Shorris, head of enforcement at the NASD.

Investors have little hope of reopening their arbitration cases, however, because they are unlikely to meet the high standard for doing so, legal analysts said. To prevail, investors would need to prove that individual Morgan Stanley brokers intentionally withheld the e-mail messages or committed fraud -- accusations the NASD stopped short of making yesterday.

Settlement talks collapsed after the NASD sought to recover money for the arbitration plaintiffs, many of whom expressed little interest after they received notice of the e-mail breakdown in March 2005, according to Morgan Stanley officials.

"Current management has made extensive efforts to reach a fair and appropriate settlement of this matter, but the NASD's disproportionate and unprecedented demands leave us no choice but to litigate," the firm said in a written statement.

In its complaint, the NASD said Morgan Stanley was able to rebuild its e-mail system and restore 11 of its 12 computer servers within days of the attack. Even more messages remained in the inboxes of individual employees, regulators said. But by last year millions of the pre-Sept. 11 e-mails had been deleted, leaving only 500,000 for regulators to examine.

The failure to hand over documents affected a since-settled NASD probe into fees Morgan Stanley had charged investors, as well as other requests by the New York Stock Exchange and the Massachusetts Securities Division.

"Arbitration lawyers have been complaining for years that Morgan Stanley was hiding the ball," said Jacob H. Zamansky, a lawyer who represents investors in arbitration cases.

It is not the company's first run-in with regulators. Earlier this year Morgan Stanley & Co., a separate unit for institutional clients, agreed to pay $15 million to settle Securities and Exchange Commission charges that it failed to produce documents related to a pair of enforcement probes. In March 2005, a judge in Florida criticized the same unit for withholding evidence in a case filed by financier Ronald O. Perelman.

Two years ago, Morgan Stanley's brokerage arm paid $250,000 to resolve separate NASD charges that it failed to comply with obligations to turn over papers in arbitration cases.

Plan Unveiled To Scrap A Sarbanes-Oxley Rule (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Accounting industry overseers yesterday scrapped an audit rule targeted by businesses as expensive and burdensome, proposing looser guidelines that would direct accountants to focus on the integrity of corporate managers and the most risky aspects of a company's financial reports.

The proposal is designed to address the most contentious part of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, passed by Congress after problems at Enron and WorldCom tarnished the reputation of the accounting profession and rocked investor confidence.

The planned changes to a rule that requires auditors to review the financial controls of their client companies come after more than two years of complaints by businesses large and small. The overhaul marks one of the most significant concessions by regulators in a broad campaign by trade groups to make corporate rules and laws more flexible.

Criticism over the rule and charges that it is prompting fewer companies to list their shares on U.S. markets have gathered momentum in recent months, which was acknowledged by Mark W. Olson, chairman of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board. The proposed change, which will be subject to more than two months of public comment, "will help transform the rule into a cornerstone accomplishment rather than a provision that continues to be associated with adverse market trends," Olson said.

At its core, the proposal cuts the current rule by one-third -- to 65 pages from 180. It is intended to eliminate unnecessary or duplicative work by the nation's largest accounting firms, which have posted steep profit gains for the past few years as a result of the rule and the reluctance of companies to push back against it in the post-Enron environment.

Members of the accounting board debated whether the plan would result in substantial cost savings, with at least one expressing a measure of skepticism. It may be two years or more before the economics become clear, said Bill Gradison, who urged "a strong need for patience."

Under the plan, which could be revised based on public feedback, auditors would be allowed to use the work of internal accountants and corporate managers as well as refer back to their own work in previous years. They would be given new instructions on such costly and resource-intensive issues as how many corporate offices they must visit. And they would be told that they no longer need to test controls that relate to "a large portion" of their clients' assets, language that was harshly criticized in comment letters from managers as too onerous.

The plan would require auditors to look for problems that have a "reasonable possibility" of producing a weakness in a company's finances. The current provision instructs auditors to consider issues with a "more than remote" chance of causing trouble.

Instead, auditors would be encouraged to examine how companies close out their books at the end of each quarter and to scrutinize managers' integrity and ability to overrule in-house accountants. Among the items auditors would be explicitly told to consider under the new proposal is whether corporate managers' compensation is tied to the financial performance of the company, an issue that affects the independence of the managers' judgment.

In a change that observers said would significantly reduce costs and the number of audit hours, the accounting board proposal would throw out a requirement that auditors assess how well management reviewed internal controls -- focusing instead on a single assessment of how the controls are working.

When working with companies with market capitalization of between $75 million and $787 million, accounting firms would be urged to focus on such issues as the number of people in the financial unit, the number of the company's business lines, and the complexity of the company's operations. Smaller companies would not automatically win less-intense reviews from auditors.

Charles D. Niemeier, a member of the accounting board, said the current rules work for small companies, noting that more than 18 percent of companies with market capitalization of less than $787 million had discovered control weaknesses during the first year of reviews. But that figure was halved during the second year -- evidence, he said, that rigorous reviews were uncovering mistakes that are important to investors.

Regulators had predicted that the changes could take effect as early as March or April, in time for next year's audit season. But disagreement between the accounting board and the Securities and Exchange Commission over the extent of the concessions hindered the process. Officials now say the new rule will likely be adopted next summer. Small businesses recently won another compliance extension and will not be required to adopt the proposal until the end of 2008, meaning that it could take until 2009 to determine how much the reviews will cost.

Rulemakers called the changes substantial but vigorously denied that they would lead to fewer protections for investors. "This proposal does not diminish or water down" the existing rule, said Kayla J. Gillan, another accounting board member.

Will Backdating Scandal Thwart Effort To Roll Back Reforms? December 20, 2006; Page A2 (WSJ)

By Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

A few bad apples. That was the oft-heard line taken by corporate leaders back in 2002 and 2003, after the meltdowns of Enron, WorldCom, Tyco and Parmalat. A few miscreants, they argued, shouldn't be allowed to tarnish the entire corporate world.

But this year's backdating scandal has eliminated the last echoes of that defense. More than 120 companies have been implicated in what all but a few hardy holdouts now acknowledge is simple theft. As one former chairman of the Business Roundtable told me: "Those guys were caught with their hands in the cookie jar."

Clearly, something's amiss in the orchard. A new study out this week helps explain what that might be. Three scholars -- Lucian Bebchuk, Yaniv Grinstein, and Urs Peyer -- have run the numbers on 29,000 grants of stock options to directors, and found that 9% of them were "lucky" -- that is, they occurred on a day when the stock price hit a monthly low. "Lucky" is in quotes, because the authors clearly believe that many, if not most, were the result not of luck but of backdating.

Options were originally given to directors to align their interests more closely with those of shareholders. But the new study suggests in many cases that options have had a very different effect, tying directors more closely to management. "Directors' grant events were more likely to be lucky when executives, and especially the CEO, also received a grant on the same date," the study concludes.

One more finding of note: The "lucky" grants were more common in the days before Sarbanes-Oxley, which sets tight deadlines for reporting option grants. But they continued after the corporate-reform law was passed, suggesting the problem hasn't been solved.

The backdating brouhaha has occurred just as the business community is gearing up to roll back rules put into place after the 2002-2003 scandals. The Securities and Exchange Commission last week announced plans to relax Sarbanes-Oxley requirements for smaller companies. In addition, the Justice Department said it was revising some of the tougher prosecution practices it adopted in the wake of those scandals. And the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, a private group acting with the blessing of Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson, recently recommended more sweeping changes, including measures to limit class-action securities lawsuits.

The prevalence of backdating raises the question: Has the corporate-reform movement really gone too far? Or has it not gone far enough?

Assemble a room full of CEOs and you will find no doubt that it has gone too far. They'll regale you with stories about the excesses of litigation, the terror tactics of prosecutors who threaten to indict entire companies and the pointless costs of Sarbanes-Oxley Section 404, which requires outside audits of companies' internal financial controls. Fill the room with unionists, shareholder advocates and academics, and you'll hear tirades against the inconceivable greed of CEOs, who despite eight-figure paychecks feel the need to break the rules to make even more money.

In the midst of this rancorous debate, Ira Millstein, who has long labored in corporate governance, is the rare voice of sanity. Mr. Millstein, senior partner at Weil, Gotshal & Manges, rightly argues that some of the post-Enron reforms have gone too far. Indeed, he surprised and angered many of his left-leaning friends in academia and elsewhere by signing on to the report of the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation.

Many of those recommendations make good sense. Section 404 of Sarbanes Oxley was a classic case of legislative overreach, imposing excessive burdens on small companies, and discouraging foreign companies from listing shares in the U.S. The Justice Department's much-discussed "Thompson memo" was also the product of overreaction, allowing federal prosecutors to adopt the bullying tactics favored by New York's former attorney general, Eliot Spitzer. And class-action securities lawsuits, while not new, continue to be an overused tool. On all of these, some rollback would be welcome.

But in return for those changes, Mr. Millstein wants "the grand bargain." Instead of more regulation, more prosecution and more litigation give shareholders more power to oversee the companies in which they invest. Make it clear, once and for all, that directors really do work for shareholders, not for management, by giving shareholders the power not only to remove directors, but also to nominate them, without engaging in costly proxy battles.

The commissioners of the SEC are considering changes that move in this direction, and the business lobby in Washington has launched a determined battle to stop them. For corporate leaders, shareholder democracy may be a frightening prospect. But it beats the alternatives.

The Enron Pendulum (FT)

Financial Times, December 20, 2006

Five years after the Enron debacle, the pendulum seems to be swinging back towards a lighter form of corporate regulation in America. Over the past week, the SEC and justice department have both announced changes in the methods they use to keep corporate America honest. They were reacting to criticism from business, which complains of an excess of zeal in the post-Enron period - and that is good news, not just for corporate America, but for the investing public.

But serious concerns remain over whether the justice department, for its part, has done enough to rein in abusive practices that have become all too common post-Enron. Last week the head of the department's white collar crime fighters, Paul McNulty, announced new guidelines for prosecutors: from now on, they will have to get approval directly from him if they want to ask a company to waive the confidentiality that normally protects communications with its lawyers - and if the company refuses, it can no longer be penalised for doing so. Prosecutors will also be forbidden, in most cases, from putting pressure on companies to cut off legal fees to employees involved in an investigation.

So far, so laudable. For too long, prosecutors have abused their power by demanding that companies show their willingness to co-operate with the government by waiving the sacred privilege that normally protects communications with their lawyers. Faced with the corporate equivalent of the death penalty - an indictment that could mean bankruptcy - few dared to refuse the prosecutor's demands.

Now, at least in theory, they can "just say no"; but will they? It seems unlikely. For in one important respect, the changes appear more semantic than real: prosecutors may not penalise companies for refusing to disclose communications with their lawyers - but they may still reward them for doing so. The end result is the same: you waive, or you lose. With a nod and a wink, any half-clever prosecutor can circumvent the new requirement that the top cop sign off on all waiver requests - and the post-Enron "culture of waiver" could easily remain unchanged.

That would be bad news for corporate America and the investing public: companies need legal advice to obey complex laws; if they cannot get it - without the risk that what they say will be revealed to the government in a subsequent investigation - they may not try to obey the law at all. That could defeat the purpose of the post-Enron corporate crime crusade: to create a culture of compliance that encourages companies to do the right thing, without having to be prosecuted.

Congress must keep the heat on the prosecutors. Unless they change their tactics, as well as their rhetoric, legislators should step in to make sure that the prosecutorial abuses of the past few years are firmly behind us.

The 'McNulty Memo': Real Change, Or Retreat? (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

Natinoal Law Journal, December 20, 2006

In the wake of newly revised guidelines for federal prosecutors investigating and prosecuting corporations, the key question, according to white-collar criminal defense lawyers, is: Are the guidelines meaningful change or strategic retreat?

William McGuinness, chairman of the New York litigation department at Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson, believes the answer is clear:

"I regard it as strategic retreat -- when you're going to lose a battle, you back up to the point you think you can defend," he said.

The McNulty memorandum, issued by Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty last week, revises the controversial Thompson memorandum, which was widely criticized as creating a culture in which prosecutors routinely demanded waiver of the attorney-client and work-product privileges as evidence of cooperation with an investigation.

But, McGuinness said, "The fact is it continues to embrace the notion that under certain circumstances the Justice Department can consider waiver of the privilege in making its charging determinations. I think that's wrong."

Many defense lawyers, legal scholars, and members of a broad coalition of business and civil liberties groups that had lobbied intensely for changes in the Thompson memorandum echoed McGuinness' skepticism. As they digested the 21-page McNulty memorandum, they saw the following "flaws" or problems in the government's new approach:

The guidelines are internal policy, unenforceable at law, and there is no remedy per se if a prosecutor fails to follow them.

The guidelines create two new categories of information sought by prosecutors; both contain privileged materials but they require different standards for department approval of waiver requests by prosecutors. Those categories are unlikely to be recognized by courts or accepted by third parties seeking the waived materials.

The pressure to waive privilege is unabated under the guidelines because although they prohibit prosecutors making charging decisions from considering a corporation's refusal to provide "the most sensitive" attorney-client information, they do allow favorable consideration when a company agrees.

Prosecutors in making a decision to bring charges may not consider a corporation's advancement of attorney fees to employees, except when it was done to impede the government's investigation -- a standard that may be too easy to meet.

DOJ_NMG_0107743

The guidelines continue to allow prosecutors weighing a corporation's cooperation to consider joint defense agreements, information-sharing between a corporation and employees about a government investigation, or a corporation's retention or failure to sanction employees who assert Fifth Amendment rights.

"I think the Department of Justice is somewhat on probation here," said Craig D. Margolis, partner in the Washington office of Houston's Vinson & Elkins.

If the guidelines are not implemented according to their terms and the department simply becomes a rubber stamp for prosecutors' waiver requests, he said, "I think there will be a hue and cry out of corporate America, and we'll see Congress stepping in."

NEW PROCESS

The revised guidelines basically create a two-tiered approach for prosecutors' requests for protected materials.

For Category 1 materials -- factual information such as key documents, witness statements or purely factual interview memoranda -- the prosecutor first must seek approval from the U.S. attorney, who must consult with the assistant attorney general of the Justice Department Criminal Division before approving the waiver request.

For Category 2 materials -- attorney-client communications, legal advice or nonfact attorney work product -- the U.S. attorney must obtain written approval from the deputy attorney general.

Prosecutors also must establish a legitimate need by addressing four factors, such as whether alternatives to waiver are available. Prosecutors may not consider in their charging decisions a corporation's refusal to provide Category 2 materials, but they can consider favorably a corporation's compliance with the request. And they can consider a corporation's decision to refuse to provide Category 1 factual information.

Stephanie Martz, director of the white-collar crime project at the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, called the two new categories of protected materials "very deceiving." Category 1, she explained, is described as purely factual materials, but includes witness statements and interview notes.

"They apparently are supposed to be just devoid of opinion work product, but that's pretty close to the line," said Martz. "Courts are all over the place on what kind of waiver it is when you turn over witness statements. The notion that it is just factual has not been universally accepted."

But former federal prosecutor Jonathan Rosen, a white-collar criminal defense attorney in the Washington office of Boston-based Mintz, Levin, Cohn, Ferris, Glovsky and Popeo, said the McNulty memo is a "significant departure" from prior practice.

Removing the waiver decision from the line prosecutor and requiring an objective showing of need, he said, should eliminate the often wildly varying and arbitrary enforcement of waiver requests in certain jurisdictions.

Ronald C. Minkoff, a litigation partner and attorney ethics specialist at New York's Frankfurt Kurnit Klein & Selz, countered, "Even for the most core attorney-client privileged information, the prosecutor could pass that test without any major problem. If the issue is the need for the information, there's almost always the need. On the other hand, if enforced strictly, it can be useful in curbing whatever abuses there have been."

Also significant, said Rosen, is that the memo changes the department's practice to conform with Southern District of New York Judge Lewis Kaplan's ruling on legal fees in the government's litigation against KPMG. Kaplan found that prosecutors effectively coerced the accounting firm into cutting off all payments of fees and expenses of indicted employees -- a violation of their Fifth and Sixth amendment rights.

The guidelines prohibit prosecutors from considering the advancement of attorney fees in their charging decision, except where the fees and other facts show an intent to impede the investigation. Rosen said that fees combined with, for example, joint defense agreements or failure to terminate employees who refuse to cooperate, could be sufficient for prosecutors to use the exception.

Forrester CFO Resigns After Internal Probe Finds Stock Option Grant Irregularity

DOJ_NMG_0107744

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) -- Forrester Research Inc. said late Tuesday its Chief Financial Officer and Treasurer Warren Hadley resigned after an internal investigation found irregularities regarding an option grant for 5,000 shares made to him in 1999.

The initial findings resulted from a probe started by the audit committee of Forrester's board. The committee has hired independent counsel to conduct the investigation and Forrester said it informed the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The impact of the grant to Hadley is not financially material, but the review is still in the early stages, Forrester said.

"Forrester is unable to speculate whether, when the investigation is complete, there will be any material impact on current or prior financial statements," the company said. "Any adjustments that would be required are expected to be non-cash, stock compensation charges and related tax benefit or expense."

A total of 105 companies are currently under SEC or Justice Department scrutiny regarding past stock option grants and accounting practices, and at least 90 other firms have launched or completed internal reviews, according to an AP review. Hadley is one of now 60 senior executives, including 18 chief executives and a dozen other finance chiefs, who left 33 companies as a result of the various probes.

George F. Colony, Forrester's chairman and chief executive, will also serve as acting CFO while the company searches for Hadley's replacement.

Shares of Forrester dipped 5 cents to end at $28.85 on the Nasdaq.

Love Thy Lawyer (WSJ)

By Bruno Cova And Leigh Dance

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

The short-term risk most likely to influence a company's future today is legal risk and its consequences. Just look at the crises that hit ABB in 2003, Marsh & McLennan in 2004 or Hewlett Packard late this year. Several factors are driving legal risks to the forefront: aggressive development and enforcement of regulations in the U.S. and Europe; more cooperation and communication among regulatory authorities world-wide; and a public and media happy to punish companies that appear to "misbehave" or break their promises.

A regulatory investigation or an abrupt fall in share price often triggers costly disputes and litigation, followed by management reorganizations, fines, takeovers, loss of market share, and more binding regulations and regulatory policing. A poorly handled legal problem can push a successful company into insolvency, prevent the achievement of business objectives, and cost the jobs and reputations of chief executives and board members.

Often, what initially seems to be a marginal legal issue -- a regulatory approval or a violation of banking regulations in a remote subsidiary, for example -- grows into a bet-the-company type of risk. And even once the threat or problem is resolved, legal disputes and regulatory inquiries may linger on for years in other jurisdictions, causing far-reaching damage and costly distraction. Just consider the competition problems Microsoft still faces in Europe, years after the company settled with U.S. authorities.

Boards, particularly of European and Asian companies, sometimes fail to leverage their company's legal department to prevent a legal problem or to advise them in a crisis. Directors may spend hours discussing finance or audit issues related to a financial-disclosure issue, but often they have never met with the general counsel and are unaware of the available legal resources.

A duly empowered legal department can help directors govern better, and shield them from liability. Legal and regulatory issues can be a huge driver of a company's strategy: Think of how the European energy industry has transformed itself as a consequence of EU regulatory changes. They can also be key tools for achieving a business objective or prevent a competitor from reaching it, as demonstrated by the recent wave of protectionist measures introduced to thwart cross-border takeovers. Once a problem has erupted, it is often the legal response that determines whether and how quickly a company recovers, as in the skillfully handled crises at Tyco, Marsh & McLennan, Royal Dutch Shell and others.

Some boards' failure to pay attention to legal issues is even more surprising considering that, more and more often, authorities explicitly direct corporations to identify and demonstrate how they are reducing legal risks, such as implementing compliance programs. Increasingly, regulators sternly punish those who fail to do so.

Compliance reaches deep into the company's operations, and therefore problems are not easy for directors to spot. This is why the legal compliance function is critical. At the first sign of a serious problem, the chief legal or compliance officer can alert the board quickly. An internal investigation may be merited in any of the company's activities, anywhere in the world.

European and Asian companies are beginning to follow America's lead in building highly capable legal teams that know the business intimately. Many in-house counsels of Europe's (and, to a lesser extent, Asia's) leading companies have far more compliance and risk-management responsibilities, including tracking legal and regulatory compliance throughout the company. The general counsel and chief compliance officer have demanding roles: They implement and oversee internal controls, support ongoing business transactions, and manage in-house and outside advisers across broad territories.

But while the position of the corporate counsel has improved, there is still a ways to go, particularly in Europe and Asia. No longer can in-house lawyers be seen as narrow legal practitioners, called in to rubber-stamp a decision. They must work along side business management.

Besides assisting the board with internal controls to defend against a crisis, in-house counsel can shed light on opportunities unfolding in the business. Laws and regulations can be used to find the most efficient route to enter certain markets, or to better defend market share and retain key intellectual property assets. Early and consistent interaction with the general counsel puts directors in a far better position to help the company compete effectively and deliver shareholder value.

Because they can provide additional armor for directors and help protect the company overall, general counsel (and where they exist, chief compliance officers) need to communicate freely with the board. Often they are disarmed by reporting relationships that don't allow proper access to executives and directors, or that discourage directors from exercising effective control of the legal function.

Chief executives and directors of international companies should be more interested than ever to link to the general counsel and to ensure that the legal department has the talent, tools and structure to effectively inform corporate governance.

If you are a director and are not sure about your company's status on these issues, beware. What you don't know may hurt you. We know that you want to avert crisis or scandal, minimize loss, and maximize the company's ability to grow profitably. On your way to the boardroom, don't forget your legal shield.

Mr. Cova, who was chief legal adviser to Italy's Parmalat during its restructuring in 2004-05 and previously general counsel of Fiat, is co-managing partner of Paul Hastings's Milan office. Ms. Dance is president of ELD International, a consultancy to global law departments and law firms.

Amtrak Fires Five In Midst Of Congressional Probe (LAW)

By Anna Palmer, Legal Times

Law.com, December 20, 2006

New Amtrak President Alex Kummant engineered a major management restructuring Monday, firing five top officials and naming Eleanor Acheson, assistant attorney general for policy development under President Bill Clinton, as the passenger rail's general counsel.

The move comes after a call earlier this month by outgoing House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee Chairman Don Young, R-Alaska, and Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., for the Department of Justice to investigate Amtrak's legal department and outside counsel after the release of an inspector general's report, which found that Amtrak mismanaged more than $100 million in legal bills. The congressmen also called for Amtrak's inspector general to further investigate Manatt, Phelps & Phillips' expenses and billing of secretarial work.

In a Dec. 18 letter to Amtrak employees, Kummant announced the firing of Chief Financial Officer David Smith, Assistant Vice President of Transportation Thomas Schmidt, Police Chief Alfred Broadbent, Vice President for Marketing and Sales Barbara Richardson, and Vice President of Corporate Communications William Schulz. The letter also stated that Acheson will replace Alicia Serfaty as general counsel and corporate secretary.

"While change can be difficult, this reorganization is the result of a great deal of consideration," Kummant said in the letter. He also said the "restructuring and personnel changes put in place the team that will drive the vision and the future of our company."

Amtrak spokesman Cliff Black says the changes were not a response to the inspector general's report on its legal department. "I can't associate it directly with the report. Corporate reorganizations are common under new CEOs. This is no different than that of any other large corporation under new leadership."

Serfaty has headed up Amtrak's 160-person legal department since 2002. Until Acheson comes on board in mid-January, Joseph Bress, Amtrak labor relations vice president, will serve as acting general counsel. According to the Kummant letter, Serfaty will remain at Amtrak and will "assist Kummant in the transition period" in her new position as counsel to the president. The New York Times has reported that Serfaty would act in that capacity for three months, but Black could not confirm whether or not Serfaty's position was temporary. No other personnel in Amtrak's legal department have been fired.

Acheson headed the Justice Department office responsible for vetting judges under Clinton. After leaving the Justice Department in 2001, Acheson moved to the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force's government affairs department.

Kummant declined to be interviewed for this story.

Despite the changes, the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee's Amtrak oversight is far from over.

"We've been through the Acela fiasco, the brake fiasco, the food service fiasco and now the latest is the legal fiasco," says Mica, who will be the ranking Republican member on the House Transportation Committee in the next Congress.

More than 200 Amtrak employees outside the legal department have been fired for theft or financial irregularities in the past couple of years.

"Some people say I'm Amtrak's biggest opponent. I'm actually the strongest supporter of a national passenger rail system and high-speed rail system," says Mica. "But I want to bring in some of the efficiencies that the private sector can bring in."

Mica says he plans to unveil a major legislative initiative early next year to revamp the northeast corridor and high-speed rail system. Amtrak's inspector general is expected to report back to the House committee regarding Manatt's legal bills by February.

Municipal Bond Attorney Group To Warn Members On Bid Rigging (BLOOM)

By Christine Richard And Darrell Preston

Bloomberg, December 20, 2006

Dec. 19 (Bloomberg) -- The National Association of Bond Lawyers, a group of attorneys who advise U.S. state and local governments on borrowings, plans to warn members about anti- competitive practices amid a growing government probe of the municipal bond market.

The Justice Department investigation into potential bid- rigging in municipal investment contracts prompted the Chicago-based association to schedule a conference call with members to review potential abuses, said Carol Lew, president of the group and a public finance lawyer at Stradling Yocca Carlson & Rauth in Orange County, California.

``We need to educate our membership as to what's going on and how people should be handling things," said Lew. ``We do not know how pervasive any of this wrongdoing is. It may be a few isolated cases or it may be worse than that."

U.S. state and local governments that borrow in the almost 200-year-old municipal debt market rely on the opinions of attorneys and advisers to assure potential investors that their bonds clear requirements by the Internal Revenue Service and will remain tax-exempt. The IRS can publicly reprimand, suspend or disbar attorneys from representing clients before the agency for reasons including ``incompetent or disreputable" behavior or misleading a client with ``intent to defraud," according to the agency's Web site.

The Justice Department's criminal investigation stems from an IRS review that found municipal bond deals robbed federal taxpayers of more than $100 million.

Subpoenas, Raids

Prosecutors are trying to determine whether banks and brokers conspired to fix prices on the financial products municipalities buy to invest proceeds that aren't spent immediately on schools and sewers. The Justice Department last month subpoenaed more than a dozen financial firms and seized documents from three brokers in a search for bid rigging in the broadest criminal probe of the market where local governments have $2.3 trillion of debt outstanding.

Among the deals reviewed by the IRS was the purchase by the city of Atlanta of a $453 million guaranteed investment contract using proceeds of a bond sold in 1999. The IRS asked whether banks arranged to submit ``courtesy losing bids" at an auction to provide the investment. It isn't known whether officials in Atlanta were contacted by the Justice Department.

A call to Janice Davis, Atlanta's chief financial officer, wasn't immediately returned.

Hard to Prevent

Few details about the Justice Department investigation have been made public, leaving issuers and their attorneys to draw conclusions from the few public details available.

``It's not readily apparent what action bond counsel could have taken to prevent the kind of activity that has been uncovered by the IRS," said Roger Davis, a partner in Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe's San Francisco public finance office. ``The practices were intended to be covered up."

Davis said the concerns raised by the investigation over potential abuses are starting to push states and cities away from purchasing guaranteed investment contracts.

Scranton School District in Pennsylvania, an issuer that has been questioned by the IRS, said it relies on the services of professionals including lawyers when doing deals.

The district has been asked to provide information about a $63.3 million issue of General Obligation refunding notes sold in July 2001, according to a disclosure statement the school district filed with Bloomberg. The document said the IRS is concerned about a certificate of deposit acquired to invest some of the proceeds and ``possible unusual fee arrangements between parties to the transaction."

``We hire professional people and rely on them to structure a deal that is in the best interest of the district," said Gregg Sunday, business manager for the school district. The district hasn't been asked by the Justice Department for information, he said.

Vitesse Finds Options, Other Errors (WSJ)

By ZACHARY M. SEWARD

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

Vitesse Semiconductor Corp. said it had found a wide-ranging array of irregularities at the company, including options backdating, bogus sales invoices, improper revenue recognition, inflated reporting of cash balances and a failure to take write-offs for returned merchandise.

The disclosures came as a result of an internal review, which was started in April to examine options practices, by a special committee of Vitesse's board.

Separately, the chief financial officer of Forrester Research Inc., Warren Hadley, resigned in what that company called the result of findings in its options probe.

The irregularities at Vitesse, based in Camarillo, Calif., were so widespread that the company said it would likely be unable to file restated financials for the 2004 and 2005 fiscal years. The company said former top executives had backdated their own options grants and artificially inflated Vitesse's revenue while altering financial records to conceal the practices.

Options give a recipient the right to purchase stock at a set price. Backdating, or saying the options were granted earlier than they were, can create an instant increase in value, reducing an executive's incentive for stock growth and presenting accounting problems and potential criminal charges. Vitesse is under investigation by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Its irregular options grants were reported by The Wall Street Journal in March.

Vitesse, which has already cleared its executive suite of individuals implicated in the internal probe, said it had dismissed the company's independent accounting firm, KPMG LLP, "based on its lack of independence." Vitesse didn't elaborate, and a spokesman for KPMG, George Ledwith, said, "We're not aware of any independence issue."

The investigation at Vitesse found that "backdating and manipulation" of stock options amounted to about $120 million in unaccounted expenses since 1995. The company said that all but one of its current directors and senior executives were unaware of the options backdating when it occurred. The exception, it said, was Louis R. Tomasetta, Vitesse's co-founder and former chief executive, who remains on the board but has been excluded from discussions and actions related to the probe. Mr. Tomasetta couldn't be reached for comment.

Separately, Forrester, based in Cambridge, Mass., said in a brief statement that its continuing options probe found "irregularities" in a 1999 options grant to Mr. Hadley, the departing finance chief. The technology and market-research company said that the effect of the grant was "not financially material."

A woman at Mr. Hadley's home last night said he couldn't comment.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Md. High Court Orders Executions Halted (BSUN)

By Jennifer Mcmenamin

The Baltimore Sun, December 20, 2006

In a narrowly tailored decision with potentially sweeping consequences, Maryland's highest court ordered a halt Tuesday to executions in the state, ruling that procedures for putting prisoners to death were never submitted for the public review required by law.

Under the Court of Appeals ruling, state prison officials face the prospect of having to submit the execution protocols to the scrutiny of a joint legislative committee and schedule a public hearing on the issue. Alternatively, the court ruled, the legislature could exempt the execution procedures from that review process -- something that one state senator characterized as "very unlikely."

"One way or another, the legislature is going to need to look at the issue again," said Carl W. Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond whose specialty includes federal administrative procedure law, and who has followed the debate surrounding lethal injection procedures in states across the country.

"They're going to want to have hearings, and that could potentially open up the whole death penalty issue for debate," he said. "Then, I guess, most anything could be fair game."

Executions were halted in Florida and California this week amid concerns that lethal injection, as carried out, violates the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

Although that argument was not a part of the appeals decided Tuesday by the Maryland court in the case of death row inmate Vernon L. Evans Jr., the convicted killer has raised the issue in a federal lawsuit pending in U.S. District Court in Baltimore.

In the opinion handed down Tuesday, the judges of the state appeals court rejected three of the convicted killer's four challenges -- including one raising questions about racial disparities in the application of the death penalty -- and declined to grant him either the new trial or the new sentencing hearing that he had requested. Rather, the court dealt exclusively with the mechanics of how Maryland's execution procedures were drafted.

Those procedures -- still deemed confidential but filed as court exhibits in litigation brought in recent years on behalf of death row inmates -- were not written or implemented with the required layers of legislative oversight and public scrutiny, so they are "ineffective and may not be used until such time as they are properly adopted," the court unanimously wrote.

Some death penalty opponents, legal experts and capital defense attorneys said the court's decision has paved the way for a debate on the state's method of putting convicted killers to death.

"The Court of Appeals' decision falls in line completely with how lethal injection has just ripped across the nation as an issue that really has turned out to be much more substantive than people initially thought," said Michael Stark, an organizer with the Campaign to End the Death Penalty.

"What the court appears to be mandating is that the process of putting a person to death -- the gruesome techniques of putting a person to death -- is going to be up to public debate and scrutiny. When really tasked with the details of laying out what is the most efficient way of killing someone, no one is going to be able to stomach that," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0107749

A. Stephen Hut Jr., an attorney representing Evans, said the ruling has "significant implications, particularly in light of the events related to lethal injection over the last several days."

"This will allow some of that information and some of the science and expert input to inform the process and the policymakers' decision about what kind of execution procedure Maryland wants to have," he said.

Some activists seized on the ruling as an opportunity to push for Maryland to join the 13 states that do not have capital punishment.

"Don't bother to try to fix this. Maryland can avoid this whole mess by repealing the death penalty," said Jane Henderson, executive director of Maryland Citizens Against State Executions.

"This is a great moment for [Gov.-elect Martin] O'Malley to step up and take some leadership," she said. "If you've got a governor who doesn't like the death penalty and a public that is vastly in favor of instituting life without parole in place of the death penalty, why would you go through the trouble of rewriting execution protocol that may never get used?"

O'Malley, who said Tuesday that he had not yet read the court's decision, personally opposes capital punishment.

"I'd like to see us evolve to the point in time where we understand the death penalty does not deter violent crime ... and the resources we put toward it could better be invested elsewhere," the governor-elect said. He added, however, that his personal views would not prevent him from signing a death warrant.

"I'll take an oath to uphold the laws of the state of Maryland," O'Malley said. "That doesn't mean those laws can't be made better and more effective."

Sen. Brian E. Frosh, a Montgomery County Democrat who heads the judiciary committee, said Tuesday that he agreed with the appeals court's finding that the legislature never intended to give the Division of Correction free rein in implementing lethal injection procedures. He also said that he expects the "usual panoply" of death penalty-related bills, both to expand and eliminate the practice, to be introduced at the coming legislative session.

He said that while the General Assembly would "get a turn at bat" on the matter raised by the Court of Appeals, the executive branch would have to resolve the issue.

Evans, 57, was sentenced to death for the 1983 contract killings of David Scott Piechowicz and his wife's sister, Susan Kennedy, at the Pikesville motel where they worked. Piechowicz and his wife, Cheryl, had been scheduled to testify in federal court against a Baltimore drug lord.

The ruling in his case extends what has effectively been a ban on Maryland's use of its death chamber since the court postponed his execution in February and agreed to hear four appeals.

Lawyers for Evans were unsuccessful in their arguments that he should be granted a hearing to explore whether he was unfairly sentenced because of the death penalty policy of Baltimore County's top prosecutor and because of statewide racial and geographic disparities in the use of capital punishment. They also failed to persuade the judges that lawyers who represented Evans at his 1992 sentencing hearing did not meet the minimum standards for effective assistance of counsel.

In ruling in Evans' favor on the need for oversight of the execution protocols, the court rejected the state's arguments that the detailed checklist of tasks in Maryland's Execution Operations Manual is not subject to review because the procedures concern "only the internal management" of the Division of Correction and do not "directly affect the rights of the public."

Judge Alan M. Wilner, who authored the court's 102-page majority opinion, wrote: "We are unwilling to assume that the legislature intended to leave to DOC, on its own and without any oversight, unbridled authority to determine and then change at will, as a matter of internal management, how that statute is to be implemented."

Karen V. Poe, a spokeswoman for the state's Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services, said the agency's lawyers will review the decision and advise the secretary on what to do.

Highest Court In Maryland Suspends Executions (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

Maryland's highest court yesterday halted executions in the state, ruling that the state's protocol for lethal injections had been adopted improperly.

DOJ_NMG_0107750

The ruling follows similar developments in two other states on Friday. Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida suspended executions there after a troubled execution that lasted 34 minutes and required a second dose of lethal chemicals, while a federal judge in California ruled that the state's lethal injection protocol violated the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

The Maryland decision, from its Court of Appeals, accepted a technical argument from lawyers for a condemned inmate, Vernon Evans Jr. Mr. Evans murdered two people in 1983 for $9,000.

The court ruled that the state agencies in charge of executions had adopted a "lethal injection checklist" without following the required administrative procedures. New regulations must be published in the Maryland Register, submitted to a legislative committee and discussed at a public hearing.

The state argued that the checklist was a management tool rather than a regulation. Judge Alan M. Wilner, writing for the court, disagreed, noting that the checklist "prescribes in considerable detail the actual contents of the lethal concoction and the method of injecting it."

Judge Wilner wrote that the court was unwilling to assume, particularly in light of controversies surrounding the death penalty and its carrying out, that the legislature had meant to give the Corrections Department "unbridled authority to determine and change at will" how executions are carried out.

"Those kinds of decisions do not constitute routine internal management," Judge Wilner wrote. "They affect not only the inmates and the correctional personnel, but the witnesses allowed to observe the execution and the public generally, through its perception of the process."

While Judge Wilner noted in passing that the combination of three chemicals used in lethal injections in Maryland and 36 other states had been the subject of several court challenges and that "some believe it is not as humane as it was purported to be," the decision did not address those arguments.

A separate challenge pending in federal court in Baltimore, similar to the California case, takes direct issue with the chemicals used and the personnel who administer them.

Court Halts Executions, Eyes Review Of Protocols (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, December 20, 2006

Maryland's highest court yesterday rejected condemned murderer Vernon Evans' appeal for a new trial but ruled that the state must revisit protocols for lethal injections before carrying out another execution.

The Maryland Court of Appeals directed the state to rewrite the protocols in accordance with state law or have the legislature grant an exemption for the protocols.

The ruling did not impugn the state's lethal-injection procedure, but faulted the way the state established the procedures.

Nevertheless, the decision set the stage for a debate about capital punishment and lethal injection in the upcoming General Assembly session.

The ruling prompted Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley to pledge his willingness to sign death warrants despite his personal opposition to capital punishment.

"I take an oath to uphold the law," said Mr. O'Malley, a Democrat serving his second term as Baltimore's mayor. "That doesn't mean those laws can't be made better and more effective."

The Maryland decision comes four days after executions were halted in California and Florida over concerns that lethal injections might constitute cruel and unusual punishment.

Evans is pursuing that claim in a federal lawsuit.

Mr. O'Malley said he supported an end to capital punishment in Maryland, saying it was an ineffective crime-fighting strategy and a waste of money.

"I would like to see us evolve to a point in time where we understand that the death penalty does not reduce violent crime and it is not a deterrent to violent crime," Mr. O'Malley told reporters at a press conference in Baltimore, where he announced that his transportation secretary will be John D. Porcari, who had the same post under former Gov. Parris N. Glendening.

DOJ_NMG_0107751

"The dollars that we invest in [capital punishment] would be better spent in other places," Mr. O'Malley said. "I am very much in favor of life without parole for people who shoot, maim and kill other people. ... I'm not an advocate for the death penalty. I don't think it works."

At issue in yesterday's ruling is the state's execution operations manual, which determines the drugs that will be used and how they will be injected. The court found that the manual was never submitted to a joint legislative committee or given a public hearing before it was adopted by the Department of Corrections, as required under the state's Administrative Procedure Act.

The Court of Appeals reversed a ruling that denied a temporary restraining order in the case and remanded the case back to the Baltimore Circuit Court

While Evans is not entitled to a new sentencing proceeding or to a new trial under the ruling, his attorney, A. Stephen Hut Jr., called the ruling "an important win" that comes at a time when lethal injection is coming under closer scrutiny in other states.

Karen V. Poe, a spokeswoman for the Maryland Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services, said attorneys for the state will review the opinion and advise the department head on the next course of action.

Maryland uses three drugs during executions. Sodium pentothal renders the inmate unconscious; pancurium bromide paralyzes the inmate's breathing; and potassium chloride stops the heart.

Evans was sentenced to die for the 1983 contract murders of Scott Piechowicz, 27, and his sister-in-law, Susan Kennedy, 19.

The victims were killed with a high-powered Ingram MAC-10 submachine gun while working at a motel in Pikesville. Evans mistakenly killed Miss Kennedy in place of her sister Cheryl -- Mr. Piechowicz's wife. Miss Kennedy was filling in for Mrs. Piechowicz that night.

The Piechowiczes had been scheduled to testify against Anthony Grandison in a federal drug case. Prosecutors said Evans took $9,000 from Grandison, who was in prison, to carry out the killings

Both men eventually were convicted in federal court of witness tampering and civil rights violations. They also were found guilty of murder and sentenced to death in trials prosecuted by Baltimore County.

Maryland High Court Calls Halt To Executions (WP)

By Eric Rich And John Wagner

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Maryland's highest court ruled yesterday that the state's procedure for carrying out executions was adopted improperly, a defect that the court said must be addressed before any more condemned inmates are put to death.

The unanimous ruling by the Court of Appeals moved the debate squarely into the political realm, where Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) or his Democratic successor, Martin O'Malley, must act if executions are to resume.

Last night, O'Malley, who takes office Jan. 17, called on Ehrlich to leave the issue for the incoming administration. "I'm sure all of this will spark a renewed debate as to whether all of the money we spend prosecuting death penalty cases might be better spent fighting violent crime and saving lives," O'Malley said.

An Ehrlich aide said the administration was reviewing the matter and had not decided how to proceed.

Because of the effort required to correct the defect identified by the court, many death penalty opponents said they expect that O'Malley would ultimately chart the state's course.

O'Malley has taken a nuanced position on the issue, saying that he is personally opposed to the death penalty but that his opposition would not prevent him from signing a death warrant. "I'm very much in favor of life without parole for people that shoot, maim and kill others time and time again," he said yesterday.

Cindy Boersma, legislative director for the American Civil Liberties Union in Maryland, one of several plaintiffs in the case, said of the situation: "This is a perfect opportunity for the O'Malley administration to conclude that it's not possible to have capital punishment in Maryland consistent with standards of human dignity."

In ordering that the execution of Vernon L. Evans be postponed indefinitely, the Court of Appeals did not find that the three-drug cocktail that Maryland uses in lethal injections is unconstitutionally cruel.

DOJ_NMG_0107752

Rather, the court held that the process was developed by state prison authorities without legislative oversight and thus was not adopted, as regulations are supposed to be, in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act.

The court offered two paths to remedy the defect. The procedure could be adopted properly, a step that would require action by the secretary of public safety, a gubernatorial appointee, and a legislative panel; or the legislature could exempt the execution protocol from the requirements of the act.

A. Stephen Hut Jr., the attorney who argued the case in May on Evans's behalf, said yesterday that mounting scrutiny over the pain lethal injection may cause should have a sobering effect on either process.

"I think all of the botched processes in other states become highly relevant," he said.

Gov. Jeb Bush (R) suspended the death penalty in Florida on Friday after a botched execution took 34 minutes and a second injection to kill convicted murderer Angel Nieves Diaz. In the Northern District of California, Judge Jeremy D. Fogel ruled on the same day that the state must overhaul its lethal injection procedures, calling the current protocol unconstitutional because of the pain it might inflict.

Hut has brought a challenge similar to the one in California in U.S. District Court in Baltimore, arguing that the state's method of execution risks causing excruciating but undetectable pain and would not be permitted under state law even "to euthanize household pets or barnyard animals." Judge Benson E. Legg has not ruled in that case.

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) reiterated yesterday that he remains personally opposed to the death penalty, but he said he will not push for a review of lethal injection because state courts have upheld the practice.

Evans, of Baltimore, was convicted of the 1983 murders of David S. Piechowicz, 27, and Piechowicz's sister-in-law, Susan Kennedy, 19, at a hotel that Piechowicz managed in Pikesville. He is one of six inmates on death row in Maryland.

Wesley E. Baker died by lethal injection in December 2005 in the first execution in the state since June 2004 and the fifth in Maryland since the U.S. Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976.

Although yesterday's ruling had the effect of halting executions on technical grounds, a majority of the court rejected arguments that have been widely embraced by opponents of execution, including that the death penalty as applied in Maryland is unconstitutional because of racial bias.

To bring the execution process into compliance with the administrative procedure law would require a review by a joint committee of 20 legislators, who could significantly slow or even block implementation, depending upon on how the rules are presented by the administration.

If designated as "emergency" regulations by the administration, the rules would need the approval of the panel -- the Joint Committee on Administrative, Executive and Legislative Review -- and any one of the 20 members could call for a public hearing, the date of which would be set by the House and Senate chairmen. One of those is Sen. Paul G. Pinsky (D-Prince George's), a death penalty opponent.

"I'm not going to be in a hurry to push the plunger or let anyone else push the plunger," Pinsky said yesterday.

If the regulations are put forward without an "emergency" designation, they would be subject to a public comment period and could take several months to implement, Pinsky said. Ultimately, though, if there is no emergency designation, the administration could ignore the will of the legislative panel.

To exempt the execution protocol from the administrative procedures law -- the second course suggested by the high court -- would require legislation, and it is hard to gauge the likely support for such a measure. In recent years, the General Assembly has considered contradictory bills on the death penalty, and consensus has been in short supply.

Dead Wrong (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 20, 2006

It's killing that's cruel and unusual

IN ORDERING CHANGES in the way lethal injections are administered to condemned prisoners in California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is doing the right thing for the wrong reason.

It's not only right but imperative that the state correct the flaws in the lethal-injection protocol that were dispassionately detailed by U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in a "memorandum of intended decision" issued last week. Fogel's ruling followed a trial at which witnesses portrayed lethal injection in this state as a haphazard procedure in which some condemned inmates might have been conscious in their last moments of life.

But in promising to redress what Fogel had called a "pervasive lack of professionalism" in lethal injection, Schwarzenegger didn't emphasize — as the enlightened centrist chief executive he fancies himself should have — the need to spare even convicted murderers cruel and unusual punishment, by a moratorium on executions if necessary. No, Schwarzenegger indicated that he was seeking changes in what is blandly known as Operational Procedure No. 770 to keep judges from thwarting what the governor called "the will of the people [that] the death penalty is maintained in California." That death row inmates might be spared excruciating pain would be merely a byproduct of crossing the legal t's and dotting the i's.

That focus on propping up the death penalty is one problem with the governor's response to Fogel's decision. Another is that Schwarzenegger seems unwilling to entertain the possibility that what is really inappropriate about a civilized state's embrace of capital punishment — by lethal injection or any other means — is not the infliction of pain but the extinguishing of human life.

Contrary to Fogel's assertion in his opinion that the propriety of capital punishment is a matter for the Legislature, there was a time when judges took a broad view of whether the death penalty in its totality — and not just in a few botched executions — amounted to cruel and unusual punishment.

In 1972, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down state death penalty laws then on the books. In a much-quoted opinion, Justice Potter Stewart said that capital punishment was imposed "wantonly and freakishly," adding that "these death sentences are cruel and unusual in the same way that being struck by lightning is cruel and unusual." The same is true, we believe, of the selective, even capricious imposition of the death penalty at the present time, whether or not the chemical cocktail administered to a prisoner is mixed in a way that minimizes pain. Tinkering with the machinery of lethal injection is only the beginning.

Feds Probe 12 Police Shootings In DeKalb (AJC)

By Mae Gentry, Ty Tagami, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 20, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department and the FBI are looking into fatal police shootings this year in DeKalb County.

If civil rights violations are found, "appropriate action will be taken," Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim wrote in a Dec. 12 letter to local activist John Evans, who asked the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division to investigate the DeKalb shootings.

Since January, DeKalb officers have shot to death 12 suspects — more than any other police department in metro Atlanta. One officer has also been killed.

The shootings have drawn protests and demonstrations at county commission meetings and outside the police department.

Kim could not be reached for comment Tuesday. A spokeswoman for the U.S. Justice Department confirmed the federal inquiry into the DeKalb shootings, but would not give details.

Relatives of suspects killed in the police shootings welcomed the news that the federal government is looking into the cases.

"Wow, great," said Iffat Muhammad, after being told that the federal agencies were "gathering information" about the shootings, according to Wan's letter.

Muhammad's brother, Abraheem, was killed by a DeKalb police officer in August. Her brother was shot by an officer checking on a trespassing complaint. He attacked the officer and tried to get her gun, police said.

"We're hopeful," Iffat Muhammad said. "We're praying someone will come in and investigate it [the police shootings] thoroughly."

DeKalb Interim Police Chief Nick Marinelli last month asked District Attorney Gwen Keyes Fleming to review the police department's investigation of several of the 2006 shootings. Keyes Fleming said she will impanel a special grand jury to look into the cases.

Keyes Fleming said the federal inquiry will have no impact on the investigation by the county grand jury.

DOJ_NMG_0107754

"The grand jury will review the internal policies of the department and the decisions made under those policies as it relates to these cases," she said. "It appears that the FBI is investigating a completely independent track, and we will continue what we've started.

"The more agencies involved, the more confidence the citizens will have that their questions will be answered," she said.

Marinelli did not return a phone call seeking comment.

DeKalb Chief Executive Officer Vernon Jones, asked about the federal inquiry, said: "I have confidence in this police department and if an officer did something improper, that this police department made the proper recommendations to handle that individual officer."

Jones said if an officer did act improperly, it's up to the district attorney to prosecute.

But Evans said he had no confidence in an investigation by local authorities. "Out here in this county, we have too much nepotism, too much favoritism, too many people know each other," he said. "There's so many examples of that."

Evans has asked the county commission to adopt a resolution calling for a federal grand jury investigation.

County Commissioner Burrell Ellis said it may be "premature" to do so, given the advice he has received from the county law department. The department told him two things, he said: A federal grand jury only investigates criminal matters, and the only agency with standing to request a federal grand jury investigation is the U.S. Attorney's Office.

"I'm not aware of any criminal allegations that were raised," Ellis said. Jones has pleaded with residents to "put your weapon down" in confrontations with cops. Nine of the 12 slain suspects had guns, and one shot a police officer to death.

Gerald Rose, founder of a group called New Order National Human Rights Organization, who organized a protest outside DeKalb police headquarters last month, called the new development "baby steps toward justice."

"We hope the FBI and other investigators really get to the bottom of this," he said.

Chandra Harden, whose 19-year-old son was killed in August, said she was happy to learn the federal government was getting involved.

Harden's son, Deon Studiemyer, was fatally shot by an off-duty officer who said Studiemyer was breaking into his home.

"The D.A. was already looking into it, but we weren't getting half the information we were asking for," Harden said. "I think it's necessary that they go ahead and tell us something so we can go ahead and get some type of peace in our lives."

U.S. Attorney For State Leaving For Private Practice (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner

The Arizona Republic, December 20, 2006

U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton announced Tuesday that that he is quitting his government post to enter private legal practice early next year.

Charlton said he will become a partner in the Phoenix-based firm of Gallagher and Kennedy at the end of January.

During his stint as the state's top federal lawyer, Charlton oversaw major enforcement initiatives against terrorism, public corruption, illegal immigration and crime in Indian country.

advertisement

"I am immensely proud of what the men and women of this office have accomplished over the past five years," Charlton said. "I'm excited to open a new chapter in my career, and to face the very new and different challenges of private practice."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is expected to appoint an interim U.S. attorney, who will serve until a permanent replacement is nominated by the president and confirmed by the U.S. Senate.

Charlton was appointed U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona on Nov. 12, 2001, by President Bush. He said he is proud of post-9/11 efforts to protect the homeland, including the creation of a statewide Anti-Terrorism Task Force to secure nuclear plants, railroads and other key public facilities.

The nation's 93 U.S. Attorneys work with federal enforcement agencies to oversee criminal investigations and prosecutions. They also represent the federal government in civil litigation. The U.S. Attorney's Office in Arizona has more than 250 employees.

DOJ_NMG_0107755

In a news release, U.S. Sen. Jon Kyl praised Charlton as "an extraordinary public servant during a time of grave challenge to our national security. We will miss his strong and principled leadership."

John E. Lewis, the FBI's special agent in charge for Arizona, credited Charlton with being "proactive concerning the bureau's number one priority, protecting the United States from terrorist attacks."

Charlton also launched a campaign against drug abuse on Native American reservations, inviting the state's 21 tribes to join in an Arizona Indian Country Methamphetamine Eradication Initiative. He spearheaded efforts to root out corruption, especially among government officials along the Mexican border. And he oversaw a crackdown on criminal aliens.

"We really are making a difference on the border, and that's encouraging," Charlton said.

During Charlton's tenure, the U.S. Attorney's Office established permanent offices in Flagstaff and Yuma, added 16 new prosecutors and increased criminal filings by more than 25 percent.

Charlton, 46, earned his law degree in 1988 at the University of Arizona. After serving a clerkship at the state Court of Appeals, he worked at the Arizona Attorney General's Office for two years before becoming a federal prosecutor.

Charlton will join his wife, Susan, who also is an attorney at Gallagher and Kennedy. He said he expects to specialize in corporate compliance and white-collar defense.

"I've worked as a public servant for a long time, and I've enjoyed it," he said. "Now, it's time to move on."

U.S. Attorney Ousted (KRQE)

By Michael Herzenberg

KRQE-TV CBS 13, December 19, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE -- The top federal prosecutor in New Mexico, U.S. Attorney David Iglesias, has been asked to resign and will be giving up the office, KRQE News 13 has learned.

Sources confirmed the Department of Justice called Iglesias last week and asked him to resign.

He has held the position since 2001 after being appointed by President Bush.

During his five years, Iglesias oversaw high-profile cases including the successful prosecution of the Cisneros drug ring with murder charges resulting in guilty pleas and life sentences.

Five of six defendants in what was known as the China Wok case also took plea deals in 2005 admitting they smuggled illegal Chinese immigrants into the state.

Other cases didn't turn out the way Iglesias would have hoped

David Hudak, accused in 2002 for weapons and explosives violations and for illegal military, was acquitted of all charges in his 2003 trial. He had been charged with nine counts stemming from his use of explosives and training in counterterrorism techniques.

Most recently public corruption trial of former State Treasurer Robert Vigil ended with both sides claiming victory.

A hung jury ended the first trial with the retrial producing a single conviction for extortion. The jury acquitted Vigil of 23 other felony counts.

A sentencing of 12 months to 20 years awaits him in January.

A statement released Monday night by the U.S. Attorney's office spokesman Norm Cairns confirmed Iglesias's departure.

"He will leave in the next few months, has had discussions with Washington and based on those discussions he has decided to move on to other things."

Why Iglesias was asked to resign remains unknown although source said was probably just time for a change.

The Justice Department is already looking for a replacement.

Local Federal Attorney Plans To Step Down; Iglesias Investigated State Corruption (ALBTRIB)

Albuquerque Tribune, December 20, 2006

U.S. Attorney David Iglesias will resign his post in the next few months, an office spokesman said today.

After discussions with officials in Washington, D.C., Iglesias decided he would move on, U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman Norm Cairns said. No other information was released.

The U.S. Attorney's Office has been involved in two high-profile investigations of public corruption in New Mexico this year with mixed results.

Former state Treasurer Robert Vigil was convicted of one count of extortion this fall but acquitted on 23 counts of racketeering and extortion. He will be sentenced later this month.

Vigil was tried on essentially the same charges earlier in the year. The trial ended in a hung jury, with one juror holding out against any guilty verdict.

Rumors have also swirled for months about an investigation into corruption involving major public construction projects in Bernalillo County including the state District Courthouse and Metro Courthouse.

An FBI spokesman confirmed in October that an investigation had been forwarded to Iglesias' office - although he declined to specify details. Since then indictments have regularly been expected and then delayed.

Details that have emerged about the investigation suggest it centers on kickbacks paid for work on the two courthouses. It arose from testimony in a lawsuit between partners in an engineering firm. One partner suggested that improper payments were made to former state Sen. Manny Aragon, a consultant for the company.

Iglesias, 48, was appointed to his post as the state's top federal law enforcement officer in 2001 by President George W. Bush. He was the first Hispanic to serve as U.S. attorney since the Nixon administration.

He lost the general election for state attorney general in 1998 to Patricia Madrid.

His other legal experience includes assistant state attorney general, office of special prosecutions, 1988-91; assistant city attorney for Albuquerque, civil rights division, 1991-94; White House fellow, 1994-95; chief counsel for the state Risk Management Division, 1988-91.

From 1985-88, he was lieutenant in the Navy Judge Advocate General's Corps. A hazing case in Cuba that he worked on was turned into the movie "A Few Good Men."

Family sues after Florida woman put on life support

After watching her husband and two daughters die painfully from cancer, Madeline Neumann decided she did not want to prolong her own death. When she moved into a nursing home in Florida at age 89, she signed an advance directive that instructed doctors not to revive her if she collapsed.

Despite those written instructions, emergency medics were summoned one evening in 1995 when aides found her unresponsive.

Neumann, who suffered from Alzheimer's disease, ended up in a hospital, tethered to wires, tubes and life-support machines — just the situation her family says she had hoped to avoid.

Neumann's three granddaughters persuaded doctors to disconnect the machines over the next several days. A week after she was admitted, Neumann died. Those seven days were degrading and painful to Neumann, according to her granddaughters, who say Neumann's directive should have protected her from such an experience.

The granddaughters are suing the Joseph L. Morse Geriatric Center in West Palm Beach and its chief doctor, Jaimy Bensimon, for unspecified damages, claiming they essentially ignored Neumann's wishes.

"We watched my grandmother suffer and linger for one week," says Linda Scheible, 47, the oldest granddaughter. "This is never what she wanted or what the family wanted. We had taken every measure possible.

"If this can happen to a family that was so involved, I believe this is happening in a much more widespread way."

The suit, filed in 1997, is drawing attention nationwide and is likely to be tried early next year, after nearly a decade of legal wrangling.

DOJ_NMG_0107757

It appears to be the first time a Florida court has been asked to decide whether a doctor can be held liable for providing treatment at odds with a medical directive. The case could have significant implications for efforts to hold hospitals, nursing homes and physicians accountable if they disregard living wills and advance directives.

The trial's venue also is symbolic. Living wills and medical directives are an increasingly hot topic in a nation where the U.S. Census Bureau projects the number of people over age 65 will double during the next 25 years, to 72 million. Florida has a higher percentage of residents over 65 than any other state — 17.6% of the state's 18.2 million people.

The Neumann case will be heard in West Palm Beach, about 200 miles east of Pinellas Park, where the bruising right-to-die court battle was waged last year over Terri Schiavo, the severely brain-damaged woman whose family members fought over whether to remove the feeding tube that kept her alive.

Schiavo, who was 26 when she collapsed, had left no living will or written instructions about her care in the event she became incapacitated.

The Schiavo case ended when her husband defeated her parents' efforts to keep the feeding tube in place. It prompted new interest in living wills and medical directives, including federal legislation that encouraged people to draft them, says Kathy Cerminara, a professor at Nova Southeastern University law school in Fort Lauderdale.

Even so, most adult Americans have not drafted such documents.

Only a few lawsuits stemming from medical treatment that was against a patient's wishes have advanced in the courts, which generally have viewed efforts to sustain life as not being harmful to a patient.

Attorneys who file such claims have used a variety of legal tactics. The attorneys for Neumann's family allege in court papers that by resuscitating her, doctors subjected Neumann to a form of battery, or beating.

The attorneys also are alleging breach of contract and negligence.

Doctors facing such lawsuits have emphasized the need to assess a patient's condition in an emergency and determine whether it is truly life-threatening, instead of simply withholding treatment.

Bensimon, the doctor targeted in the suit filed by Neumann's family, had read Neumann's directive, says his attorney, James Nosich.

The attorney says Bensimon sent Neumann to the hospital because Bensimon was away from the nursing home when she collapsed. Rather than not treat her, the doctor wanted to have her condition evaluated that night, Nosich says.

After life support was withdrawn, "Neumann died peacefully," Nosich says, "with her granddaughters at her side."

Lois Shepherd, a law professor at Florida State University who specializes in health care law and end-of-life issues, says such disputes represent "one of the next frontiers in health care litigation."

"We've been lulled into this sense of security that all you need to do is have an advance directive," Shepherd says. "But it's not as simple as that. They're clumsy documents, and vague. They can't predict all conditions."

An advance directive, such as a living will, informs doctors about what kind of treatment to administer when a patient is unable to make those decisions personally.

As Shepherd says, advance directives cannot anticipate every scenario. Most conflicts over them stem from emergencies, when decisions are made rapidly and patients and family members sometimes change their minds about what should be done, despite the patient's prior instructions.

Robert Arnold, a medical ethicist at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center who specializes in end-of-life issues, says merely drafting a medical directive sometimes isn't enough to ensure that a patient's desires regarding treatment will be carried out. And, he says, sometimes they shouldn't be.

"It's important to talk to your doctor beforehand. These kinds of conversations are hard to have in the middle of the night" during an emergency, he says. "It may be that I'm not sure why you've filled out the advance directive. If you're a healthy 75-year-old and all of a sudden you have chest pains, I'm going to send you to the ER," regardless of what the directive says.

"I don't expect when you filled out your living will that what you meant was you were unwilling to be on machines," Arnold says. "That's why it's so important not just to have the (paperwork) filled out. It's about what your goals are."

The most notable court case involving an advance directive was in 1996, when a jury awarded $16.5 million to the family of a 38-year-old Michigan woman who had been kept on life support for more than four years after a seizure incapacitated her, despite her written instructions directing doctors to let her die in such a situation.

The award was reduced on appeal to $1.4 million, although the judge upheld the finding that the patient had been battered medically. The family and the hospital agreed to void the medical battery finding when they settled the case in 1997 for an undisclosed amount.

Scheible says pursuing her grandmother's case has become a crusade.

"How could this have happened? All the paperwork was completed. Her wishes were verbalized. This is a violation of her wishes that could not be ignored," she says.

Scheible's grandmother moved into the Morse Center in 1992 with a diagnosis of progressive dementia.

She was mentally competent and requested a living will declaration form, provided by the nursing home. It instructed doctors not to resuscitate her, feed her with tubes, perform surgery or assist her breathing with a ventilator if she became unable to participate in decisions regarding her care.

Neumann did request treatment with antibiotics. Apart from the advance directive, she also received medication for seizures.

Neumann also authorized Scheible, a nurse and licensed psychotherapist, to make medical decisions on Neumann's behalf.

Scheible says she attended quarterly meetings at the nursing home to plan Neumann's care and that she made sure the advance directive, color-coded in pink, was included in her grandmother's medical file.

However, doctors did not place a Do Not Resuscitate order (DNR) in her file — a fact that would become important when the medics were called.

A DNR order, written by a doctor, tells health care professionals not to attempt emergency CPR if a patient stops breathing. In the absence of such an order, Florida law requires emergency medics to do CPR.

By 1995, Neumann, then 92, was firmly in the grip of Alzheimer's disease, Scheible says. Neumann lost more than 25 pounds in three months, and her granddaughters thought it was obvious that she was in her final decline.

The night of the emergency, Neumann was "in the process of slowly, peacefully passing away," says Jack Scarola, Scheible's attorney.

Scheible says she was stunned when she learned medics had inserted a tube into her grandmother's airway to resuscitate her and taken her to the hospital.

Neumann says her grandmother was in pain and was bruised, and her arms had to be tied with restraints because she tried to pull tubes out of her neck.

Scarola says he intends to show at trial that the Morse Center staff knew of the advance directive but had not read it, and so had not adequately prepared a medical plan for the end of Neumann's life.

He says the center never informed the family that a DNR order was needed.

"The absence of the document in the chart is very significant," he says. "But the case involves broader principles. This was a situation where they had three years of responsibility for this patient, during which the end-of-life issues were ignored."

He says the Florida Supreme Court has upheld a patient's right to determine his or her health care, without the need for any diagnosis.

The Morse Center did not respond to requests for comment. In court papers, it has said the claim by Neumann's family is not valid under Florida law and has sought to have the case dismissed.

Nosich, the attorney for Bensimon, says the doctor had read the directive but was 40 minutes away from the nursing home the night Neumann collapsed and therefore summoned medics to assess Neumann's condition.

"At the end of the day, when the (emergency) phone call comes in, do you want your doctor, before letting you die, to have you evaluated?" Nosich asks. "Or do you let a non-medical professional give your doctor the information and have him rely on that?"

He adds that Neumann's request to be treated with antibiotics is important to the defense.

DOJ_NMG_0107759

"Under her own wishes, (Neumann) said she wanted antibiotics if they can prolong her life. Which means, at a minimum, Dr. Bensimon has to examine her to see if they are appropriate," Nosich says.

He believes Neumann's family would have questioned the doctor's judgment if he had let Neumann die.

"What if (she) dies, and it turned out she had another seizure" similar to those she had in the past? Nosich asks. "What do you think the family would have done then?

"If you call 911, you get sued," he says. "If you don't call, you get sued."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

The Secret's Out, But Why Was It Ever Under Wraps? (USAT)

USA Today, December 20, 2006

ACLU case uncovers folly of government classifying too much.

Every minute, the U.S. government makes 27 decisions to classify documents. That translates into 1,620 classification decisions every hour, 38,880 every day and 14 million every year.

Some of these decisions, of course, protect sensitive state secrets. But it's preposterous to believe that more than a tiny percentage of classifications are justified by national security concerns. They are more probably the result of the bureaucratic impulse to keep secrets and the political instinct to avoid accountability.

So when one of these innocuous pieces of paper leaks out, as they inevitably do when classification is used so promiscuously, it exposes the folly of the exercise. More so when the government uses its power in an attempt to intimidate anyone who seeks to make the information public.

One such case has unfolded over the past few weeks with embarrassing results.

The American Civil Liberties Union obtained a document so sensitive that the Justice Department, in a burst of indignation, took the extraordinary step of seeking a grand jury subpoena to demand its return.

And what was this hypersensitive material? It turns out the document laid out the conditions under which prisoners of war in Iraq could be photographed. It had no national security ramifications. It wasn't even particularly revealing, as the ACLU had suggested when it was still under wraps.

This week, the Justice Department, apparently sensing a legal defeat and public relations problem, prudently backed down and declassified the document.

Though it might be tempting to shrug off the incident now that the subpoena has been withdrawn, that would miss the larger point. The case illustrates how mindless government's secrecy efforts can be. Sometimes, it seems as if secrecy is less a policy than the output of inertial forces. Once leaders decide to make government more closed, the wheels of the bureaucracy creak into motion — classifying more documents, declassifying fewer and, as this case shows, sometimes careening out of control as the result of its own momentum.

That is what has happened as President Bush's administration has embraced secrecy, reversing a Clinton-era declassification program and even seeking to reclassify documents that have been public for years. The ACLU case exposes the excesses.

Obviously, this document never should have been classified. It might well have been handed out to military personnel and journalists in Iraq to let them know the ground rules, some of them adapted from the Geneva Conventions.

Using a subpoena to recover it was little more than an artful ruse to achieve prior restraint, a practice involving government trying to quash information before it is made public. Because prior restraint is the ultimate in suppression of free speech, it is presumed to be unconstitutional under all but the most extraordinary circumstances, as the Supreme Court made clear in a 1971 ruling on another leaked document in the landmark Pentagon Papers case.

The government should have known this was no way to plug leaks. And it should have realized that the ACLU document wasn't worth making a federal case over. But exercising sound judgment is hard when government is unable to stop itself from declaring virtually anything a secret.

Both Sides At Fault (USAT)

By Douglas W. Kmiec

USA Today, December 20, 2006

The dust-up over the Justice Department subpoena is over. This was no major victory for civil liberty. It turns out the subpoena sent to the ACLU might have been issued only because the organization's lawyers were looking for a fight. Bad form, even worse constitutional theory.

Press freedom cannot be understated in a democratic republic. But it should not be overstated either. The ACLU claimed that the 3½-page document contained no classified information. That well could be — Justice has now declassified it, and it is merely military guidance limiting photography of detainees to comply with the Geneva Conventions.

But no one elected the ACLU to make declassification decisions. What documents must be classified for national defense is governed by law and regulation. Though this soap opera lends credence to the complaint that too much is kept secret, the remedy is not to take the law into one's own hands.

There is a lesson for Justice, too. Though grand jury subpoenas are hardly novel, somebody should think twice before issuing one that might unnecessarily limit free speech. Judge Jed Rakoff was sensitive to this, referencing the Pentagon Papers case.

The two cases are different, but only subtly so. The present matter concerns the responsibility of a private citizen in possession of stolen government property. By contrast, the Pentagon Papers was an unsuccessful effort to stop newspaper publication. Properly, such press prior restraint has a heavy presumption against its constitutional validity.

Returning classified materials, however, is exactly called for in law: "Whoever, lawfully or unlawfully, having possession of (classified information) and fails to deliver it on demand to the officer or employee of the United States entitled to receive it" is in violation.

The late Chief Justice Warren Burger put it well: "It is hardly believable that an (entity) long regarded as a great institution in American life would fail to perform one of the basic and simple duties of every citizen with respect to the discovery or possession of stolen property or secret government documents."

"That duty," wrote Burger, "rests on taxi drivers, Justices, and The New York Times." It would befit the ACLU, too.

Douglas W. Kmiec, a law professor at Pepperdine University, was constitutional legal counsel to Presidents Reagan and George H. W. Bush. (The Justice Department declined to provide an opposing view before a court hearing scheduled for today in the case.)

Legal Fight Against Racial Ban Intensifies (Det News)

By Marisa Schultz

Detroit News, December 20, 2006

Prop 2 backers outraged as judge lets colleges continue to use race for fall admissions.

DETROIT -- The ACLU and NAACP filed suit Tuesday against Proposal 2, the latest salvo in a growing assault just four days before Michigan's ban on affirmative action was to take effect.

The challenge was filed on the same day a federal judge agreed to give three Michigan universities a six-month delay before they stop using race as a consideration in admissions and financial aid.

The court maneuvers fed a growing concern by affirmative action opponents who fear that the will of the voters, who on Nov. 7 passed the prohibition against using race, is not being respected. Both candidates for governor, and business and other leaders campaigned against the proposal.

"I'm disgusted with the whole shebang," said Dick Megregian, a retired senior automotive engineer and MSU alumnus. "My vote and the vote of 58 percent of the people is undermined by the politicians and judges because they are dragging their feet and don't want to implement it."

Tuesday was the busiest court day yet for Proposal 2:

U.S. District Judge David Lawson granted a request from the University of Michigan, Michigan State University and Wayne State University to delay the implementation of Proposal 2 for those schools from Dec. 23 to July 1. Supported by Attorney General

DOJ_NMG_0107761

Mike Cox and Gov. Jennifer Granholm, the schools claimed that changing admissions and financial-aid rules midway through the admissions cycle would be unfair to students who start in fall 2007.

The city of Lansing also filed a motion before Lawson asking for permission to delay implementing Proposal 2 until July 1, the beginning of its fiscal year. The city doesn't have enough time to make necessary changes, officials said.

The ACLU of Michigan, NAACP and others filed a lawsuit on behalf of 19 students, faculty and applicants to U-M asking a judge to allow race and gender preferences to continue in university admissions. Proposal 2 shouldn't undue the U.S. Supreme Court ruling that allows the use of race as a factor in admissions, they argued.

The Center for Individual Rights, which argued against the University of Michigan before the Supreme Court, asked for an emergency hearing on behalf of Eric Russell, a white applicant to U-M Law School. Lawson should have heard the argument of a student who will be impacted by delaying Proposal 2 before making his decision, they say.

At a Tuesday press conference in front of U.S. District Court in Detroit, leaders for ACLU of Michigan and the NAACP argued that without affirmative action in university admissions, minorities and women would face a double standard, since athletes, veterans and children of alumni would be allowed preferential treatment.

"We believe affirmative action is the law of the land," said the Rev. Wendell Anthony, president of the NAACP-Detroit Chapter. "We hope the court will hear our plea."

He points to the U.S. Supreme Court ruling in 2003 that upheld the use of race as a factor in admissions. Proposal 2 should not override that ruling, he said.

Terry Pell, president of the Center of Individual Rights, believes the ACLU's case will be a losing battle. The center sued the University of Michigan to limit the use of affirmative action in college admissions.

The Supreme Court allowed the use of race but does not mandate it, said Pell, who filed a motion in an effort to block the delay from taking place for universities.

Postponing the implementation of Proposal 2 for six months means Pell's client, Russell, will not be treated equally in U-M's admission process, both men claimed.

"It's about me and it's about all the applicants," said Russell, 29, of Auburn Hills. "The electorate passed Proposal 2 and the university ought to implement it. I'm not suing for admission, I'm suing for equal consideration."

Pell anticipates Lawson will rule on his motion as soon as today.

Still uncertain is whether more cities or other governmental units will follow Lansing's lead and ask for more time.

Michael McGee, a partner at Miller Canfield in Detroit, said he wouldn't be surprised if others file as well. Like universities, municipalities are dealing with a fundamental change in the way they do business, said McGee, whose law firm represents several cities.

"It's difficult to turn on the dime and it takes a reasonable transition period, particularly when a unit of government is in the middle of its fiscal year," said McGee, noting cities typically take action at the start of a fiscal year, setting the tone for the rest of year.

Rights Groups File Prop 2 Lawsuit (FREEP)

By CHASTITY PRATT And DAWSON BELL

Detroit Free Press, December 20, 2006

On the same day the University of Michigan won a reprieve that will allow it to continue considering race in the fall admissions process, civil rights organizations filed a lawsuit Tuesday aiming to make the reprieve permanent.

At issue is Proposal 2, the anti-affirmative action amendment to Michigan's Constitution. The amendment takes effect Friday.

Civil rights organizations, including the NAACP's Detroit chapter and the American Civil Liberties Union, took their case to federal court. They argued the amendment doesn't apply because of a 2003 U.S. Supreme Court case affirming universities' right to consider race in admissions.

DOJ_NMG_0107762

"We have come too far to allow the doors of opportunity to be shut in the face of the American promise of liberty and justice," Wendell Anthony, president of the Detroit branch of the NAACP, said Tuesday at a news conference on the steps of U.S. District Court in Detroit.

But a Washington-based group that has fought against race and gender preferences said the U.S. Supreme Court already decided the issue when it chose not to hear a challenge to California's Proposition 209, which was passed by voters in 1996. The California law was the model for Proposal 2.

An appellate panel in that case found that "nobody has a right to a racial preference; a state can decide it doesn't want them," said Terence Pell of the Center for Individual Rights. The same group filed papers Tuesday to appeal Judge David Lawson's order affirming a deal among the state's three largest universities -- U-M, Michigan State University and Wayne State University-- and Attorney General Mike Cox. The deal grants the schools a delay until 2007-08 in putting Proposal 2's mandates in effect for admissions and financial aid.

Pell's organization is representing Eric Russell, a Wayne State University graduate student who is applying to U-M Law School.

Neither the parties to the suit nor the federal court has the authority "to second guess Michigan voters," Pell said.

The schools had argued that because they were in the middle of the application and admission process for fall 2007 and many students already have been accepted that it would have been unfair to subject different students in the same class to different admissions and financial aid criteria.

If Lawson's ruling stands, current high school juniors would be the first students impacted by the implementation of Proposal 2.

Cox spokesman Rusty Hills defended the agreement, which he said was narrowly tailored to allow the universities to complete processing applications for 2007-08 without challenging Proposal 2 directly.

State Rep. Leon Drolet, R-Clinton Township, one of the ballot proposal's chief backers, said he is "stunned that the universities couldn't find a way to comply with the will of the people." But giving up their underlying challenge could help, he said, if the universities "live up to their end of the bargain."

Butch Hollowell, an attorney speaking on behalf of the civil rights groups that filed Tuesday's lawsuit, said it focuses on the University of Michigan because of the school's excellent educational reputation and the 2003 case.

"Ultimately, this could get to the U.S. Supreme Court," Hollowell said.

In 2003, the Supreme Court found U-M's previous admissions system that awarded points to underrepresented minorities -- African Americans, Hispanics and American Indians -- was unconstitutional. But it ruled that race may be among factors considered in the admissions process.

Sheldon Johnson, 20, a U-M junior, echoed two U-M professors who said Tuesday that affirmative action in admissions not only helps diversify the students, but gives them exposure to people and perspectives that can help them navigate the world after they graduate.

"That's what this is really about, opportunity," he said.

The NAACP's Anthony said the challenge isn't meant to defy Michigan citizens who voted 58% to 42% in favor of Proposal 2, which bans race and gender-based preferences in university admissions and government hiring and contracting.

The case is meant to force an interpretation of the law, Anthony said.

He added that under the current admissions policy, U-M may consider whether an applicant is the child of an alum or from specific parts of the state, therefore race and gender should be retained, he said.

Short-Term Reprieve For Affirmative Action (INSHIGHED)

By Scott Jaschik

Inside Higher Ed, December 20, 2006

Three Michigan universities on Tuesday won the right to keep their current admissions and financial aid policies — the affirmative action portions of which could have been illegal in the state by the end of the week — until July 1. But long term, the ability of colleges to challenge the ban on affirmative action remained uncertain, with some advocates saying that the day's developments strengthened efforts to do so, and others saying just the opposite.

A federal judge granted the universities a reprieve from the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative, known as Proposal 2, which was to take effect this week and would bar affirmative action in admissions by public colleges and universities in the state. Michigan State and Wayne State Universities and the University of Michigan sought permission to delay Proposal 2, saying that it would be impractical and unfair for the institutions to change their processes in the middle of an admissions cycle, with some applicants already evaluated and others awaiting review.

In November, 58 percent of Michigan voters backed Proposal 2 — despite widespread opposition from higher education, business and political leaders. The impact has expected to be most dramatic at the University of Michigan — both because its admissions process is the most competitive in the state and because it is the institution that in 2003 successfully defended at the U.S. Supreme Court the right of colleges to consider race and ethnicity in admissions decisions.

The day after the vote on Proposal 2, the University of Michigan signaled that it would probably challenge the measure in court, although it did not specify how it would do so, and similar challenges in other states had failed. But within a few weeks, the university — while saying it was continuing to consider legal options — changed its tone and started talking more about complying with Proposal 2. To date, the only legal challenge to the measure from the universities in the state was the request to delay the start of the ban on affirmative action.

University officials on Tuesday stressed that the court ruling affected only the immediate questions of this admissions cycle.

"What we sought was not a change on the Proposal 2 scoreboard, but merely a timeout," said Terry Denbow, vice president for university relations at Michigan State. "I am pleased that the request was deemed reasoned and reasonable. We need time to assess — within the boundaries of the law — programs to assure fairness to students and to others, like private donors and major corporations who have designated financial aid gifts. Our due diligence is directed at being one, true to the law, and, two, true to our values."

Whether the universities will seek to overturn Proposal 2 remains the big question. By Any Means Necessary, a group formed to defend affirmative action, has already filed a suit in federal court to do so — and Tuesday's ruling technically came in motions related to that case, the substance of which has yet to be heard. By Any Means Necessary has criticized the University of Michigan for not fully joining the suit already, while many others in the state have criticized the university for hinting that it would sue.

Among those who criticized universities for seeking to delay Proposal 2 was Mike Cox, the state's attorney general. But he helped broker the deal approved by the court on Tuesday. In announcing the agreement, Cox issued a statement saying that the pact settled the question of Proposal 2's viability. "This is a historic agreement. It upholds the will of the people," Cox said. "In addition, the agreement is a reasonable compromise that serves the public interest by allowing the current admissions and financial aid cycles to be completed under existing policies, while confirming the constitutionality of Proposal 2 in light of the legal challenges launched against it by the universities."

Cox went on to say that the universities had pledged — as part of the agreement — not to file any lawsuits against Proposal 2 on the basis of their First Amendment rights to academic freedom.

The academic freedom issue is potentially important for any legal challenge to Proposal 2. While academic freedom is not an explicit part of the U.S. Constitution, it has been recognized as a right by the U.S. Supreme Court since the 1957 case of Sweezy v. New Hampshire, in which Justice Felix Frankfurter defined the four elements of academic freedom as "the freedom of an institution to decide who may attend, who may teach, what may be taught and how it shall be taught." Many supporters of affirmative action believe the concept should be covered by the "who may attend" provision.

There is, however, a problem with Cox's statement: It is not clear that the universities agreed to what he said they agreed to. The universities released a copy of the "stipulations" that were filed with the court as part of the request for the delay in Proposal 2. The relevant stipulation says that the universities' claim (which includes the academic freedom argument) "shall be and hereby is dismissed in its entirety, with prejudice only as to the specific injunctive relief requested in the cross-claim."

DOJ_NMG_0107764

Donna Stern, a spokeswoman for By Any Means Necessary, noted that the specific relief requested was the delay. As a result, she said, there was no stipulation that the universities couldn't sue on academic freedom grounds to try to block Proposal 2.

"All they've said is that they won't make the same exact claim, but they couldn't make the same exact claim because that issue is now settled," Stern said. She said she was encouraged by the outcome to hope that the universities might join the suit.

University of Michigan officials said they were pleased with the ruling Tuesday, but didn't comment on the possible inconsistency in what the attorney general said they had agreed to, and what the stipulation said.

A spokesman for the attorney general did not return repeated calls.

Proposal 2 Challenges Subvert Self-government (Det News)

By John T. Greilick

The Detroit News, December 20, 2006

ACLU lawsuit seeks to nullify effect of public's vote

The American Civil Liberties Union should add the right of the people to self government to the list of freedoms it is dedicated to protecting.

Michigan's ACLU chapter is making a direct assault on that right by asking a federal judge to rewrite the recently passed Proposal 2 anti-affirmative action measure in a way that would render the new law meaningless.

In a lawsuit filed Tuesday, the ACLU asked the federal district court in Detroit to declare that Proposal 2 allows for race and gender to be considered in university admissions, consistent with the U.S. Supreme Court ruling in the University of Michigan case.

That's completely opposite of what voters intended when they approved Proposal 2 by an overwhelming margin in the November election.

The ballot language was precise. It asked voters whether race and gender preferences ought to be used in admissions and hiring at public institutions, specifically universities. And the voters said no.

We disagreed with the decision made by the electorate. We argued during the campaign that affirmative action is still needed as a tool to erase the inequities that exist in our society, and particularly in the education system.

But we lost the argument. And our respect for the referendum process and the direct democracy it provides to the people is far greater than our desire to prevail on the issue.

The ACLU argues that it is not making a constitutional challenge to Proposal 2, but rather asking the judge to rewrite the law to make it consistent with what the Supreme Court ruling allows.

But the Supreme Court said only that race and gender could be considered if an institution so desires. It did not mandate that institutions make such considerations.

Voters were quite clear in their desire to not have Michigan's public universities consider race and gender when admitting students.

If the ACLU were to prevail in its lawsuit, the expressed desire of the people would be subverted.

We share the concern of the universities that Proposal 2 makes their goal of creating culturally diverse campuses more difficult.

That's unfortunate, but it is now the law.

The appropriate response for those who want to mitigate the impact of the law is to work to make sure more minority students are prepared to gain admission to the University of Michigan and other schools based on academic merit.

That means an all-out commitment to improve the sorry public schools in Michigan's urban communities.

Michigan's Constitution allows citizens to make laws through the referendum process. The court should hold that constitutional right sacred and not involve itself in undoing the will of the people.

The ACLU's suit, and other legal challenges to Proposal 2, should be tossed.

N.J. Judge Voids City's Gun Control Law (LAW)

By Charles Toutant, New Jersey Law Journal

DOJ_NMG_0107765

New Jersey Law Journal, December 20, 2006

A New Jersey state court judge on Dec. 13 enjoined enforcement of a Jersey City ordinance limiting handgun purchasers to one gun a month.

In a suit that tested the power of cities to write their own laws to curb gun-related violence, Hudson County Assignment Judge Maurice Gallipoli said he doubted the ordinance would achieve that end. And he found it pre-empted by the state's extensive gun-control scheme.

Gallipoli also said the law violated equal protection grounds, deeming it arbitrary, capricious and lacking a rational basis.

Jersey City's lawyer, Thomas Jardim, of Ramsey Berman in Morristown, says he will seek leave to appeal, particularly as to the equal protection holding.

Jersey City was the first municipality in the state to adopt an ordinance limiting gun purchases. Ordinance 06-082, adopted June 13, required purchasers to certify in writing that they had not bought another handgun in the city in the past 30 days. Violators could be fined as much as $500.

In July, suit was filed by Caso's Gun-a-Rama, the only licensed gun dealer in Jersey City, as well as the Association of New Jersey Rifle & Pistol Clubs Inc., which argued the law gave out-of-town gun shops an unfair advantage.

Gallipoli denied the plaintiffs' request for a temporary injunction on July 28 and set the case down for argument on a permanent one. The same day, the judge did allow Jersey City to rewrite the ordinance to address the plaintiffs' argument that it was vague.

Intervening on Jersey City's behalf was the local chapter of Associations of Community Organizations for Reform Now (ACORN), represented by Renée Steinhagen of New Jersey Appleseed Public Interest Law Center and Linda Fisher of the Center for Social Justice at Seton Hall University School of Law.

Defense counsel Jardim argued that the ordinance was a legitimate use of police power because it would restrict the supply of handguns in the city, decrease the possibility of gun trafficking and curb the use of legitimately purchased guns in criminal acts by someone other than the purchaser.

Jardim pointed out that the city this year passed another ordinance, requiring residents to make a report to police when firearms are lost or stolen, and that city council members are contemplating another law that would ban possession of a type of small, inexpensive gun known as a "Saturday Night Special," Jardim says.

In his brief, plaintiffs lawyer Frank Pisano III, of Needleman & Pisano in Montville, claimed that the ordinance violates the state constitutional equal protection clause because it places a restriction on Jersey City's citizens that does not apply to people living elsewhere in the state.

He also argued pre-emption, citing In re Pries, 118 N.J. 564 (1990), in which the state Supreme Court noted the "careful grid of regulatory provisions" in the criminal code about purchase and sale of handguns. Among those provisions is N.J.S.A. 2C:58-3i, which limits handgun purchases to one per permit but allows multiple purchases to someone with more than one permit.

Jardim argued that while the state has exclusive authority over licensing of handguns, N.J.S.A. 40:40-1(18) gives municipalities authority to regulate and prohibit the purchase or sale of firearms. He added that the court left localities the right to gun possession to further health and safety goals in Township of Chester v. Panicucci, 62 N.J. 94 (1973), in which a local law restricting hunting was upheld.

During the oral argument Dec. 13, Gallipoli pointed out to Jardim that the city had no evidence that any guns purchased at Caso's were used in crimes.

After the ruling Jardim said, "I respect the judge's personal opinion but the fact that he didn't think it was a wise piece of legislation is not within his purview. It's the job of the mayor and council."

ACORN lawyer Fisher says Gallipoli wrongly interpreted the court's "careful grid" language in Pries to mean that state legislation intended to have exclusive authority over gun regulation. The state statute, for example, does not address frequency of gun purchases at all. "There's plenty of room in that state statutory scheme for municipalities to fill in the gaps," Fisher says.

Fisher conceded the ordinance will have the effect of sending purchasers to nearby towns in search of guns. "We would be more than happy if Bayonne or Hoboken would enact similar ordinances, but in this business it's one step at a time," she says.

Plaintiffs lawyer Pisano says of the ruling Dec. 13, "I think the court clearly recognized that our Legislature has enacted comprehensive regulations regulating the purchase and sale of firearms and intended to occupy that field exclusively.

"The other message is if you want to address the problem of violent crime, the way not to do it is by restricting law-abiding citizens from lawfully purchasing firearms consistent with state law, which they can do everywhere else in the state."

Jury Finds That New York City Violated Constitutional Rights With Arrest Policy (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 20, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-New York City violated constitutional rights for a few months when the police department introduced a written policy in May 2001 to require those arrested at demonstrations to be locked up overnight rather than issued desk appearance tickets, a jury found.

But the same jury of eight people greatly diminished Monday any potential damages when it rejected a claim that the police department had enforced an unwritten policy to lock up demonstrators for more than two years before it put the policy in writing.

The verdict came after a lawsuit, brought on behalf of some 350 demonstrators, accused the city of starting to lock up all demonstrators it arrested after the 1999 killing of unarmed Guinean immigrant Amadou Diallo, who was struck by 19 of 41 bullets fired by police officers.

The lockups sometimes occurred despite a city policy that had existed in which people charged with misdemeanors are usually given desk appearance tickets, telling them when to show up at court for arraignment.

The overnight lockup in Manhattan is notorious for mixing those charged with all nature of crimes as they await arraignment, making it a particularly unpleasant experience for those unlikely to face any jail time even if they are convicted.

After a three-week trial, the jury found that the city violated the U.S. Constitution's First Amendment right to free speech and assembly as well as the 14th Amendment right to due process when the written policy was put in place on May 1, 2001. The policy was withdrawn on July 13, 2001.

However, the jury concluded that the city did not violate the Constitution between April 7, 1999 and April 30, 2001, when the plaintiffs said the city enforced an unwritten policy to lock up demonstrators.

The verdict left the city claiming victory.

The city's corporation counsel, Michael A. Cardoza, told The Associated Press the city was vindicated against claims that for more than two years there were "winks and nods" as police carried out an unwritten policy to lock up all arrested protesters.

He said the jury had flatly told the plaintiffs they were wrong.

"That's big news," Cardoza said. "The plaintiffs prevailed in part, no question about it, but on the huge overwhelming part of the case the plaintiffs lost."

Jonathan C. Moore, a lawyer for the demonstrators, said the trial was limited to liability so a second trial would have to be conducted to determine damages, unless settlements were reached on behalf of some 30 people who claim to have been improperly arrested during that period.

Moore said he was disappointed that the jury did not conclude that the city violated the rights of those who were arrested between 1999 and 2001.

"It's unfortunate that a lot of plaintiffs will go uncompensated," he said.

During the trial, former police Commissioner Howard Safir testified he did not order that demonstrators be locked up rather than issued summonses after the Diallo shooting.

Earlier in the trial, Louis Anemone, a former police chief, testified for plaintiffs that Safir was so annoyed that celebrities were joining the demonstrations that he ordered the change in policy.

Among those arrested during the demonstrations were the Rev. Jesse Jackson, the Rev. Al Sharpton, former Mayor David Dinkins and several actors including Danny Glover, Susan Sarandon and Timothy Hutton.

UK Report Says Robots Will Have Rights (FT)

Financial Times, December 20, 2006

The next time you beat your keyboard in frustration, think of a day where it may be able to sue you for assault. Within 50 years we might even find ourselves standing next to the next generation of vacuum cleaners in the voting booth.

Far from being extracts from the extreme end of science fiction, the idea that we may one day give sentient machines the kind of rights traditionally reserved for humans is raised in a British government-commissioned report which claims to be an extensive look into the future.

Visions of the status of robots around 2056 have emerged from one of 270 forward-looking papers sponsored by Sir David King, the UK government's chief scientist. The paper covering robots' rights was written by a UK partnership of Outsights, the management consultancy, and Ipsos Mori, the opinion research organisation.

"If we make conscious robots they would want to have rights and they probably should," said Henrik Christensen, director of the Centre of Robotics and Intelligent Machines at the Georgia Institute of Technology.

The idea will not surprise science fiction aficionados. It was widely explored by Dr Isaac Asimov, one of the foremost science fiction writers of the 20th century. He wrote of a society where robots were fully integrated and essential in day-to-day life.

In his system, the 'three laws of robotics' governed machine life. They decreed that robots could not injure humans, must obey orders and protect their own existence – in that order.

Robots and machines are now classed as inanimate objects without rights or duties but if artificial intelligence becomes ubiquitous, the report argues, there may be calls for humans' rights to be extended to them.

It is also logical that such rights are meted out with citizens' duties, including voting, paying tax and compulsory military service.

Mr Christensen said: "Would it be acceptable to kick a robotic dog even though we shouldn't kick a normal one?

"There will be people who can't distinguish that so we need to have ethical rules to make sure we as humans interact with robots in an ethical manner so we do not move our boundaries of what is acceptable."

The Horizon Scan report argues that if 'correctly managed', this new world of robots' rights could lead to increased labour output and greater prosperity.

"If granted full rights, states will be obligated to provide full social benefits to them including income support, housing and possibly robo-healthcare to fix the machines over time," it says.

But it points out that the process has casualties and the first one may be the environment, especially in the areas of energy and waste.

Delta Plans To Stay In The Air Without US Airways Buyout (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

ATLANTA, Dec. 19 -- Delta Air Lines filed a reorganization plan Tuesday that calls for it to emerge from bankruptcy protection next spring as a stand-alone company worth as much as $12 billion, which would be more than the market value of the nation's two biggest carriers combined.

Delta said that under the plan, its unsecured creditors would recover 63 to 80 percent of their allowed claims.

Delta's existing stock would be wiped out under the plan and creditors generally would receive distributions of new Delta common stock to settle their claims.

Delta outlined a five-year business plan and said it would be worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion after it's reorganized.

The high end of the equity value Delta is projecting would be more than the $11.6 billion combined market value of American Airlines and United Airlines.

Delta also said that its board voted to reject US Airways' $8.3 billion hostile takeover bid. "US Airways is the worst of all potential merger partners," Delta chief executive Gerald Grinstein said.

DOJ_NMG_0107768

US Airways said it remained committed to its merger proposal. It said its offer, including $1.65 billion in cost savings it anticipates, provides more value than Delta's plan. The offer included $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock.

Delta Air Lines Rejects US Airways' Hostile Takeover (Update11) (BLOOM)

By Mary Schlangenstein

Bloomberg, December 20, 2006

Dec. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Delta Air Lines Inc. rejected a hostile $8.51 billion merger proposal from US Airways Group Inc. and said it plans to exit bankruptcy on its own with a value of as much as $12 billion.

The US Airways offer is unlikely to receive antitrust approval, is based on flawed economic assumptions and would result in the biggest debt load in the industry, Delta, the third-largest U.S. carrier, said today. US Airways said it will continue to pursue a takeover.

Delta wasn't persuaded by US Airways' argument that a combination creating the world's largest airline would add $1.65 billion in annual savings and new revenue. Executives at Atlanta-based Delta have expressed skepticism about US Airways' offer since it was unveiled Nov. 15.

``It will be extremely difficult for this merger to go forward," James Corridore, an analyst for Standard & Poor's, said in a note. US Airways' ``options are to raise its bid, try and sway creditors, or retract its bid."

Delta filed its five-year business strategy with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York today, 15 months after seeking Chapter 11 protection. The carrier said it will leave bankruptcy in the first half of next year, and forecast net income of about $450 million in 2007 and $1.2 billion in 2010.

US Airways Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker said his company's offer of $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million US Airways shares, coupled with cost savings and new revenue, ``is significantly greater" than the value of Delta's plan to its creditors and future shareholders.

``We remain a disciplined and determined bidder for Delta," Parker said in a statement.

Industry Consolidation

Delta's board unanimously rejected the US Airways offer. The carrier faces pressure to consolidate as rivals consider tie-ups. AirTran Holdings Inc. made a hostile $290 million bid for Midwest Air Group Inc. on Dec. 13, and UAL Corp.'s United Airlines has held talks with Continental Airlines Inc.

Delta's shares fell 10 cents, or 6.8 percent, to $1.37 at 4:01 p.m. New York time in over-the-counter trading. US Airways shares rose $1.70, or 3.1 percent, to $57.50 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Delta's 8.3 percent note due in 2029 rose about 1.5 cents to 67.5 cents on the dollar, according to Trace, the bond-price reporting system of the NASD.

80% Recovery

Delta said its plan would let unsecured creditors recover 63 percent to 80 percent of their claims, and that Blackstone Group, a financial adviser, estimates the airline's value at $9.4 billion to $12 billion. Delta's current shares will be worthless once it leaves bankruptcy.

``Creditors are going to want to put a sharp pencil to both plans," said Robert Mann, a Port Washington, New York-based consultant who works with airlines and unions.

Delta's creditors committee likely will ask the carrier by the end of this week to let US Airways review its finances, Mann said. Such a review, which Delta has rejected, is needed so Tempe, Arizona-based US Airways can firm up parts of its offer.

The financial targets in Delta's plan are reasonable compared with forecasts for its peers, said Robert Barry, a Goldman Sachs Group Inc. analyst in New York.

Concerns about merging workforces ``are real and sizable," while Delta's claims that US Airways' forecast savings are overstated ``seem more dubious," Barry said in a report.

Support from Delta's nine-member creditors committee is vital because it will help set the terms of any plan for Delta to exit bankruptcy. Executives from both carriers met with the panel last week to build support for their strategies.

`Great Progress'

``We've got a very constructive relationship with our committee," Delta Chief Financial Officer Ed Bastian said on a call with reporters. ``They understand the great progress Delta is making."

Delta used its time under court protection to cut labor costs, ground planes and expand more-profitable international routes. The airline said it achieved 85 percent of the $3 billion annual cost-savings goal set when it filed for bankruptcy. It plans $700 million in new savings next year.

Under the plan, Delta said its operating margin would move from a negative 6.9 percent this year to 2.4 percent in 2007 and 10.5 percent by 2010. The cost to fly each seat a mile will fall to 6.73 cents in 2007, down 20 percent from 2004, Bastian said.

By next year, Delta expects to narrow its gap in revenue for each seat flown a mile to 94 percent of the industry average from 86 percent, and to achieve parity in 2008, Bastian said.

International Service

The carrier will continue to beef up international service, increasing capacity 15 percent next year compared with a decline of as much as 4 percent in domestic markets. Total capacity would rise 1 percent to 2 percent in 2007. Annual growth in later years will be 2 percent to 3 percent, Delta said.

Delta said US Airways' plan would result in a ``precariously high" $23 billion in debt for the combined carrier, compared with $10 billion for Delta independently. It would be a ``prescription for disaster," Chief Executive Officer Gerald Grinstein said.

Delta said it hasn't had any merger talks with other airlines since US Airways' offer was made public Nov. 15 following Delta's rejection of earlier, private overtures.

Other Bidders?

Other airlines, including UAL, may bid for Delta now that details of its plan are known, according to Barry, the Goldman analyst, and Philip Baggaley, a New York-based S&P analyst.

Delta was saddled with more than $28 billion in debt when it sought bankruptcy protection. It blamed growing low-cost competition, increased fuel costs and a drop in travel following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Northwest Airlines Corp. filed on the same day, in the same court, citing the same problems.

US Airways came out of bankruptcy last year for a second time when it merged with America West Holdings Corp. US Airways is now the seventh-largest U.S. airline.

``US Airways was literally on the brink of liquidation" when it agreed to merge with America West, said Jim Whitehurst, Delta's chief operating officer. ``Our cash position is strong, our financial position is strong. This situation is very different than when America West acquired US Airways."

The case is In re Delta Air Lines Inc., 05-17923, U.S. Bankruptcy Court, Southern District of New York (Manhattan).

Merger Criticized As Push Toward Monopoly (CO)

By Steve Harrison

The Charlotte Observer, December 20, 2006

Delta Air Lines attacked all facets of the US Airways' plan for a merged airline Tuesday, but its sharpest criticism is that the "new Delta" would be anti-competitive.

"If you asked us who is our major competitor, we would say US Airways," said Delta chief executive Gerald Grinstein said. "(This deal) may sound good to a monopolist."

A merged Delta and US Airways would create the nation's biggest airline and would dominate the East Coast, with hubs in Atlanta, Charlotte, Philadelphia and New York's Kennedy Airport. It also would have significant operations at New York's LaGuardia Airport, Reagan National in Washington, and Boston Logan.

"It appears, at the end of the day, this is more than likely to be blocked," said New York City attorney Jim Weiss, a partner in Preston Gates & Ellis LLP who is on retainer to Delta. Weiss spoke during a conference call with analysts and reporters Tuesday.

Creditors will vote in February or March on whether to approve Delta's Chapter 11 reorganization plan or to accept US Airways' offer. In its sales pitch to creditors, Delta warns that any merger would be scrutinized for at least a year, and would likely be turned down by the Justice Department. That would delay the creditors being compensated in the deal.

Since launching the takeover bid Nov. 15, US Airways has insisted the deal would get antitrust approval so long as it sold one of its Northeastern shuttles. It also said the deal would go through because of the growth of low-cost carriers this decade, with AirTran operating a major hub in Atlanta and JetBlue operating one at New York Kennedy.

Weiss noted that the new airline would still have roughly 50 percent of the market at LaGuardia and Reagan National, even after selling a shuttle. He said there would be nearly 2,000 city pairs -- many in the Southeast -- where the new airline would carry 90 percent or more of all passengers. Delta said that in about half of those cities Delta today has less than a 50 percent share. And it showed in a PowerPoint presentation the geographic proximity of the two airline's hubs, predicting that the new airline would cut service in cities such as Charlotte and Pittsburgh.

Grinstein noted that low-cost carriers wouldn't go to small cities such as Florence, S.C.

Goldman Sachs analysts wrote Tuesday they believe US Airways would "go to great lengths" to assuage Department of Justice concerns.

Delta has launched a new Web site -- www.keepdeltamydelta.org -- that highlights cities that could be impacted by the merger.

Delta Shuns Bid, Prefers To Fly Solo (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, December 20, 2006

US Airways' pursuit of Delta Air Lines took on a more hostile tone after Delta formally rejected its advances Tuesday and announced its intention to emerge from bankruptcy as an independent airline.

Delta said that as an independent, it would be worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion when it exits Chapter 11 protection next spring. US Airways' unsolicited cash-and-stock bid was worth $8.4 billion at US Airways' closing price Tuesday.

CEO Gerald Grinstein said Delta believes an independent airline offers investors and creditors greater value and certainty of success than US Airways' proposal.

US Airways would not say Tuesday whether it will sweeten its offer but said it remains a "determined bidder" for the USA's third-biggest carrier. Spokeswoman Andrea Rader said US Airways had hoped to work cooperatively on a merger with Delta.

A merger with US Airways, the seventh-biggest U.S. carrier, would create the biggest domestic airline by passenger capacity, passing American Airlines.

US Airways says it will press its offer with Delta's creditors committee, which has taken no official stand. The committee could pressure management to open its books to US Airways and ask the bankruptcy judge to consider the merger. But so far, the committee has worked with Delta, which says the stand-alone plan would give creditors a stock payout worth 63% to 80% of their claims.

US Airways is offering $4 billion cash and 78 million shares of its stock. It says a merger would save the combined airline $1.6 billion a year. Delta questions those savings.

And Delta's Grinstein says a sweetened US Airways offer would not overcome antitrust and other obstacles. Delta CFO Ed Bastian says a merger would leave the new airline with $23 billion in debt, about double what Delta would have as an independent.

Goldman Sachs analyst Robert Barry says another option for Delta would be a bid from United Airlines, because route networks and corporate cultures would be a good fit. But analyst Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities says he doubts more offers will come until the Justice Department gives some indication of how it views the burgeoning number of airline mergers.

Last week, AirTran made an unsolicited bid for Midwest Airlines. And United is said to be in early merger talks with Continental.

Delta forecast a 2006 loss of $350 million excluding bankruptcy charges. Next year it expects net income of $450 million, rising to about $1.2 billion by 2010. Delta said $700 million in cost cuts will take effect next year, including termination of its pilots' pension plan.

Delta Lawyer: US Airways Merger Has 'antitrust Issues' (PITTBIZ)

Pittsburgh Business Times, December 19, 2006

Delta Chairman and CEO Jerry Grinstein continued his offensive against US Airways' hostile takeover bid in a conference call with analysts Tuesday, saying that the merger would create too much of a monopoly in too many markets.

"If the suggestion is that we're going to put a for sale sign on Delta airlines, we're just not going to do that," Grinstein said.

But "if the process of consolidation starts, you do not want to be left out," he added, explaining that all airlines are keeping tabs on each other.

And he touted "the huge amount of value" that has been created at Delta during the Atlanta-based airline's bankruptcy proceedings, essentially pointing to US Airways' $8.7 billion bid as being less than the up to $12 billion in value that Delta believes it is worth. Delta earlier on Thursday filed its standalone plan to emerge from bankruptcy and reported its board of directors unanimously rejected US Airways' takeover bid.

"I hope we'd be an acquirer rather than an aquiree," Grinstein said.

Delta's chief antitrust lawyer added that he doesn't believe the U.S. Department of Justice will approve a merger between Delta Air Lines Inc. (Pink Sheets: DALRQ) and Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways Group Inc. (NYSE: LCC), Pittsburgh International Airport's leading carrier.

"It appears from a factual standpoint, this is a merger that clearly has a lot of antitrust issues attached to it," said Jim Weiss, a Washington partner in the law firm Preston Gates & Ellis LLP, which recently merged with Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham, a Pittsburgh law firm. "The antitrust risk here is quite high."

Weiss, the former head of the DOJ's antitrust division and a hired gun for Delta since 1988, said he believes it would take the department about a year to review US Airways' hostile bid for Delta.

That's because the DOJ will anticipate more merger proposals and would want to go over the Delta/US Airways merger with a fine-toothed comb.

In a detailed PowerPoint presentation available on Delta's Web site, Weiss showed why he believes the Delta/US Airways combination wouldn't pass muster. Chiefly, he said, a lot of small to midsized American cities would lose competition if the two airlines merged. The combined airline would be the largest carrier in 127 small communities.

And Weiss contends that low cost carriers don't usually go into really small cities, so the competition isn't likely to be replaced.

Other proof he offered for his position: the DOJ rejected a US Airways/United merger after a 14-month investigation. And that merger had even fewer overlapping routes and hubs, Weiss said.

Meanwhile, US Airways continued its public campaign for Delta. The airline sent out a statement from Chairman and CEO Doug Parker saying, "Combining US Airways and Delta will create at least $1.65 billion in annual synergies beyond the value that could be created by any standalone plan. These synergies come on top of the certainty of $4 billion in cash and the upside potential of 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock."

But Grinstein said in the conference call that he expects Delta would be $8 billion in debt when it emerges from bankruptcy. By contrast, he said, a US Airways/Delta merger would be saddled with $23 billion in debt. If that sounds familiar, he quipped, that was the amount of debt Delta had when it filed for Chapter 11 in 2005.

Delta: US Air Deal Would Hike Fares (CNN)

By Chris Isidore

CNN Money, December 20, 2006

NEW YORK (CNNMoney.com) -- Delta Air Lines formally rejected the hostile bid from US Airways Group early Tuesday, saying regulators are unlikely to approve the combination because of the risk of higher airfares and that its creditors will get more if it stays independent.

The move is not a surprise. Since US Air made its $8.4 billion stock and cash bid for Delta on Nov. 15, Delta management has stated that it intends to emerge from bankruptcy as an independent carrier. But the statements Tuesday make the airline's strongest case against the combination of No. 3 Delta and No. 7 US Air.

Executives at Delta Air Lines (tail in front) say a combination with US Airways (tail in rear) would be blocked by regulators because it would hike fares in many East Coast markets.

DOJ_NMG_0107772

In a call with investors, Delta CEO Jerry Grinstein said US Airways is Delta's primary competitor on the East Coast, and a deal with it would be the one least likely to be approved because of the impact on fares.

"Combining the carriers necessarily reduces competition, which may sound good to a monopolist but a regulator would not like it all," he said.

US Airways quickly responded that it is not dropping its bid for Delta, despite the formal rejection by the Delta board.

"We remain a determined, disciplined bidder and are confident the offer we made presents the greatest value for all our stakeholders," said a statement by spokeswoman Valerie Wunder.

If airline mergers fly, fares could follow

Delta said there are 2,000 routes where a combined US Airways and Delta would control 90 percent of the flights, which the company argues would prevent U.S. antitrust regulators from agreeing to the deal.

"Delta believes consumers have valid reason for concern, as pricing has gone up, not down, on approximately 6,600 US Airways routes following its merger with America West," said Delta's statement.

US Airways executives have insisted that fares did not rise after the former America West bought US Airways' assets out of bankruptcy in September 2005, arguing that cost savings from the combined operations allowed it to keep fares low.

Fares up

But filings by US Airways Group (down $0.23 to $55.57, Charts) as well as the two predecessor carriers that combined in late September 2005, America West and US Airways Inc., suggest that the combined carrier has seen a rise in the revenue per passenger mile, a closely watched measure known as yield that approximates average fares.

US Airways Group's yield in the third quarter is up 10.4 percent compared to the average of the two predecessor carriers a year earlier. Over the first three quarters of 2006 the average yield is up 14 percent. Both are higher than the average gain in industrywide yields reported by the Air Transport Association, the industry trade group.

7 amazing travel secrets revealed

Grinstein rejected the idea of continuing talks with US Air, making some of its financial information available in order to see if US Air would be willing to raise its bid, while Delta management continued to move toward emerging from bankruptcy as an independent carrier.

"Remember this is a hostile proposal, not a solicited one," he said. "When you get into exchanging information with your largest competitor, you've got issues. The Justice Department has already indicated they did not want us to do so without some clearance from them."

S&P airline equity analyst Jim Corridore doesn't think the regulatory hurdles are as clear cut as presented by Delta management, but he agrees that in some smaller markets the merger would result in higher fares.

"I don't think that it's a regulatory non-starter, but there are significant hurdles that have to be cleared," he said. "I believe there is a case to be made that these hurdles can be overcome."

Tuesday's statement from Delta says that its financial adviser, the Blackstone Group, estimates that Delta will be worth about $9.4 billion to $12 billion when it emerges from bankruptcy.

US Air is offering $4 billion in cash and stock now worth about $4.4 billion to Delta creditors.

While Delta is not offering cash to creditors at this point of the discussions, Grinstein insisted that the Delta plan still is less risky for creditors since it doesn't face the regulatory hurdles that a merger with US Air would face, and it would allow Delta to emerge from bankruptcy sooner.

S&P's Corridore said he believes the U.S. Air offer is the better deal for Delta creditors. But he said he now doubts that the merger will take place.

"It will be very difficult for the deal to go forward in the face of the opposition from Delta management and directors," he said. "The Delta pilots are also a constituent that you have to convince, and US Air hasn't been able to do that."

But Joseph Capobianco, a Long Island, N.Y.-based merger & acquisition attorney, said he believes it's easier for a hostile bidder to convince creditors to accept a deal than it is to convince shareholders of a non-bankrupt company. So he thinks that US Air still has good chance to get Delta.

"I think US Airways will increase their offer," he said. "I don't think the fat lady has sung."

DOJ_NMG_0107773

US Air's Wunder would not comment when asked about reports that the company was considering an increased bid.

Spring emergence

Delta said it is on track to emerge from bankruptcy next spring but said that emergence would be delayed until 2008 if the merger went forward. The company filed its reorganization plan, which it said would result in a recovery for Delta's unsecured creditors of approximately 63 to 80 percent of their allowed claims through equity in the reorganized company.

Delta also argued a combined US Air-Delta would have $23 billion in total debt, compared with about $10 billion in total debt for a stand-alone Delta.

"In our industry, as all of us know, that [heavy debt] is a prescription for disaster," said Grinstein.

And Grinstein insisted the Delta contract with the Air Line Pilots Association prohibits the 10 percent cut in capacity at a combined Delta-US Air that the US Air executives plan to make as part of the merger.

"There are significant labor issues that can not be blinked away," he said. "The pilots have said that Delta is not for sale."

US Air's Wunder would not comment on the specifics of Delta's statement other than to repeat the prepared remark reiterating the bid.

The bid from US Air for Delta last month set off speculation that it could bring a round of mergers in the industry. Last week there were reports that United Airlines' parent UAL Corp. (Charts) was in preliminary talks with Continental Airlines (Charts) on a potential merger. And even smaller carriers could get involved, as AirTran (Charts) announced an unsolicited bid for Midwest Express (Charts).

Grinstein told investors that if some of the other deals come to pass, Delta may have to reassess its go-alone strategy. But he repeated that he believes an independent Delta is the best strategy, no matter what negotiations are taking place.

"They may be in conversation, but we haven't seen any fruit of that yet," he said. "What history has shown us about airline mergers is they're difficult to do."

If airline mergers fly, fares could follow

US Airways Still Chasing Delta Despite Its Rejection (PPG)

By Dan Fitzpatrick, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 20, 2006

US Airways is refusing to back off its $8.4 billion takeover bid for Delta Air Lines despite an official rejection from Delta's board and a pledge that Delta will emerge from bankruptcy next year as a stand-alone company worth as much as $12 billion.

"We remain a disciplined and determined bidder for Delta," US Airways Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker said yesterday after Delta's board released its reorganization plan that eschewed US Airways' advances.

The back-and-forth drama pitting the nation's third-largest carrier against the fifth-largest, US Airways, and its 45-year-old CEO now turns to Delta's creditors, who will have to decide early next year between the two competing plans for Delta's emergence from Chapter 11 bankruptcy.

It "is quite exciting," said longtime Virginia airline consultant Darryl Jenkins.

"Certainly, Parker is not going to give up. Parker is a very driven young man" and "not one that shirks from a fight," Mr. Jenkins said. By the same token, Delta Chief Executive Officer Gerald Grinstein, 74, is "a tough old bird. ... He is not going to let some young snot-nose tell him what to do with his airline."

The outcome of the takeover battle is being watched closely in the Pittsburgh area, where Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways still employs 2,275 employees and serves 146 daily flights from Pittsburgh International Airport. Its presence, though, is down significantly from five years ago, prior to the 9/11 attacks, when it employed more than 12,000 locally and offered more than 500 daily flights.

Atlanta-based Delta, which filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in 2005, filed its reorganization plan yesterday in New York and disclosed for the first time that its board had unanimously rejected US Airways' merger proposal. The five-year strategy outlined in the airline's plan predicts that an independent Delta would be valued at $9.4 billion to $12 billion while earning a profit of $456 million in 2007 and $1.2 billion in 2010.

DOJ_NMG_0107774

Delta's Grinstein argued in a conference call that US Airways' bid, based on "flawed economic assumptions," would never clear antitrust concerns and that it would saddle the combined company with too much debt and too many unsolved labor issues.

"A prescription for disaster," Mr. Grinstein said, in the conference call. "US Airways is the worst of all potential merger partners."

Mr. Grinstein didn't completely dismiss the idea of a merger with a company other than US Airways, saying later that Delta would review any other bids. But he said Delta would not put out a "for sale" sign.

Delta's chief financial officer, Ed Bastian, said in the conference call that Delta so far has not received any other offers.

Mr. Parker, who launched his takeover attempt Nov. 15 after being rebuffed twice by phone and letter, said "we have always expected that Delta would submit a stand-alone plan" and noted that Delta's creditors now have a "benchmark against which to evaluate the competing proposals and we welcome that comparison. This is an important step in a process that we believe will result in the merger of US Airways and Delta."

The US Airways CEO maintains a merger would provide at least $1.65 billion in cost savings and new revenue "beyond the value that could be created by any standalone plan." Delta creditors would also receive $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock, which closed yesterday at $57.50, up $1.70, or 3 percent.

Delta's reorganization plan, on the other hand, would allow creditors to get back 63 percent to 80 percent of what they are owed.

Both airlines have been lobbying the creditors committee, hoping to win support. The committee will now review both plans and is expected to make a decision early next year.

"We recognize and appreciate the creditors' ultimate authority in this process," Mr. Parker said.

Some experts expect US Airways to raise its bid, but Mr. Parker did not address that possibility yesterday.

"I assume over time that bid will be upped," said Mr. Jenkins, the airline consultant.

Whether the creditors go for US Airways or Delta depends on "what your time preference is. One [US Airways] is more money now and one [Delta] is more money later. Everybody is playing their cards."

Delta CEO: Airline Would Look At Any Other Proposal (DOWJONES)

By Terry Kosdrosky

Dow Jones Newswires, December 19, 2006

The Chief Executive of Delta Air Lines Inc. (DALRQ) said Tuesday that US Airways Group Inc.'s merger proposal raises unique antitrust concerns. He added that Delta would "look at" any other proposal.

Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein said during a conference call that the US Airways proposal has some "some very unusual antitrust aspects to it." He noted that his concerns about antitrust issues apply to the bid from US Airways only and don't reflect the company's views on any other combination. Grinstein also said Delta realizes its fiduciary duty to creditors and other stakeholders, noting that the company would look at any other proposal that comes up.

Delta, which has been operating under bankruptcy protection since September 2005, on Tuesday filed a reorganization plan and formally rejected the $8.4 billion merger offer from US Airways, which was first announced last month.

Jim Weiss, an attorney at Preston Gates & Ellis LLP who did an antitrust analysis for Delta on the US Airways proposal, said on the conference call that the risk of rejection on antitrust concerns is quite high.

The review process would take at least a year and the US Airways/Delta proposal would be more anticompetitive than the attempted US Airways-United Airlines merger rejected by the Department of Justice years ago. United is a unit of UAL Corp. (UAUA).

Weiss said the department's conservative view on airline matters hasn't changed much.

Sector Snap: Airline Shares Dip (AP)

AP, December 20, 2006

Airline Shares Slip As Delta Rejects US Airways' Buyout Bid

NEW YORK (AP) -- Airline shares slipped in Tuesday trading, after Delta Air Lines Inc. rejected a buyout bid by US Airways Group Inc.

The overall Amex Airline Index fell 1 percent, with all 11 of its component stocks marking declines. Many of the index's percentage swings were slight, less than 1 percent.

The declines came amid easing crude oil prices, which dropped 29 cents to $61.92 per barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Falling oil prices typically strengthen airline shares, as jet fuel is among the industry's top costs.

When Delta filed a reorganization plan Tuesday with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court overseeing its Chapter 11 proceedings, the company said it wanted to remain a standalone carrier. Delta also said it plans to wipe out its existing stock under the plan.

Among the obstacles Delta said it foresaw for a possible deal with US Airways was federal antitrust scrutiny and labor issues. Investors have long been waiting for consolidation in the industry, which analysts say could help boost carriers' pricing power and profits.

Delta shares fell 8 cents, or 5.4 percent, to $1.39 in over-the-counter trading outside the index.

US Airways shares, meanwhile, slipped 32 cents to $55.56 on the New York Stock Exchange, also outside the index.

The index's biggest percentage decliner was AirTran Holdings Inc., whose shares fell 32 cents, or 2.5 percent, to $12.34 on the NYSE.

A Holiday Travel Wish List (USAT)

USA Today, December 20, 2006

This time of the year means two things: Many of us are thinking about what we'd like to receive. And travel is more of a hassle than ever.

For those of us who will be on the road, it's a good time to think about the measures — even the small ones — that could make our journeys easier. According to AAA, nearly 65 million Americans will be traveling more than 50 miles from home this holiday season, an increase over last year and a sure sign that airports, highways, train stations and bus depots will be packed in the coming weeks.

So whether you're traveling for Christmas, Hanukkah, Kwanzaa or New Year's, what follows is a holiday wish list of modest suggestions for making all of our trips a little easier.

For the Airlines:

Please, please, please, don't allow cellphones in flight.

Several firms have been tweaking the technology to allow for the safe transmission of cellular calls while airborne. Both the Federal Aviation Administration and Federal Communications Commission are said to be considering changes to the long-term ban, but ultimately it will be up to each airline to set its own policy. To which most of the flying public can only say: "Don't!"

Record load factors have made commercial flights more crowded than ever and the security "travel hassle" factor has made passengers more testy than ever. Think air rage is bad now? Try flying from coast to coast next to a loud talker. Or wait until you take a red-eye beside someone breaking up with an unfaithful partner. Such scenarios are why some business travel advocates are leading the move toward "Tapping-Not Talking" technology, so that passengers can stay in touch via real-time text messaging, not voice communication.

Technology is good. Employing it wisely is even better.

For hotels:

Implement an all-hands-on-deck policy at peak times.

My friend Andy recently told me about arriving at a hotel with his wife and three young children, and waiting in a long line as one employee checked in all of the guests. Meanwhile, two other employees stood by, apparently just watching. Were they in training? Not qualified? Who knows? But we've all had this experience and it's harder to accept at a four-star hotel than at a grocery store. So if warm bodies are available at busy times, please put them to work.

For the car rental companies:

Guarantee child safety seats.

DOJ_NMG_0107776

A few months ago, I noted how some car rental firms state that optional equipment — such as child safety seats — "may" be available at "many" or "most" locations (Read column). On such a critical issue, mushy language is not acceptable. All car rental firms should guarantee such seats in advance. Then if one is not available, parents can make alternative plans before it's too late.

For cruise lines:

Clarify tipping at sea.

For years, veteran cruisers understood the onboard rules and brought along enough cash to provide gratuities before disembarking. Now some cruise lines provide automatic payment systems, some lines prohibit tipping, and other lines allow it under certain conditions. Each program may have its benefits, but readers say they're confused. When such policies are not clear, cruise lines need to clarify these issues prior to booking.

For the travel websites:

List all competitive products fairly.

After years of analyzing travel websites for Consumer Reports WebWatch, it's amazing to me that some travel sites still segregate their listings according to the marketing agreements they've signed with travel suppliers, such as airlines, hotel chains and car rental firms. You shouldn't need to input extra keystrokes and view fresh pages to see all of the viable choices for a given booking. Better transparency will benefit an even more important constituency: customers.

For the Transportation Security Administration:

Please think through new policies.

Yes, I know that the TSA has the Herculean task of securing our airports and airlines. But whatever goodwill was built up after 9/11 has long since eroded as new policies, procedures and guidelines have been introduced, revamped, rescinded and even brought back. Shoes off. Shoes on. No to liquids. Yes to liquids. Maybe to liquids. We all understand the importance of making air travel safer, but many are wondering how the TSA's ever-changing rules are contributing to that goal.

For the U.S. Department of Transportation:

Update the flight delays rule.

If you'd like to know the on-time history of the domestic flight you're booking, you can call a travel agent or the airline's reservations department and they're required to tell you. That's the good news. The bad news is that this DOT rule went into effect prior to the launch of the Internet, so online providers are not required to tell you the same information. A simple tweak of this regulation would force airline and travel agency websites to provide you with the same delay records you get through off-line bookings.

For the U.S. Department of Justice:

Don't rubber-stamp airline mergers.

It's been shown time and again: What investors call "consolidation" is a nice word for worse service and more unemployment. With the ink not even dry on US Airways' marriage with America West, that carrier already is considering a hostile takeover of Delta. This has promptly led to merger talks between Continental and United, while AirTran (formerly ValuJet) says it wants to initiate a hostile takeover of Midwest Airlines.

For passengers, a dwindling number of carriers will mean higher prices, fewer flights and a decline in service (yes, it's possible for service to decline further). For employees, it means even more lay-offs in an industry still reeling from lost jobs. The DOJ should look long and hard before blessing any of these deals that essentially benefit no one but a handful of senior executives — and, of course, their attorneys.

For all Americans (not just those who travel):

Let's discuss the automated targeting system (ATS).

As reported last month, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) has been using ATS to monitor travel records, motor vehicle records and even airline meal preferences, all in the name of security. "Without notifying the public, federal agents for the past four years have assigned millions of international travelers, including Americans, computer-generated scores rating the risk they pose of being terrorists or criminals," the Associated Press reported.

DOJ_NMG_0107777

Unfortunately, we're not allowed to view these assessments, let alone challenge them, even though the government intends to maintain them for 40 years. That's why the European Union recently asked for further clarification about ATS. In fact, we all should. Want to learn more? You'll have to dig, but you can find it on the DHS site (PDF file).

ATS is not the first initiative of this kind proposed by the DHS and its subsidiary, the TSA. The ill-fated Computer Assisted Passenger Prescreening System (CAPPS II) generated criticism from organizations as diverse as the American Civil Liberties Union and the Christian Coalition.

After I wrote about that program in this space in 2004, a reader's response eloquently invoked Benjamin Franklin: "They that can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety." At what point, exactly, do we finally stand up as a nation and declare that the freedoms we've sacrificed in the name of security have altered the very concept of what it means to be an American? At what point do we say that government agencies (and even worse, their outsourced private-sector partners) do not have complete freedom to track each and every one of us? At what point do we simply say that enough is enough?

Preserving the personal rights that make this country a beacon of freedom—how's that for a holiday wish? In the meantime, travel safely. I look forward to hearing from you in 2007.

Owner Of Small Coffee Shop Takes On Java Titan Starbucks (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, December 20, 2006

After coffeehouse owner Penny Stafford sued Starbucks in September, she says she was stunned by hostile and anonymous telephone calls and e-mails. Drop your lawsuit, she was warned. How dare you attack Starbucks?

"It's as if I had insulted apple pie and America," says Stafford, owner of the Belvi Coffee and Tea Exchange in Bellevue, Wash.

In the closely watched federal lawsuit in Seattle that alleges nationwide antitrust violations, Stafford's attorneys portray Starbucks as a predatory monopoly crushing her and other small coffee sellers.

The lawsuit charges that Starbucks illegally maintains its monopoly by barring other coffeehouses from prime downtown high-rises in Seattle and Bellevue through exclusive leases with property owners.

Starbucks also drove Stafford and other coffeehouses out of business by buying coffee sellers and flooding neighborhoods with new Starbucks stores that even cannibalized the sales of existing Starbucks shops, the lawsuit alleges.

"This is wrong, period," Stafford says. "I'm not willing to leave the specialty coffee business because of Starbucks shutting me or anyone else down."

Starbucks spokeswoman Sanja Gould says, "Starbucks denies that we have done anything improper, and we intend to rightfully defend ourselves. As Starbucks has grown, so has the industry, all of which benefits coffee consumers and the competitors of Starbucks."

In a court filing, attorney Thomas Boeder of the Perkins Coie law firm writes: "Starbucks is committed to conducting business in a respectful, ethical and responsible manner in the communities it serves."

While it's early, antitrust experts say the lawsuit could clarify a murky area of the law by defining what a monopoly might be — and what business conduct by a monopoly might be illegal.

The Starbucks case comes amid what Boston attorneys Thane Scott and Veronica Abreu call "antitrust's second golden age." Attorneys are heatedly debating what monopoly practices are predatory. Regulators are weighing whether antitrust law should be upgraded in the new global economy, just as the law was shaped in the early 20th-century industrial economy. And antitrust civil lawsuits are on the rise, reports Competition Law 360, a legal publication.

DOJ_NMG_0107778

The lawsuit also increases the controversy around fast-growing Starbucks, the target of a vocal backlash in recent years from neighborhood and anti-globalization activists and some consumers.

Stafford's lawsuit seeks class-action status. So far, dozens of coffee sellers in Washington, California, Illinois and other states report similar problems with the coffee behemoth, says Stafford's attorney, Steve Berman of Hagens Berman Sobol Shapiro in Seattle. If a federal judge finds that Starbucks is a monopoly that violates the antitrust Sherman Act, his ruling would apply to all Starbucks in the USA, Berman says.

A monopoly itself isn't illegal. But a monopoly cannot willfully acquire or maintain power through predatory acts, such as blocking rivals from a market. Nor can it limit consumers' choices, courts have ruled.

That's why lawyers are eyeing the Starbucks suit, plus a recently argued Supreme Court case in which Ross-Simmons Hardware Lumber accused Weyerhaeuser of pricing rivals out of the market. The cases raise a long-running legal question: What practices by a monopoly are predatory and anti-competitive?

Attorneys say there's no single legal test. Judges offer conflicting guidance, from the Supreme Court's landmark 1911 Standard Oil ruling to a lower court's settlement approval in the vast Microsoft case in 2001.

In antitrust cases such as Starbucks, plaintiffs face long odds, says Stephen Calkins, a Wayne State University law professor and former Federal Trade Commission general counsel. They must show that a firm is a monopoly, then prove that it abuses its power.

Courts typically require plaintiffs to show that a business has more than 40% market share before it might be deemed a monopoly, says Dionne Lomax, a partner at Vinson & Elkins and a former Justice Department attorney.

Already, Starbucks and Belvi are trying to define market share. Belvi Coffee says Starbucks monopolizes 73% of the market for gourmet coffee and espresso drinks in coffeehouses, while Starbucks says it represents "7% of all coffee consumption in the U.S."

If the lawsuit is not dismissed, the ensuing debate in court could raise other crucial antitrust issues:

•Market definition. How should a monopoly and its "market" be defined? By range or type of products sold? By business region? Or, as alleged in the Starbucks lawsuit, by access to leased high-rise space — a narrow, hard-to-prove definition, says law professor Andrew Chin at the University of North Carolina.

•Exclusionary conduct. Are Starbucks' leases with landlords exclusionary vehicles that bar other coffee sellers from the market?

•"No economic sense" test. When does a monopoly cross the line from tough, competitive practices to illegal actions that make no economic sense and serve only to wipe out rivals?

"Courts are all over the map" on issues, says Mark Popofsky, a partner at Kaye Scholer and former Justice Department senior counsel on the Microsoft case.

Starbucks is widely admired by Wall Street and other businesses as a well-run corporation, a mighty marketing machine and, until recently, a highflying stock.

Since its first store opened in 1971 in Seattle, Starbucks has grown to 12,400 outlets worldwide, 115,000 employees and $7.8 billion in revenue in fiscal 2006. The chain hopes to expand to 40,000 outlets, cafes and kiosks worldwide.

Starbucks also has been praised for its social and environmental acts, from donating millions of dollars to charities, to promoting "fair trade" export practices with Third World coffee bean producers.

But Stafford's lawsuit symbolizes the distaste that critics have toward Starbucks. Few retail chains have been the target of such a long-brewing backlash from neighborhood activists, anti-globalization protesters, labor organizers and some consumers and small-business owners. Starbucks has been accused of being a corporate bully whose tactics hurt small businesses, erode the character of local communities and exploit the coffee bean economies of Third World countries.

Starbucks' vast size and "aggressive real estate grabs" clearly alienate some people, says Bryant Simon, a Temple University historian and author of Consuming Starbucks, to be published in 2008.

"By being everywhere, they create markets," Simon says. "But they also narrow the markets and limit opportunities for companies."

DOJ_NMG_0107779

The $11 billion U.S. market for specialty coffee keeps growing, with about 23,000 coffeehouses, reports the Specialty Coffee Association of America trade group. Spokesman Mike Ferguson says sales won't peak "until there's an espresso bar in every neighborhood."

Starbucks dominates with a 73% market share of U.S. coffeehouse sales in 2005, says Mintel, a global consumer research firm in Chicago. The coffee king faces scant competition from Caribou Coffee and Peet's Coffee and Tea, its closest rivals.

But Starbucks commands only 43% of the gourmet coffee market if Dunkin' Donuts (27%), Krispy Kreme (5%) and Tim Hortons (2%) are included, says Mintel.

Marcia Mogelonsky, an industry analyst at Mintel, says coffeehouses with loyal customers and strong business strategies "can co-exist with Starbucks." But, she adds, "There's no denying that Starbucks can easily put a lot of independents out of business."

Owners of small coffeehouses describe Starbucks' impact as "a double-edged sword." They praise it for launching a mass market for specialty coffee and espresso drinks and educating consumers. Starbucks brings consumers to shopping districts, and paves the way for "independent coffeehouses to come in, find a niche and provide higher-quality products," says Joe Mancuso of Caffe D'arte, a Seattle roaster.

Mike Sheldrake, owner of Polly's Gourmet Coffee, says he nearly closed his store in the late 1990s, after two Starbucks opened near him in Long Beach. But Sheldrake retrained his staff, painted his store and added more coffee beans, pastries and other items.

"We understood the battle is never over," says Sheldrake, whose coffeehouse is healthy again with $1 million in annual sales.

But some coffee sellers still lose customers to Starbucks — especially in areas saturated with Starbucks outlets, according to Stafford's lawsuit and a dozen coffeehouse owners interviewed by USA TODAY.

When coffeehouses find their leases up for renewal, some must close or relocate after Starbucks pays property owners two or three times the fair market rental price, say Stafford and other coffee sellers. Stafford, Mancuso and other small coffee sellers also are troubled by Starbucks' exclusive lease deals with landlords.

"Unfortunately, it happens so much here, it's common knowledge," Mancuso says.

These coffee sellers have lost to Starbucks:

•Boston Coffee Exchange. For 25 years, Mort and Bonnie Glovin have run this popular coffee stand in the historic South Station train terminal in Boston.

But the Glovins were stunned when the terminal's property manager, Equity Office Properties, would not renew their lease, which expires Jan. 31. The new tenant? Starbucks, says Mort Glovin.

The Glovins printed T-shirts that read "Don't Throw Us in the Grinder." Two thousand customers signed a petition urging that the coffee stand be allowed to stay. Even Boston Mayor Tom Menino wrote EOP, urging the firm to renew the lease.

"Little guys like us mean nothing," says Mort Glovin, 72, a former food-service manager.

•Reality Coffee. Fifteen years ago, Renee Kappes spent long days selling coffee from a tiny cart in Bellevue. Her hard work paid off. Soon, she owned two thriving Seattle's Best Coffee franchises in Kirkland, Wash., a popular waterfront village.

But after SBC was bought by Starbucks in 2003, Kappes and Starbucks disagreed about the operations and sale of her shops. Kappes says she had a buyer for $500,000. Starbucks offered her half that price, she says. Kappes rejected the offer, and Starbucks signed new leases with property owners. Before her leases ended, Kappes renamed her business Reality Coffee.

"It's just not right, but Starbucks can get away with it," says Kappes.

•Deaf Dog Coffee. Former banker Ron Salisbury moved to Petaluma, north of San Francisco, to start his own coffeehouse in 1994. Deaf Dog Coffee became a hit, and Salisbury opened five local outlets.

Then Starbucks opened six nearby stores and kiosks. Deaf Dog Coffee's $1 million in annual sales dropped 25%. Salisbury sold new drinks, cut costs and made bumper stickers that read "Friends Don't Let Friends Go To Starbucks."

It wasn't enough. Deaf Dog Coffee was hurt even more by downtown construction and winter flooding. Salisbury, 63, couldn't meet his loan and rent payments, and he recently filed for bankruptcy. "Starbucks has left a lot of bodies in their wake," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0107780

Penny Stafford, believed to be the first small coffee seller to sue Starbucks on federal antitrust grounds, says she won't cave in. A former commercial real estate agent and mortgage broker, she decided in 2003 to pursue her dream of starting a coffeehouse.

For two years, she hunted for "Class A" retail space in busy high-rises in Seattle and Bellevue. But agents steered her to less desirable sites, according to her lawsuit. When she asked to see better spaces, the agents refused, saying Starbucks had locked up the sites.

"That's when I realized I had a zero chance of getting into one of these locations," Stafford says.

According to the lawsuit, agents told Stafford that Starbucks had signed nationwide exclusive leases with Equity Office Properties and other real estate investment trusts that owned commercial buildings.

Under the leases, the landlords cannot rent to other gourmet coffee sellers, the lawsuit alleges. The agreements also bar landlords from renewing the leases of existing coffee sellers, the lawsuit alleges.

In exchange for exclusivity, Starbucks paid property owners higher-than-market rates, the lawsuit alleges.

Retail tenants typically have "exclusive-use clauses" in their leases that give them the exclusive right to sell products in a building or mall. But Stafford's lawsuit contends that Starbucks' use of exclusive leases is an abuse of monopoly power — which Starbucks denies.

Equity Office Properties spokeswoman Terry Holt declined to comment.

In its court filing, Starbucks acknowledges that some of its leases in downtown Seattle and Bellevue "prohibit the landlord from leasing space in the same building to other retail coffee stores."

Last year, Stafford opened Belvi Coffee in a tiny space in a Bellevue high-rise by leasing the espresso machine of a tenant, Johnika's Deli. But Starbucks retaliated by "poaching" her customers, the lawsuit alleges. Employees from a nearby Starbucks outlet repeatedly offered free coffee samples to Stafford's customers seated outside the deli, says Stafford and her lawsuit.

Four months later, Stafford had to close the outlet.

Her lawsuit alleges that Starbucks, which runs 59 stores within a 2-mile radius of downtown Seattle, creates "Starbucks-only zones" that bar rivals. For instance, Starbucks in 2003 bought Seattle's Best Coffee and Torrefazione Italia for $72 million, then closed half of SBC's 22 stores and all five Torrefazione stores.

"Starbucks' game plan is to completely dominate a market by forcing out competition," Berman says. "We also believe that this scorched-earth approach is happening in many other major markets across the U.S."

Starbucks denies the allegations. In their filing, Starbucks' attorneys write: "Since its founding, Starbucks has played an integral role in creating an industry for gourmet coffee in Seattle and beyond. … Starbucks believes there is room for many coffeehouses in the marketplace that meet different customers' needs."

Until the lawsuit is resolved, Stafford is leasing a small spot in a Bellevue office building. So far, she has poured $130,000 into her coffee business. Despite the risks, she says, "I have to do the right thing."

Meanwhile, another Starbucks has just opened a block away.

Ericsson's Purchase Of Redback Boosts Internet-Video Strategy (WSJ)

By Bobby White And Sara Silver

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

Telefon AB L.M. Ericsson's agreement to buy Redback Networks Inc. for $2.1 billion reflects how the explosion in video and other multimedia services over the Internet and a surge in broadband subscribers are driving phone and cable companies to upgrade their networks and spurring big makers of networking hardware to unite.

Ericsson, a Swedish provider of equipment and services for telecommunications infrastructure, said it will pay holders of the Silicon Valley seller of routing equipment $25 a share, or 18% more than Redback's share price before the announcement. Ericsson characterized the price as a 60% premium above the 90-day average for Redback stock.

The companies said the deal will make them more effective suppliers for the fast-moving market. It also could help Redback contend with larger competitors such as Cisco Systems Inc. and Juniper Networks Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0107781

"Some companies were reluctant to use our technology because of Redback's size," said Paul Giordano, chairman of Redback's board and chief executive of Tamalpais Asset Management, a hedge fund that is an investor in the company. "Redback can compete in a much stronger way now."

Redback was forced to file for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection in 2003, after an expansion during the telecom boom left the company saddled with debt. It slashed costs, cut nearly 1,000 employees and invested millions of dollars on new technology.

At one point, the stock traded for less than $1. In 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading, before the deal was announced, the stock traded at $21.17, up 45 cents. In after-hours trading the shares were up $3.63, or 17%, to $24.80.

Kevin Denuccio, Redback's chief executive, said his company had been in talks with Ericsson off and on for months but discussions grew more intense in mid-November. He said Redback was interested in being acquired, hoping "to marry the size, reach and resources of Ericsson with Silicon Valley culture and expertise."

Ericsson, with a market value of $65 billion, is Europe's largest telecom-equipment maker. Its acquisition last year of most of the assets of Marconi PLC set off a wave of consolidation in the industry, which included the proposed combination of the networks divisions of Nokia Corp. and Siemens AG, as well as last month's purchase of Lucent Technologies Inc. by Alcatel SA of France to form Alcatel Lucent.

Marconi's technology, designed to help telecom carriers handle big increases in data traffic, gave Ericsson a foothold in the networks of Marconi's existing customers, which were concentrated in the United Kingdom, Italy and Germany. The Redback deal could further improve Ericsson's ability to sell to U.S. carriers rolling out Internet television services.

"There's a scramble right now between Ericsson and Cisco to become the alternative to Alcatel in Internet television," said Inder Singh, telecom analyst at Prudential Equity Group. He thinks Ericsson could still be in the market for high-speed optical devices that collect and send signals to hundreds of homes.

Redback, of San Jose, Calif., will retain its management team and will operate as a business unit of Ericsson. The deal is expected to close by early 2007.

Valassis Strikes Deal With Advo To Acquire Firm For $1.05 Billion (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

NEW YORK -- Valassis Communications Inc. agreed to acquire direct-mail marketer Advo Inc. for a reduced amount as the companies dropped lawsuits against each other over their disputed merger agreement.

Valassis will pay $33 a share for Advo, or about $1.05 billion, down from $37 a share, or $1.18 billion, under an agreement reached in July. Valassis also will assume about $125 million in debt.

Less than two months after the companies first struck a deal, Valassis sued to end it, saying Advo, of Windsor, Conn., hid its financial problems to clinch an acquisition, and its business had eroded so much it was no longer the same company Valassis agreed to buy. Advo denied the claims and countersued to push through the deal.

"We are pleased to have reached this amended agreement with Advo and put the litigation behind us," said Alan Schultz, chief executive of Valassis, a Livonia, Mich., marketing company.

The settlement comes after a week of testimony from Valassis executives and other witnesses. The trial was adjourned Monday as the companies discussed the potential settlement.

Valassis also agreed evidence doesn't support claims Advo engaged in fraud or misconduct in connection with the initial merger agreement.

The renegotiated merger requires approval from Advo shareholders, and is expected to close during the first quarter.

Valassis shares yesterday rose 4.3%, or 62 cents, to $14.90 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, while Advo shares fell 40 cents, or 1.2%, to $32.60 on the Big Board.

AT&T/BellSouth Merger Faces Onerous Conditions (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington And Paul Taylor In New,york

Financial Times, December 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107782

AT&T's $68bn takeover of BellSouth will face a tough political climate in Washington in 2007 when Democrats take control of the Congress, virtually ensuring that the former Ma Bell will have to agree to harsher conditions.

The possibility that the telecoms mega-merger would be approved by the Federal Communications Commission before the end of this year appeared to disintegrate on Monday after Robert McDowell, a Republican commissioner at the FCC, said he would abstain from deadlocked negotiations over the transaction at the regulatory agency.

The decision marks the beginning of what is likely to be a difficult period for Kevin Martin, FCC chairman and a savvy political operator who has, until now, faced few serious hurdles on his agenda. Among other issues, Mr Martin will probably be forced to defend the FCC's future decision on the AT&T deal and separate deliberations on media ownership limits before Democratic lawmakers next year.

With Mr McDowell out of the game, AT&T will be forced to succumb to at least some of the demands of the FCC's two Democratic commissioners, who are expected to have the backing of the new Democratic majority in the Congress on issues ranging from net neutrality to "special access" price freezes, coveringcompetitors' access to its network.

"There seems little doubt that McDowell's move strengthens the Democrat's hand and, while AT&T has been complaining of 'moving goalposts' in their negotiations, the goalposts look set possibly to move again on the topics ... where talks appear to have stalled," noted David Barden, a Bank of America analyst.

Gene Kimmelman of Consumers Union, a public advocacy group, said AT&T had held out on agreeing to some concessions so far because it had made a miscalculation that Mr McDowell would weigh in on the stalled talks.

AT&T yesterday said it had sought support from every member of the FCC since "the very beginning".

Analysts believe the Democrats are insisting on special access price freezes that exceed 30 months - something AT&T might be willing to accept - and an arbitration process governing wholesale price disputes, which they believe AT&T opposes if it relates to AT&T specifically.

Judge Bars Business Operations Merger Pending Media Trial (AP)

AP, December 20, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - A federal judge on Tuesday blocked San Francisco Bay area newspapers owned by MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle from consolidating some of their business operations until the outcome of an antitrust lawsuit challenging the move.

U.S. District Judge Susan Illston had temporarily barred the consolidation of distribution and national advertising sales. She made her ruling official on Tuesday after giving the news outlets a chance to respond. The organizations said two weeks ago they would not immediately merge operations, but they planned to do so if they prevailed in the antitrust trial scheduled for April.

"The court does not doubt the sincerity of defendants' representations. However, the court is concerned that denying the preliminary injunction may leave defendants unsure of whether they are free to immediately pursue such agreements," Illston ruled.

New York-based Hearst Corp., the Chronicle's publisher, has invested $300 million in a complex deal that gives Denver-based MediaNews three more Bay Area newspapers - on top of the seven it already owns, including the Oakland Tribune. Hearst's investment helped finance the purchase of Hearst rivals the Contra Costa Times, the San Jose Mercury News and Monterey County Herald earlier this year.

San Francisco businessman Clint Reilly is trying to undo the sales as part of a federal antitrust lawsuit. The suit claims the deal, among other things, gives the outlets a monopoly on readership and advertising sales.

The news outlets maintain the deal is not anticompetitive, and said they would prove that at trial.

The case is Reilly v. MediaNews Group, 06-4332.

Judge Bars MediaNews, Hearst Talks On Collaboration (MERCN)

By Pete Carey

The San Jose Mercury News, December 20, 2006

A federal judge issued an order Tuesday barring Hearst and MediaNews from collaborating on national advertising and distribution with their Bay Area newspapers until an antitrust lawsuit is concluded.

The order, by U.S. District Court Judge Susan Illston, granted the preliminary injunction sought by Clint Reilly, a San Francisco investor who has filed an antitrust lawsuit to prevent MediaNews from buying the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times.

Reilly contends that the purchase, which was assisted by Hearst, owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, would give MediaNews a Bay Area news and advertising monopoly. The newspaper company says it is beset by competition from the Internet and online advertising, and by declining circulation. Denver-based MediaNews owns seven other Bay Area papers, including the Oakland Tribune, Hayward Daily Review and Marin Independent Journal.

Hearst and MediaNews said in court filings opposing the injunction as unnecessary that despite an April 26 letter between Hearst and MediaNews executives outlining proposed areas of future collaboration, they have no intention of combining either distribution or national advertising at this time.

Illston's two-page order said she is granting the injunction -- which lasts until a trial is held -- to avoid any confusion that might have followed if she had denied Reilly's request. In an earlier order, she characterized the collaboration discussed in the April 26 letter agreement as ``a significant threat'' of anti-competitive behavior. A trial is scheduled for April.

``The notion that they have no intention of doing it anyway is something she is not accepting,'' Reilly's lawyer, Joseph Alioto, said, referring to Illston.

Calls to an attorney for Hearst were not returned.

MediaNews, Hearst Agreement On Ad Sales Blocked (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, December 20, 2006

Dec. 19 (Bloomberg) -- A federal judge blocked MediaNews Group Inc. and Hearst Corp. from jointly selling advertising in three northern California newspapers until after an antitrust trial next year.

U.S. District Judge Susan Illston in San Francisco today extended her Nov. 28 order halting a plan to collaborate on national ad sales and distribution. MediaNews and Hearst are accused in a lawsuit of forming a monopoly of newspapers in the San Francisco Bay area. Last month, Illston said the companies' agreement to jointly sell ads might violate antitrust laws and should be put off pending the outcome of the trial.

MediaNews and Hearst agreed in April to try to boost revenue by offering one contract to advertise in the San Francisco Chronicle, owned by Hearst, and the Contra Costa Times and the San Jose Mercury News, both owned by MediaNews. Lawyers for both companies told Illston last month that implementation of the plan wasn't imminent.

Illston said she sought ``to leave no confusion'' as to her expectation ``that defendants will comply with their stated intent not to pursue any of the agreements at issue.''

``The order is consistent with the representations made in the papers we recently filed in court,'' Paul Luthringer, a spokesman for New York-based Hearst, said in an e-mail. Joseph Lodovic, president of Denver-based MediaNews, didn't return messages seeking comment. Both companies are closely held.

McClatchy Deal

MediaNews acquired the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times, the No. 2 and No. 3 Bay-area papers, from McClatchy Co. in August. The $1 billion deal included at least $263 million from New York-based Hearst, whose Chronicle is the area's largest paper.

San Francisco real estate investor Clint Reilly has claimed in a lawsuit that the deal will create a monopoly, reducing choices for readers and advertisers. He is seeking a court order to undo the transaction.

At a Nov. 22 hearing, Reilly's lawyers told Illston that the national advertising agreement is evidence of price-fixing. Lawyers for MediaNews and Hearst said such agreements were legal, commonplace and necessary for both companies to beef up sagging revenue.

The case is Clinton Reilly v MediaNews Group, 06-04332, U.S. District Court, San Francisco.

Phone Firms Await FCC On Cable Ruling (WP)

By Alan Sipress

DOJ_NMG_0107784

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Telephone companies could get a major boost today in their efforts to penetrate the cable television market when the Federal Communications Commission considers a measure that would give state and local officials less latitude in awarding cable franchises.

FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, a leading advocate of the rule, has argued that government officials often stymie competition by delaying decisions on awarding cable franchises to telephone companies and by imposing exorbitant fees and conditions. As a result, cable operators often have been able to maintain a virtual monopoly on television services, resulting in steadily increasing prices for consumers, according to Martin. He cited an FCC survey

"Telephone companies are investing billions of dollars to upgrade their networks to provide video," Martin said in a speech two weeks ago. "As the telephone companies and others began actively seeking to enter video markets in late 2004 and 2005, however, we began to hear from some providers that local authorities were making the process of getting franchises unreasonably difficult."

Though the draft proposal will not be made public until today, it has already drawn sharp criticism from cable companies -- which argue that it would unfairly penalize them -- and local and state officials, who balk at efforts to curtail their authority in awarding franchises.

FCC officials said the measure's key provisions reflect proposals that Martin outlined in his remarks to the Phoenix Center, a research group, including specific deadlines for officials to decide on franchise requests. He said that state and local officials should be required to rule on applications within 90 days if the companies applying already have access to the required rights of way. Telephone companies such as Verizon Communications and AT&T, which stand to benefit most from the measure, often have such access for their fiber-optic lines.

Martin also urged that limits be placed on what local officials can demand from applicants in return for franchises. Local officials now can impose fees amounting to no more than 5 percent of cable revenues, but they often also demand that companies make other public improvements, such as wiring government buildings for broadband and even building a public swimming pool.

Finally, Martin has raised concerns about "build-out" requirements, which force telephone companies and other new providers to offer TV service to everyone within a given geographic area as a condition for winning a franchise. An FCC official said some of those demands are unreasonable because the companies are asked to carry them out too quickly.

"There have been abuses of the franchising process that make consumers wait longer than they should," said David M. Fish, a Verizon spokesman.

Fish said Verizon is spending $18 billion to build a fiber-optic network capable of providing video. But he said the company often must wait 18 to 22 months to receive local franchise approval after filing an application, slowing its bid to gain 3,000 franchises across the country in the coming years.

Verizon now has about 200 franchises for providing video. In the Washington area, the company has approval to offer television service in five Northern Virginia counties, four counties in the Maryland suburbs and more than 10 area cities, though not the District.

While cable operators say they share the aim of streamlining the review process, they accuse the FCC of offering new providers, especially telephone companies, an unfair advantage by freeing them from some conditions imposed on incumbents.

"The proposals we keep hearing about at the commission appear not to represent a level playing field," said Kyle E. McSlarrow, president of the National Cable and Telecommunications Association. Speaking to reporters yesterday, he urged the FCC to pare back the proposed measure.

Local and state officials, meanwhile, have accused the FCC of overstepping its legal rights.

"Franchising authority is a local one," said Carolyn Coleman, director of federal relations for the National League of Cities. "We want to see no more preemption of local government rights in this area." She said the FCC lacked the authority required to address franchising issues.

Congress entered the debate this year over video franchising. But while the House approved rules to streamline the process, the measure did not come up for a vote in the Senate.

Verizon and other phone companies have lobbied for new rules both at the federal and state levels. At least eight states have adopted measures designed to ensure that local officials follow consistent standards when evaluating applications.

Martin has referred to FCC statistics showing that cable rates increased 93 percent from 1995 to 2005. He said the commission's annual price survey, scheduled for release today, also found that cable rates were lower in areas where there was competition between at least two providers.

McSlarrow said those figures were deceptive because they rely on old data and only a portion of the cable market. Moreover, he said, many consumers now buy cable as part of a bundle that includes broadband Internet service and voice communications, and the price of such bundles has declined 25 percent since the mid-1990s.

"The bottom line is that value and price have only gotten better for our customers and that is a much sounder basis for policy proposals than outdated and manipulated statistics," he said.

Legal View: M&A Makeover Makes Good Sense (FT)

By Kenneth Chan

Financial Times, December 20, 2006

The merger and acquisition provisions enacted jointly by China's Ministry of Commerce and other ministries in 2003 were overhauled in August this year. The new provisions, which came into effect on September 8, represent a significant upgrade.

The added involvement of the securities regulator and state-owned asset watchdog in its enactment is expected to facilitate wider acceptance within the government and enhance the effective implementation of the new provisions.

Important changes were made in a number of areas, in recognition of the growing importance of China's private enterprises, the increased international mobility of Chinese entrepreneurs and the significant role they are playing in foreigners' M&A activities.

Previous obstacles to the continuing participation of these entrepreneurs in target companies post-acquisition have largely been removed.

However, a system has also been put in place to regulate entrepreneurs' investment overseas and subsequent "round-trip investments" back into China and to neutralise the implications that a change in their nationality may have on the legal characterisation of their domestic businesses.

The prospect of using foreign shares for investment in Chinese companies was an eye-catching feature in the 2003 provisions that was never realised. The role of foreign shares as a recognised form of investment has now been defined.

While their much narrower application – largely confined to two scenarios that are both foreign listing-related – is a disappointment to many, the clearer and more detailed regime that has now been put in place for its implementation is nonetheless a welcome development.

Foreign acquirers and their Chinese targets are also required to disclose more information on relationships between the parties involved and the basis for determining the purchase price. This is to enable regulators to ask relevant questions and spot potentially problematic acquisitions more easily.

While no change or further elaboration has been made to the original anti-trust filing provisions – largely because the long-awaited anti-trust law is still being debated – new criteria for barring foreign acquisitions in the name of protecting key industries, national economic security, famous trademarks and famous Chinese trade names have been introduced in addition to the existing market concentration and anti-competition rules.

Clarifications were made on the interaction of the provisions with legislation on protecting state-owned assets, securities listing and foreign exchange and on the continuing applicability of the 25 per cent minimum foreign ownership rule for recognising enterprises as foreign invested.

It is a useful reminder that the provisions do not constitute all-encompassing legislation on M&A by Chinese enterprises, that existing legislation has a role to play in the process and that new problems will no doubt arise on the consistency of the various regulatory systems and the need for these systems to continue to adapt to one another.

The overhaul of the provisions addresses certain pressing issues arising from the increased sophistication of China's economy and the type of foreign capital it is now attracting and highlights possible directions for further upgrading of the provisions in the future.

All these are further food for thought for foreign investors planning China acquisitions.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Critics Call EPA's New Rule A Loophole For Big Business (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, December 20, 2006

In a bid to trim the regulatory burden on small businesses, the Environmental Protection Agency is set to relax the rules on what toxic chemicals they have to report.

But in a twist, the EPA's newly revised Toxics Release Inventory rule will also make it possible for hundreds of large corporations to avoid reporting specific amounts of toxic chemicals they release into the air, land, or water, environmentalists warn.

The rule change has cheered small-business groups, generated widespread public opposition, and caught the eye of some Democratic congressmen, who will take control of Congress next month. It takes effect immediately.

The change affects companies that release relatively small amounts of toxic materials but still have to report them to the federal Toxics Release Inventory.

Under current TRI rules, companies have to report emissions of any toxic chemical that exceed 500 pounds in a year. Under the new rules, facilities could fill out a simpler form that omits reporting the amount of toxic chemicals if they created less than 5,000 pounds of it in a year and released no more than 2,000 pounds of it into the environment.

But the move makes it harder for neighborhoods or environmentalists to find out how much of a toxic chemical, such as toluene, a nearby factory is emitting. Researchers have linked toluene, used to make dyes and as a solvent, to various health problems. Similar streamlined reporting could be applied to another class of even more dangerous toxins if the waste was less than 500 pounds, entirely recycled, and not released at all.

Such limits spur business to reduce their toxic waste, federal officials contend. "EPA is delivering a cleaner, healthier nation by encouraging businesses to make environmental improvements now and in the future," Marcus Peacock, deputy EPA administrator said at a press conference to announce the new rule Monday.

EPA officials say the new TRI would save $6 million annually in unnecessary paperwork. Business groups back the measure.

"This move by the EPA will primarily assist small businesses that already release little or nothing into the environment at all from being overburdened with regulatory filings," says Andrew Langer, manager of regulatory policy for the National Federation of Independent Business, a Washington trade group.

But critics say the move seems to be an effort to weaken a reporting law that has empowered community activists with details about some 650 industrial chemicals that the TRI tracks. While TRI does not require emission controls, activists have used data to embarrass companies into cutting emissions.

"Americans who live near industrial facilities want to know what's going into their air and water," Rep. Frank Pallone Jr. (D) of New Jersey said during a recent teleconference with reporters.

The EPA move, which Mr. Pallone called a "terrible decision," could herald a wider battle with a new Democrat-controlled Congress with more intense oversight hearings examining EPA rulemaking in the new year, observers say. Legislation Pallone brought last year to cut funding for the TRI revision may be resurrected to block its implementation.

Of 24,000 facilities currently reporting TRI data, about one-third could be eligible to fill out a short form that simply lists the chemical, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0107787

But one largely hidden element of the rule change is that big companies are among the largest beneficiaries, says Tom Natan, of the National Environmental Trust, a Washington environmental group.

"The idea that this change is meant to benefit small independent business is just not true," he says. "When they first issued the proposal last year, EPA was saying it's mom and pop businesses this will help, but it turns out it's really General Motors, Sunoco, and companies like that."

While thousands of facilities will see major reductions in their paperwork, Dr. Natan is most concerned about the 3,600 facilities, about 15 percent of the total, that his analysis shows will no longer have to report any emissions details at all. Many such facilities, which emit thousands of pounds of toxins, are operated by some of the nation's largest companies.

An Ashland Distribution Co. facility, located in Birmingham, Ala., a division of the Fortune 500 giant Ashland Inc., released seven toxic chemicals totaling 4,405 pounds in 2004, according to the most recent TRI data. But because each chemical is below the new 2,000-pound threshold, the facility may no longer have to report any data on amounts and types of releases, Natan says. It also leaves room for emissions to rise without data being made public, he adds.

Similarly, one of Chevron's Honolulu marine terminals emitted 1,328 pounds of seven chemicals in 2004, including 580 pounds of the n-hexane, a potent toxin. But under the new TRI, that facility won't have to report such details in the future.

Both companies are taking a wait-and-see attitude.

"We're going to look at this change, but in the meantime continue to remain compliant with all federal regulations," says Ken Gordon, an Ashland spokesman. "It may help us a little bit to fill out the shorter form - save us some time - and that's what EPA had in mind. It wants companies to save time and still be protective of public health. The public is still getting their right to know what chemicals are being used."

"Right now we file the long form and it is our intent to continue that practice until the new TRI proposals are fully vetted," says Albert Chee, a Chevron spokesman. "If there's some reason to change our reporting practices, then changes will be made. But right now, we'll continue to follow our historical practice."

EPA found broad public discontent after it proposed its rule. More than 99 percent of the roughly 120,000 respondents during the public comment period opposed it, according to OMB Watch, a budget watchdog in Washington, D.C.

"It's outrageous that you want to make it easier for businesses to avoid public scrutiny of their releases," Carolyn Boatsman of Mercer Island, Wash., wrote the EPA in 2005. "It has been unequivocally documented that having to publish releases has shamed businesses into drastically reducing their output. We need that motivation."

Pollution Nets A $37-million Penalty (LAT)

By Elizabeth Mehren And Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, December 20, 2006

Overseas Shipholding must pay the record fine for dumping oil waste into the ocean.

BOSTON — Capping a three-year international investigation, federal officials on Tuesday announced a landmark, $37-million penalty in a maritime pollution case involving one of the world's largest publicly traded tanker companies.

The fine against Overseas Shipholding Group Inc., a U.S. corporation based in New York, is the largest criminal penalty on record concerning deliberate maritime pollution, and it includes a $9.2-million "community service payment" that will fund maritime environmental projects from coast to coast, including projects off California.

Overseas Shipholding pleaded guilty to 33 felony counts related to deliberate dumping of sludge and other contaminants as well as falsification of log entries that such carriers are required to maintain.

All of the vessels involved were oil tankers, including the Cabo Hellas, whose captain pleaded guilty this year in Los Angeles to obstructing a Coast Guard investigation of dumping oil into the ocean.

"To those who cut corners at OSG, discharging waste in the middle of the night to save a few bucks, this case sends a message that crime just does not pay," said acting Associate Atty. Gen. William Mercer, at a news conference Tuesday beside the Boston waterfront. "We will not see our oceans and our seas used as convenient dumping grounds for corporations."

DOJ_NMG_0107788

Charging that Overseas Shipholding "engaged in repeated and deliberate pollution of our oceans," Mercer added: "What is more disturbing is that OSG's management failed to uncover or stop this illegal activity after allegations were brought to the attention of management on several occasions, and again after the initiation of the government's investigation."

Morten Amtzen, Overseas Shipholding's president and chief executive, said in a statement Tuesday that his company had "worked hard to correct the issues that resulted" in the judgment.

The prosecution concerns violations on 12 oil tankers in six U.S. ports on both coasts and the Gulf of Mexico. Officials in Boston, San Francisco, Los Angeles, North Carolina and Texas participated in an inquiry that began in 2003 when Canadian authorities looked into a routine report of spillage in New Brunswick, off the country's eastern coast.

Capt. William Nash, director general of maritime safety for Transport Canada — the government agency responsible for enforcing Canada's maritime pollution laws — said Tuesday that officials boarded an Overseas Shipholding vessel to examine the ship's records.

"They realized there had been some inappropriate entries in the logbook," Nash said. The Canadians passed the information on to U.S. authorities.

Mercer said U.S. investigators found that Overseas Shipholding vessels were dumping "hundreds of thousands of pounds" of contaminants into marine waters. Court documents said the toxins included "machinery space bilge water and/or bilge slops, oily wastes and oil residues … in a manner that intentionally circumvented required pollution prevention."

Mercer said the company's personnel altered ship log books in what he called "a conspiracy to hide the crimes from the Coast Guard."

Thomas S. Rue, a lawyer with a large maritime practice in Mobile, Ala., said: "I am personally aware that ship owners are undertaking action to prevent this kind of practice, but that is coming from the top.

"If some third engineer wants to dump something off the deck in the middle of the night, there's not much they can do to stop it," Rue said.

Rodolfo Esplana Rey, captain of the Cabo Hellas, admitted in Los Angeles that he had failed to maintain proper records about oil dumping from the 750-foot vessel and that he had made false statements that oily bilge waste had been correctly treated. In September, Rey was sentenced to one year of probation.

A portion of the settlement is expected to aid environmental causes along California's Central Coast and at Channel Islands National Park.

But Mercer said the full extent of actual or potential environmental damage was impossible to calculate.

He said the contamination undoubtedly would produce "significant effects in terms of bird life and other ocean life."

Prior to Tuesday's announcement, the largest federal fine levied in a similar ocean vessel case occurred last year in Los Angeles, when Evergreen International, another of the world's largest shipping lines, agreed to pay $25 million for secretly dumping oil waste into the ocean rather than bringing it ashore for disposal.

Shipping Company Fined $37M For Dumping (AP)

By Rodrique Ngowi, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 20, 2006

Overseas Shipholding Fined a Record $37M for Dumping Waste Oil Along East Coast

BOSTON (AP) -- Oil tanker and bulk shipping company Overseas Shipholding Group Inc. will pay a record fine of $37 million after pleading guilty to illegally dumping waste oil and falsifying pollution logs in six U.S. ports, federal officials said Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0107789

The company agreed to plead guilty to 33 felony counts stemming from dumping violations from nine ships and for log violations for three other ships in Boston; Portland, Maine; Los Angeles; San Francisco; Wilmington, N.C.; and Beaumont, Texas, federal officials said.

The penalty includes a $27.8 million criminal fine which will be divided among the districts and a $9.2 million community service payment to fund various marine environmental projects.

The criminal penalty is the largest-ever involving deliberate vessel pollution, the U.S. Coast Guard said.

Shares of New York-based Overseas Shipholding closed unchanged at $59.05 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The Department of Justice and the U.S. Coast Guard opened their investigation after a tip from Canadian officials, who reported that official records of one of the company's ships failed to account for the disposal of oil waste. An investigation showed 150,000 gallons of oil-contaminated waste was dumped in the waters between Maine and Massachusetts, officials said.

Overseas Shipholding, one of the largest publicly traded tanker firms in the world, "has engaged in repeated and deliberate pollution of our oceans," Acting Associated Attorney General William Mercer said in a release.

The company's management failed to uncover or stop this illegal activity after allegations were brought to the attention of management several times and again after the government started its investigation, Mercer said.

"This penalty ... will serve as a deterrent for all other companies who attempt to circumvent the law for their own financial gain at the expense of the environment," he said.

Company officials did not immediately return a call for comment left at its New York headquarters.

Under the terms of the guilty plea, the company agreed to a three-year probation during which it must implement and follow a stringent environmental control program that includes a court-appointed monitor and outside independent auditing of its ships trading worldwide.

The company also admitted in a court record that its "motive for the crimes was financial." "OSG was saving the cost of offloading waste oil in port and the time it would take to comply with the law," according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Oil Tanker Giant To Pay Hefty Fine (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 20, 2006

The world's second-largest publicly traded oil tanker company yesterday agreed to plead guilty to 33 felony counts for deliberately polluting six U.S. ports and making false pollution log entries.

In what the Justice Department called the largest criminal penalty involving deliberate vessel pollution, Overseas Shipholding Group Inc. (OSG) will pay the government $37 million and plead guilty to the illegal dumping of waste oil, violations of the Clean Water and Oil Pollution acts, conspiracy, making false statements and obstruction of justice.

"OSG has engaged in repeated and deliberate pollution of our oceans," acting Associate Attorney General William Mercer said. "What is more disturbing is that OSG's management failed to uncover or stop this illegal activity after allegations were brought to the attention of management on several occasions and again after the initiation of the government's investigation."

Rear Adm. Tim Sullivan, commander of the First U.S. Coast Guard District, said the service is committed to achieving industrywide compliance with international and domestic pollution prevention rules.

"The case demonstrates that scofflaws within maritime industry can no longer treat intentional discharging of oil and the penalties associated with those acts as a 'cost of doing business.' Instead, the industry must embrace a culture of compliance," he said.

New York-based OSG, which has 4,000 employees, transports crude oil, petroleum products and dry bulk commodities throughout the world. The company owns an international fleet of 106 operating vessels and has 30 under construction. The guilty plea involves 12 of its ships.

The ports where the pollution occurred were identified as Boston; Portland, Maine; Los Angeles; San Francisco; Wilmington, N.C.; and Beaumont, Texas.

The $37 million penalty consists of a $27.8 million criminal fine, which will be divided among the port districts, and a $9.2 million organizational community service payment that will fund marine environmental projects coast to coast.

DOJ_NMG_0107790

According to a statement of facts filed by the Justice Department in the plea agreement, OSG admitted that it:

• Made illegal releases of oily waste from August 2001 to October 2003 into waters off the coast of New England, in proximity to Maine and Massachusetts, including the island of Nantucket.

• Was responsible for dumping sludge, including 40,600 gallons dumped overboard by one ship.

• Violated the Clean Water Act by discharging 2,640 gallons of oily waste and sludge off the coast of North Carolina, and made false statements about it.

• Made illegal discharges of oily waste in 2004 and 2005 in the Gulf of Mexico.

• Concealed the illegal discharges by falsifying official ship records, making discharges at night and hiding bypass equipment during U.S. port calls so the Coast Guard would not discover the criminal activity.

The company also said numerous high-ranking crew members engaged in conspiracies to commit illegal pollution and falsify ship records while lower-level crew participated because they were explicitly or implicitly threatened with loss of employment if they refused.

The Justice Department said the motive for the crimes was financial, adding that OSG "was saving the cost of offloading waste oil in port and the time it would take to comply with the law."

Shipping Firm Fined $37M For Sludge (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — A New York shipping company agreed Tuesday to pay a record $37 million fine and plead guilty to 33 felony charges for discharging sludge and other polluted waste into ocean waters from the New England coast to the Gulf of Mexico.

The settlement concludes a three-year federal investigation into activities aboard 12 tankers operated by Overseas Shipholding Group, the Justice Department said in a statement, adding that the fine was the largest ever levied in a vessel pollution case.

"OSG has engaged in repeated and deliberate pollution of our oceans," acting Associate Attorney General William Mercer said in a statement.

"What is more disturbing is that OSG's management failed to uncover or stop this illegal activity after allegations were brought to the attention of management on several occasions and again after the initiation of the government's investigation," Mercer said.

In one instance described in government documents, an unidentified engineer aboard the M/T Overseas Shirley alerted managers to the "criminal" dumping of an estimated 40,600 gallons of sludge, or concentrated black waste oil.

In another case, the government cited the tanker M/T Uranus for routinely releasing "oily waste" into the waters off Maine and Massachusetts from August 2001 to October 2003.

"We are pleased to bring closure to this investigation and believe our cooperation with the government was vital to today's announcement," Morten Arntzen, OSG's president and chief executive officer, said in a statement.

"Our internal processes enabled us to self-report information to the government about certain violations. We did so not only because it was the right thing to do but because it is consistent with the company's core values of integrity and transparency."

Seagoing Polluter Punished: Oil Dumper Will Pay $37M Fine (BOSH)

By Jay Fitzgerald

Boston Herald, December 20, 2006

A New York shipping company has admitted criminal guilt and agreed to pay a record $37 million in fines for illegally dumping waste oil from ships off the coast of Massachusetts, Maine and elsewhere, the U.S Department of Justice announced yesterday.

The New York-based Overseas Shipholding Group Inc., described as one of the world's largest publicly traded tanker companies, agreed to 33 felony counts related to routinely discharging pollutants off of ships into the oceans, the feds said in a statement.

"OSG has engaged in repeated and deliberate pollution of our oceans," said Acting Associate Attorney General William Mercer.

The multi-state investigation was launched in Boston after Canadian officials tipped off local Coast Guard authorities that records for one of OSG's ships showed bilge waste was being disposed into the sea - even though other records indicated the ship was complying with environmental laws.

"We are pleased to bring closure to this investigation and believe our cooperation with the government was vital to today's announcement," said OSG chief executive Morten Amtzen.

Under the terms of the guilty plea, OSG agreed to a three-year probation during which it must implement and follow a stringent environmental control program.

The company also admitted in a court record that its "motive for the crimes was financial."

"OSG was saving the cost of offloading waste oil in port and the time it would take to comply with the law," according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

The $37 million fine is the largest-ever criminal penalty involving deliberate vessel pollution, according to the U.S. Coast Guard.

Accused Drug Kingpin Faces New Charges (AP)

AP, December 20, 2006

SAN DIEGO (AP) -- The suspected kingpin of one of Mexico's oldest and most notorious drug cartels ordered the murder of Tijuana's deputy police chief and the beheadings of three police officers, according to a federal indictment unsealed Tuesday.

Francisco Javier Arellano Felix, 37, would be eligible for the death penalty if convicted on a count of running a criminal enterprise, part of the new seven-count indictment. The killings were included as evidence of the criminal enterprise that authorities say extended into the United States.

That charge was not part of a 2003 indictment that led to his arrest in August by the U.S. Coast Guard in international waters near La Paz, Mexico.

The new indictment alleges Arellano Felix ordered the murder of Hugo Gabriel Coronel Vargas, Tijuana's deputy police chief, who died Jan. 17, 2005, in a hail of more than 60 shots from an automatic rifle.

The indictment also charges that Arellano Felix and a man authorities consider his underling, Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, ordered the June 20 beheadings of three police officers from Rosarito Beach, a spring break spot just south of the border from San Diego.

Arellano Felix and Villarreal were to appear in federal court Wednesday on charges of running a criminal enterprise, racketeering and conspiracy to commit racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering.

Villarreal, 31, had not been charged with any crimes since his capture alongside Arellano Felix but also would be eligible for the death penalty if convicted of running a criminal enterprise. He was initially held as a material witness and has been in solitary confinement amid extradition proceedings to Mexico.

Arellano Felix is being held in San Diego without bail. He has pleaded not guilty to drug trafficking, money laundering and conspiracy charges from the earlier indictment.

Officials at Mexico's Foreign Relations Department and attorney general's office said Tuesday they had no immediate response to the charges. David Bartick, an attorney for Arellano Felix, declined comment.

Eugene Iredale, an attorney for Villarreal, said his client would plead not guilty. He said any crimes alleged to have occurred in Mexico should be tried in Mexico, not the United States.

Laura Duffy, a federal prosecutor in San Diego, said the men can be tried in the United States because they directed operations on U.S. soil.

The indictment alleges the men ordered the kidnapping, torture and murder of rivals in the United States as well as Mexico. It also says they smuggled cocaine and marijuana across the border in trucks and boats.

The Arellano Felix cartel emerged as a drug powerhouse in the 1980s in Tijuana, across the border from San Diego, but its influence has waned.

Legal Affairs More Pot Busts Taking Place In Suburban Areas (ATC)

By Tamara Keith

NPR's All Things Considered, December 19, 2006

"BC Bud" is the name of a high-grade marijuana strain grown in British Columbia. Much of it is grown indoors, in warehouses and increasingly in homes. Now federal agents in California have busted a marijuana-growing ring that seems to be taking a page from the BC Bud handbook by growing their lucrative crop in suburban homes.

Federal agents in California say the pot farms they raided have all the markings of organized crime. The farms were found in unexpected places, many of them at suburban homes near Sacramento.

On a quiet street in suburban Elk Grove, an orange tag marks a two-story home. Detectives found several hundred marijuana plants at the house. Richard Maynard, who lives next door, says he really didn't know what his neighbors were up to.

"We never saw them," Maynard says. "They'd show up in the middle of the night, about 1 o'clock, with a moving van occasionally, not very often. They'd say hi if they showed up in the middle of the day, which was once a month maybe. They were just very quiet."

But inside the home was a marijuana factory, designed to create the greatest yields. Gordon Taylor is the Assistant Special Agent in Charge of the DEA office in Sacramento.

"This is not the hippy growing marijuana in his closet from back in the 1970s," Taylor says. "This is not Cheech and Chong."

Taylor says the plants seized from 41 homes linked to the case were capable of producing $74 million worth of pot in a year. Eight people have been arrested. They're all in their 20s, have Chinese surnames and San Francisco Bay Area addresses. Taylor says he believes this reaches beyond those already under arrest.

"What we're seeing here is very organized and extremely sophisticated in terms of the operation inside the homes," Taylor says. "And then just the purchase of the homes. You couple all that together, and you see it has all the markings of an Asian organized criminal group."

The details were the same with nearly all the recent pot busts in Sacramento-area homes. They were large, costing about half a million dollars, and usually in newer subdivisions. They were bought with 100-percent financing, no cash down -- not an uncommon practice in California's real estate market.

The homes were then gutted and "remodeled" to grow pot. Windows were covered and electricity was pirated to avoid the meter. Lights and insulation were brought in along with drip watering systems.

Law enforcement officials say it's not an isolated problem. Seizures of indoor marijuana plants in California are up 81 percent this year.

There are likely many more marijuana growing rings like this one, that just haven't been discovered yet, says Kent Shaw, Assistant Chief of the California Department of Justice Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement. He says large-scale pot operations hidden behind stucco walls and picket fences have proven to be cash machines. The quality is better than outdoor marijuana varieties and can be harvested year round, rather than just once.

"If it's fairly high grade," Shaw says, the pot can net "anywhere from $3,500 to $6,000 a pound. For a minimal amount of investment, if you have a decent amount of square footage in a residence to grow it, there's a lot of return that's going to come back on your initial investment."

And that might explain why narcotics investigators are seeing more criminal organizations move into the marijuana business. Shaw says where once they may have dealt only in methamphetamine, cocaine or heroin, some groups now see marijuana as a low-risk high-profit alternative.

Palm Desert Tells Marijuana Dispensary To Cease And Desist (KESQ)

KESQ-TV, December 20, 2006

CannaHelp, the medical marijuana dispensary in Palm Desert is being told to close up shop. The city has sent the business a cease and desist letter.

Palm Desert City Attorney David Irwin told NewsChannel 3 CannaHelp violated its agreement with the city and its business license is now revoked.

CannaHelp was raided a little more than two weeks ago when authorities believed the dispensary was selling pot for profit.

The owner of CannaHelp then admitted to NewsChannel 3 that he did sell pot for a profit, saying he's paid a salary.

Since that interview aired, we have heard from the district attorney, who told us our story could be used in court.

Also, the owner called us back, threatening to file a lawsuit for showing the interview.

Stay tuned to NewsChannel 3 for more on this developing story.

CannaHelp Owner To Defy City Cease-and-desist Letter (DS)

Desert Sun, December 19, 2006

CannaHelp, the medical marijuana in Palm Desert, is staying open in defiance of a cease-and-desist letter from the city.

“I'm going to stay open by myself,” said owner Stacy Hochanadel, after sending his other employees home. “I don't think it's right what they're doing.”

The city issued the letter, which Hochanadel received today, following a City Council vote in closed session last Thursday, said City Attorney David Erwin.

The vote was not reported during the council's open session on Erwin's advice.

"I felt this was an action we needed to take, and we needed to take the action before we reported it publicly," Erwin said in a phone interview today. "That was my decision."

Councilman Robert A. Spiegel said the reason for the closed session vote was an investigation "not by our police department but by another police department in California.

"When they were investigated, they sold marijuana to an undercover police person who did not have correct credentials to buy marijuana," he said.

The city is not releasing the staff report presented in the closed session due to the potential for litigation on the closure order, said City Clerk Rachelle Klassen.

Hochanadel signed an agreement with the city earlier this year that the dispensary would only sell medical marijuana to patients with a medical marijuana identification card issued by Riverside County.

But, he said, that part of the agreement had been put on hold following discussions with then-Mayor Jim Ferguson, due to the financial impact on the business which would have had to turn away significant numbers of customers.

California's medical marijuana law requires counties to issue the ID cards, but they are voluntary for patients. The law does require that patients have a letter of recommendation from their doctors.

Federal law bans all use, cultivation or distribution of marijuana.

CannaHelp has had a business license issued by the city since it opened in October 2005. The dispensary was closed briefly earlier this month when the Special Investigation Unit of the Riverside County Sheriff's Department served a search and seizure warrant on the business

But, said Capt. Steve Thetford, chief of the Palm Desert Police Department, "The Palm Desert (department) hasn’t made any significant arrests out of CannaHelp" in recent months, the county investigation notwithstanding.

Spiegel, who said he voted to close the dispensary, would like to see medical marijuana regulated by the federal government.

"It should be dispensed thourgh a pharmacy," he said in phone interview today. "That’s what I would prefer to see happen and hopefully someday that’s the way it will be."

Hochanadel would have liked the city to talk with him before issuing the letter, he said.

"I was hoping my city would stand behind me and support me. At this point they're trying to pull the carpet out from under my feet," he said.

Trenton: Needle Exchanges Approved (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

New Jersey yesterday became the last state in the country to offer needle exchange programs for intravenous drug users, when Gov. Jon S. Corzine signed legislation authorizing a pilot program for up to six towns. The law allows drug users to exchange used syringes for new ones, and provides $10 million for drug treatment facilities. A bipartisan array of legislators who attended the bill-signing ceremony said that such programs could help reduce the spread of H.I.V. in New Jersey, which has one of the country's highest infection rates. But critics say that the government should focus on treatment programs, and that free needles contributed to addictions.

Local Lawmen: U.S. Attorney Draws The Line At 500 Pounds (NI)

Nogales International, December 20, 2006

Many people want a fence built along the Mexico/United States border as a means to stop drug smuggling, terrorism and illegal immigration, but the truth is that drug smugglers can be caught red-handed, and still go free - as long as they're carrying less than 500 pounds of marijuana, officials say.

Unwritten rule

Several local officials have said that the unwritten rule at the Tucson office of the U.S. Attorney is that if a smuggler is accused of moving less than 500 pounds of pot through a port of entry, that person will walk away, generally.

Wyn Hornbuckle, the public information officer for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Arizona said that he knew of no such threshold, but Santa Cruz County officials say that one definitely exists.

Brad Giles, the chief narcotics officer at the Tucson U.S. Attorney's Office said that he couldn't comment on prosecution strategies because the office has found that in the past, smugglers have adapted.

The problem is complex. All the local officials said that they do not blame the U.S. Attorney's Office. They say the office staff is too small and overworked.

Exacerbating the situation is the recent national attention on immigration reform. The Bush administration is demanding that the office focus on immigration. As a result, the smaller drug cases are tossed out, the officials say.

But small is a relative term when it comes to dope. The street market here for 499 pounds of marijuana is about $399,000, by U.S. Border Patrol standards.

Local lawmen say that the federal government expects them to pick up the slack and that the issue has been divisive. Some officials feel that they have an obligation to try the cases left dormant by the federal government, but others feel that by cleaning up after the feds their good deeds will be expected to become regular.

One official that confirmed the threshold and is willing to take the cases to court is Santa Cruz County Attorney George Silva.

"They're (local agencies and the U.S. Attorney's Office) doing the best job they can with their resources," he said. "If anyone's to blame it's the U.S. Department of Justice or the Bush administration. They're throwing billions of dollars at immigration, but they're letting drug smugglers go free."

Lt. Jerry Castillo, commander of the Metro Santa Cruz County Task Force, a conglomeration of law enforcement agencies that have grouped together to tackle the drug problem, also confirmed the 500-pound benchmark and was quick to divert blame.

"They're (U.S. Attorney's office) just overwhelmed," he said.

Nogales Police Chief John Kissinger agreed.

"I know that the U.S. Attorney's office in Tucson is declining criminal prosecutions of certain narcotics cases at the ports because of a threshold, but I can't say what that threshold is," Kissinger said. But despite the threshold, Kissinger emphasized that any inaction on a federal level will not affect the department's operations in town.

"The Nogales Police Department is going to continue to work to remove drugs and drug dealers off the streets," he said.

Sheriff Antonio Estrada said that the smugglers are charged on a case-by-case basis.

"I have no idea what gets turned loose," he said. "We'd have to go back and see how many we get, but my understanding is that the attorney's office makes the decision on a case-by-case basis."

Meanwhile, Customs agents are growing weary of their work, knowing that anyone they seize with less than a quarter ton of marijuana will most likely go free, Silva says.

But Brian Levin, the public affairs liaison for the Tucson sector of U.S Customs and Border Protection, puts it differently.

"We tell our guys to take pride in what they're doing he said," and they do an amazing job catching (smugglers). The analogy we like to use is that we're like the beat cops. We're the guys on the street doing the arresting. We find it, seize it then call in ICE (Immigration and Customs Enforcement) to do the investigation. Our authority ends there," Levin said.

Several telephone messages requesting comment from Terence Azvill, the regional director of high intensity drug trafficking areas from the Tucson office of the National Drug Control Policy, went unanswered.

Marijuana 'top Cash Crop In US' (BBC)

BBC News, December 19, 2006

Marijuana is the top cash crop in the US, a report released on Monday says.

It says that despite intensive eradication plans, $35bn (£18bn) worth of the illegal drug is produced a year - more than corn and wheat combined.

The study was prepared by Jon Gettman, a public policy analyst who advocates reform of US marijuana laws.

Activists seeking the decriminalisation of the substance, say the report backs the need for change, a position rejected by government officials.

'Inherently harmful'

Using government reports, Mr Gettman estimates that 10,000 metric tons of marijuana are produced annually in the country.

"Marijuana has become a pervasive and ineradicable part of the economy of the United States," Mr Gettman - who has in the past campaigned for marijuana to be removed from a list of drugs considered to have no medical value - says in his report.

"The focus of public policy should be how to effectively control this market through regulation and taxation in order to achieve immediate and realistic goals, such as reducing teenage access."

The report was welcomed by the Marijuana Policy Project (MPP), which said it showed that "marijuana laws are a complete failure".

"Our nation's laws guarantee that 100% of the proceeds from marijuana sales go to unregulated criminals rather that to legitimate businesses that pay taxes to support schools, police and roads," said MPP executive director Rob Kampia.

But Tom Riley, a spokesman for the Office of National Drug Control Policy, rejected any economic arguments for legalising marijuana saying marijuana use was an "inherently harmful activity".

Parole Board Member Says FBI Tried To Intimidate Him (AP)

AP, December 20, 2006

BOSTON - A former member of the state Parole Board said Tuesday that two FBI agents tried to intimidate him into keeping a wrongly convicted man in prison for a 1960s gangland slaying.

Former Springfield Mayor Michael Albano, who served on the board from 1982 to 1994, testified in a lawsuit filed by the families of four men who say the FBI allowed them to be framed to protect a mobster informant.

Two of those men, Joseph Salvati and Peter Limone, spent more than 30 years in prison for the murder of Edward “Teddy” Deegan before being exonerated in 2001 when the Justice Department released documents showing the FBI withheld evidence from prosecutors that could have cleared the men so the agency could protect Vincent “Jimmy” Flemmi, an informant who actually committed the crime.

Louis Greco and Henry Tameleo, who were also convicted in Deegan’s killing, died in prison.

Lawyers for the men’s families asked Albano if the FBI, after being contacted by the parole board as it considered petitions to commute their sentences, ever turned over evidence it had that the men were not involved in the murder of Deegan.

DOJ_NMG_0107796

"No such information was provided," Albano testified.

Albano also made a brief reference in his testimony to a 1983 "unannounced visit" from former FBI Agents John Connolly and John Morris as the board was considering a petition to commute Limone's sentence.

He was not asked to provide details of the visit during his testimony. But outside the courtroom, Albano said Connolly and Morris urged him to vote against commuting Limone's sentence and said that if he voted in favor of commuting his sentence it could hurt his career.

"They intimidated me and tried to get me to change my vote," Albano told reporters. "They said this was a bad crime ... that these defendants should remain incarcerated for the rest of their lives."

"They also said it probably would not bode well for me, if I wanted to remain in public life, that this would not be a good vote for me," he said.

Albano said he later voted with the majority of the 7-member board to commute Limone's sentence, but Gov. Michael Dukakis denied the petition.

Connolly is now serving a 10-year federal prison sentence for racketeering, obstruction of justice and other charges for protecting members of Boston's Winter Hill Gang - including fugitive gangster James "Whitey" Bulger" - from prosecution while using them as FBI mob informants.

Connolly is awaiting trial on first-degree murder and conspiracy charges for allegedly providing information to members of the gang that led to the 1982 killing of former World Jai Alai President John Callahan.

Connolly's attorney, E. Peter Mullane, said Connolly denies the meeting described by Albano ever took place.

"John Connolly never met Mr. Albano under any circumstance, never spoke to him, never met him, never had any reason to meet him," he said. [continue]

FBI To Release Last Of Its John Lennon Files (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 20, 2006

The U.S. had said such an act could stir military retaliation. The papers, withheld 25 years, don't seem to bear that out.

The FBI agreed Tuesday to make public the final 10 documents about the surveillance of John Lennon that it had withheld for 25 years from a UC Irvine historian on the grounds that releasing them could cause "military retaliation against the United States."

Despite the fierce battle the government waged to keep the documents secret, the files contain information that is hardly shocking, just new details about Lennon's ties to New Left leaders and antiwar groups in London in the early 1970s, said the historian, Jon Wiener.

For example, in one memo, then-FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover wrote to H.R. Haldeman, President Nixon's chief of staff, that "Lennon had taken an interest in 'extreme left-wing activities in Britain' and is known to be a sympathizer of Trotskyist communists in England."

Another document had been blacked out on the grounds of national security when Wiener obtained it more than 20 years ago through litigation brought under the Freedom of Information Act. It is now known that it said two prominent British leftists, Tariq Ali and Robin Blackburn, had courted Lennon in hopes that he would "finance a left-wing bookshop and reading room in London."

But the newly released document adds that Lennon apparently gave them no money "despite a long courtship by Blackburn and Ali."

Another surveillance report states explicitly that there was "no certain proof" that Lennon had provided money "for subversive purposes." And yet another says there was no evidence that Lennon had any formal tie to any leftist group.

Another describes an interview with Lennon published in 1971 in an underground London newspaper called the Red Mole. "Lennon emphasized his proletarian background and his sympathy with the oppressed and underprivileged people of Britain and the world," the document says.

DOJ_NMG_0107797

Wiener and his attorneys, Dan Marmalefsky of Morrison & Foerster and Mark Rosenbaum of the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California, all said the documents revealed there was no sign that government officials considered Lennon a serious threat. They said they were mystified that several administrations had resisted making the material public.

"The content of the files released today is an embarrassment to the U.S. government," said Wiener, 62, who has written two books on the late Beatle, "Come Together: John Lennon in His Time" and "Gimme Some Truth: the John Lennon FBI Files."

"I doubt that Tony Blair's government will launch a military strike on the U.S. in retaliation for the release of these documents. Today, we can see that the national security claims that the FBI has been making for 25 years were absurd from the beginning," said Wiener, who requested the documents in 1981.

Wiener initially obtained some files showing that the FBI closely monitored Lennon's activities in 1971 and 1972. The documents indicated Nixon administration concern that Lennon would support then-Sen. George S. McGovern (D-S.D.) for president against incumbent Richard M. Nixon in 1972, the first year that 18-year-olds could vote.

But the FBI also withheld numerous files, saying they were exempt from the Freedom of Information Act, including part of a surveillance report on a December 1971 antiwar rally in Michigan. There, Lennon urged the release of activist and singer John Sinclair, who was serving a 10-year sentence for possession of two marijuana joints. A judge soon freed him.

Wiener sued in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles seeking all the documents. The FBI countered that some contained "national security information provided by a foreign government under an explicit promise of confidentiality" and that release of the documents "can reasonably be expected to … lead to foreign diplomatic, economic and military retaliation against the United States," according to a government brief filed in 1983.

Wiener lost the initial court skirmishes, but in 1991 he won a major victory in the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, which ruled that declarations filed by FBI agents provided inadequate grounds for keeping the material secret. From that point forward, the court ruled, the FBI had to file "affidavits containing sufficient detail" to allow Wiener to "intelligently advocate" for their release and for a trial judge "to intelligently judge the contest."

That decision significantly strengthened the hand of people trying to pry secret documents out of the government. Justice Department attorneys, including John Roberts, who is now the chief justice of the United States, appealed, but the Supreme Court let the ruling stand.

Six years later, Wiener settled with lawyers from the Clinton administration and obtained a number of FBI files on the former Beatle. But Justice Department lawyers continued to withhold 10 documents under the national security exemption of the Freedom of Information Act.

Scott Hodes, who was acting chief of the FBI litigation unit dealing with freedom of information cases, said disclosure of the documents could strain relations between the U.S. and a foreign government, lead to diplomatic, political or economic retaliation and have a chilling effect on the flow of information between the two countries. Hodes also said disclosure of the documents could subject the government agents involved in the Lennon operation to "public ridicule, ostracism" or even jeopardize their safety.

In August 2004, U.S. District Judge Robert M. Takasugi granted summary judgment to Wiener, concluding that the government had not adequately supported its claims. Justice Department lawyers said they would appeal. But a 9th Circuit mediator eventually forged a settlement, leading to a final settlement resolution of the case Tuesday.

Years ago, Wiener called the case a "rock 'n' roll Watergate," in part because the FBI took an intense interest in Lennon at the time operatives from the Nixon administration perpetrated the Watergate burglary. But on Tuesday, Wiener agreed that given how long the case dragged out, it might more appropriately be characterized as a "rock 'n' roll 'Bleak House,' " referring to the Dickens novel about a years-long inheritance case.

"The release of these final documents, concealed from public view for nearly a quarter of a century, reveals government paranoia at a pathological level and an attempt to shield executive branch abuse of civil liberties under the rubric of national security," said Rosenbaum of the ACLU. "The ultimate lesson of these documents is that the head of document classification for the FBI must be Stephen Colbert."

On his late-night television show, satirist Colbert plays a right-wing talk show host who is a government cheerleader.

The Justice Department declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0107798

Marmalefsky said the one concession that Wiener made in settling the suit was agreeing that the letterhead on some of the documents released Tuesday could be blacked out "as well as a word here or there that would identify the foreign government" that provided information to the U.S.

However, Marmalefsky said, "having reviewed the final documents and all the others in this case, it is very difficult to believe that it could be any government other than the United Kingdom."

The documents will be posted on the Internet today at http://www.LennonFBIfiles.com . <252>*

IMMIGRATION:

Swift Raids Put Iowa Guard At Risk, Vilsack Says (DMR)

Des Moines Register, December 19, 2006

In a blunt and stinging letter, the governor and the top officer of the Iowa National Guard today called federal immigration officials' actions in the Swift raids "completely unacceptable," saying agents undermined the public's trust in government, potentially jeopardized the safety of law enforcement personnel in Iowa and could have compromised undercover operations.

Gov. Tom Vilsack and Maj. Gen. Ron Dardis, in a letter today to Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, said they will not cooperate with federal immigration officials in the future unless they act more responsibly and provide better coordination with state officials.

Immigration officials "chose to pursue a solitary path that limited the operation's effectiveness, created undue hardship for many not at fault, and led to resentment and further mistrust of government," Vilsack and Dardis wrote.

The arrests Dec. 12 of 1,282 workers at Swift & Co. meatpacking plants in Marshalltown and in five other states represented the biggest crackdown in history on immigration violations at one company. The raids were executed by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, known as ICE, an agency of the Department of Homeland Security.

Vilsack and Dardis said ICE officials failed to advise the Iowa National Guard of the size and scope of the raid, which "could have led to unacceptable risks to Guard personnel and property."

The raids could have compromised ongoing local, state and federal law enforcement undercover operations, they said.

ICE gave Iowa little chance to prepare to deal with the humanitarian consequences of the raids, they said.

And the "information blackout" ICE imposed after the raids made the situation worse, they said.

Although the Iowa National Guard's only role was to provide a temporary space to hold detainees, ICE's operations and lack of coordination thrust the Guard into the national spotlight "without the sufficient information or authority to plan or respond."

Federal agents failed to provide any information to Guard public affairs staff before or during the raids, then ICE public affairs in Washington, D.C., issued only one short news release more than 24 hours after the raids began.

After promising to hold a news conference at Camp Dodge, ICE failed to do so, they wrote.

"The complete lack of an adequate media plan in the age of 24-7 news coverage is completely unacceptable," they wrote. "These systemic failures to communicate with the public and news organizations created an information vacuum that was filled with unreliable and unverifiable rumors that further undermined the public's trust and confidence in both the state and federal government."

Rather than working with local, state and other federal law enforcement agencies, ICE worked alone, they said.

"This lack of coordination among law enforcement and military authorities is completely unacceptable in this post 9/11 and (Hurricane) Katrina world," they wrote.

They ended the letter with this warning:

"In order to prevent similar or greater problems in the future, please note that the Iowa National Guard, at both Camp Dodge and throughout our state, will now require proper notification to the governor and appropriate law enforcement personnel, as well as a thorough and synchronized media plan, before we again agree to provide any space for future actions or operations by ICE."

As of this evening, 1,283 people had been arrested in connection with the Swift raids and charged with non-criminal administrative violations.

DOJ_NMG_0107799

Of those, 144 had also been charged with criminal violations: one with re-entering the United States after deportation and 143 with identity theft or a fraud-related charge.

Harkin 'appalled' By Treatment Of Illegal Workers (DMR)

Des Moines Register, December 19, 2006

Washington, D.C. – Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa wrote Secretary of Homeland

Security Michael Chertoff today to say he is "appalled" by the process used to detain and deport workers in raids earlier this month at six Swift & Co. packing plants, including one in Marshalltown.

Harkin, a Democrat, said a telephone hotline for information for family members that was set up by the government has at times gone unanswered. At other times, it "provided no information of any use," Harkin said in the letter.

It has been "almost impossible" for lawyers and members of the clergy to gain access to workers who were detained, and workers were taken to other states without being granted access to lawyers, Harkin said.

Although assurances were provided to his staff that parents with small children would be released to make arrangements for their children's care, "there continues to be reports of numerous single mothers remaining in custody," Harkin said.

He said he hopes Chertoff shares his belief that "the failure to ensure that basic legal rights and humanitarian protections are afforded to individuals in our immigration system reflects poorly on the principles that have made the United States strong."

A spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the law enforcement agency that conducted the raids, had no immediate comment. The agency is part of the Department of Homeland Security.

At the time of the raids, officials said that in certain cases where "humanitarian or medical concerns were identified," those arrested were given notices to appear in court at a later date.

The raids came as part of a investigation of worksite immigration violations and a massive identity theft scheme that federal officials say has victimized large numbers of legal citizens.

Criminal organizations traffic in genuine birth certificates and Social Security cards belonging to legal citizens, stolen in some cases and in other cases bought from homeless people and people in jail, officials say.

There were 1,282 arrests on immigration violations at the six Swift plants, with countries of origin of those arrested including Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, Peru, Laos, Sudan and Ethiopia.

Harkin said the arrests demonstrate the need for Congress to move on immigration reform, including a path to citizenship for those in the country illegally.

Lawmakers Use Swift Raids To Bolster Locked-in Positions (RMN)

By M.E. Sprengelmeyer

Rocky Mountain News, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - Mass arrests of suspected illegal immigrants have done little to end the congressional stalemate over the country's immigration policies.

Instead, after the crackdown at Swift & Co. plants in Colorado and five other states, lawmakers from competing sides of the debate over a proposed guest-worker plan used the arrests last week to bolster their locked-in positions.

That could set the stage for another difficult debate in coming months, after Democrats take control of both houses of Congress and try to advance a plan President Bush has long favored.

Advocates of tougher enforcement of immigration laws generally praised last week's actions, which ended with the arrests of 1,282 workers, including 261 in Greeley, for immigration infractions or identity-theft charges.

But some, including Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Littleton, expressed concerns that it could be a "ruse," or temporary show of force, intended to appease enforcement-first factions to clear the way for a guest- worker plan critics equate to amnesty.

Tancredo called it "hogwash" that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff began his press conference detailing the arrests by talking about the need for a guest-worker plan, which could grant legal status to millions who have entered the country illegally.

Chertoff said tough enforcement was only one part of solving immigration problems.

"It needs to be solved, and it won't be solved with a piecemeal approach," Chertoff said.

That was a common theme all week, as longtime backers of the proposed guest-worker plan, including Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., said the arrests signaled a clarion call for a comprehensive approach to solving immigration problems.

"The lesson for me is that it underlines the need for Congress to act and enact comprehensive reform," said Rep. Mark Udall, D-Eldorado Springs. "It's time to do what the American public wants us to do."

The Immigration and Customs Enforcement raids, which prompted protests from workers' families and immigrant rights activists, rejuvenated a debate that had been dormant since the summer, when the Senate passed a comprehensive immigration bill but couldn't win agreement from the enforcement-minded House of Representatives.

Udall said the highly publicized arrests "rub away the scar tissue" and bring the raw emotions of the issue to the surface again.

The timing of the raids, during the Christmas season and on the Catholic Feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe, prompted Denver Archbishop Charles Chaput to denounce the ICE raids.

But Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Loveland, said the timing could not be avoided.

"You have to feel sorry for the kids who see their parents taken away from them," Allard said. "But the real victims are those in the identity-theft part of that. Once your identity is taken, you never recover.

"If you're dealing with criminals, you go when the case is ready and you have to do that to prevent more victims from being exploited."

Over the summer, Allard opposed a Senate version of immigration reform, which he said would amount to rewarding law-breakers. Still, he said Congress needs to do more, in addition to increasing funds for enforcement.

"I think everyone understands we need to do something about illegal immigration," Allard said.

Rep. Bob Beauprez, R-Arvada, said the Swift & Co. arrests highlight a growing problem with identity theft, but they don't make the leading guest-worker proposals any easier to swallow.

"When they talk about guest-worker, they're talking about amnesty, pure and simple," Beauprez said. "That's what Salazar is talking about. That's what the president is talking about. That's not equitable to people who are playing by the rules."

If the arrests have created any room for common ground, it's that people on both sides said Congress needs to consider closing a loophole in an existing employer-verification program.

Swift participated in a pilot project to verify workers' names and Social Security numbers. Chertoff said that while the program can catch some who use fabricated identity documents, it does not stop those who have stolen matching names and Social Security numbers.

That's why Chertoff and Tancredo, who are on opposite sides of the guest-worker debate, both said Congress needs to grant the Social Security Administration authority to tell immigration officials when numbers are being used in multiple locations.

Even then, Tancredo said he was skeptical that so far, of the 1,282 people arrested in the recent raids, most were charged only with administrative immigration violations and fewer than 65 face criminal charges, some related to identity theft.

"Something is askew here," he said.

Raid On Swift Leaves Staffing In Disarray (DENP)

By Bruce Finley

Denver Post, December 20, 2006

Meatpacking workers detained during last week's federal raids began facing immigration judges Tuesday in Colorado and five other states.

Some were released after relatives posted bond of at least $1,500. In Colorado, Immigration Judge Donn Livingston saw 27 detainees at the regional detention facility in Aurora and set court hearings where they are to be informed of charges against them.

Meanwhile, a federal grand jury in Minnesota indicted 20 detained workers on criminal-immigration offenses and charges related to identity theft.

DOJ_NMG_0107801

Now the immigration authorities themselves - who last week stormed six Swift & Co. plants in Greeley and other states based on allegations that illegal workers stole U.S. identities to get jobs - also are facing challenges in federal courts.

Labor-union leaders representing workers in Colorado have asked a federal judge to release them, arguing that workers were mistreated and denied access to lawyers.

The raids constituted "an outrageous abuse of police power," and the government's criminal probe into identity theft "functioned as the Trojan Horse to effectuate an immigration raid," said a lawsuit filed by the United Food and Commercial Workers Union Local 7.

U.S. District Judge John Kane has ordered immigrants detained at the Greeley plant to remain in his jurisdiction, but the union said some had been taken out of state. Union officials said Kane on Tuesday asked them to provide more details of their allegations.

"We're gathering witness statements and other material to present to him," UCFW spokesman Dave Minshall said.

Some 75 out of 260 workers detained in Greeley already have been returned to Mexico.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officials have filed a legal response saying detainees were told why they were arrested, allowed to use phones and advised they could get legal help.

ICE officials routinely move detained immigrants around the country to find bedspace.

U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo called Tuesday for more raids and urging the government to target managers who hire illegal workers.

"This kind of enforcement action by ICE has been sorely missing over the past decade and I urge you to expand such operations to other industries," Tancredo, R-Littleton, wrote in a letter to ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers.

"Many in the agriculture industry prefer to use illegal labor despite the availability of legal workers through the H-2A (temporary-worker) program, which as you know has no cap. I believe an investigation would reveal that identity theft is rampant across many sectors and industries, not only meatpacking," Tancredo said.

And "it strains credulity," he said, to suggest that so many illegal workers at Swift "could be employed, in six plants, without the company's management being aware of it," as the company has claimed.

Study Warns Of Hunger Among Hispanics (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Nearly one in five Hispanics lacks sufficient access to nutritious food and one in 20 regularly goes hungry, posing serious health and economic risks to the nation's largest and fastest-growing minority group, according to a new study.

The National Council of La Raza, a Latino advocacy group, noted in its study that the "food insecurity" rate of Hispanics is nearly as high as that of non-Hispanic blacks and substantially greater than that of non-Hispanic whites, of whom only about 5 percent suffer from limited access to nutritious food, according to U.S. government statistics.

"Yet the Latino community is practically invisible when it comes to this issue," said co-author Jennifer Ng'andu. "Folks notice the presence of Latinos in their area, but they are not connecting it to the need for food assistance."

As with African Americans, poverty appears to be the main factor limiting Latinos' access to nutritious food. About 22 percent of Latinos and 25 percent of non-Hispanic blacks are poor, compared with 8 percent of non-Hispanic whites.

Latinos, about 40 percent of whom are foreign-born, also often face linguistic, cultural and legal barriers to enrolling in federal hunger programs.

In 1996, Congress disqualified legal immigrants from nearly all forms of government assistance. Although a 2002 law restored access to certain programs for many categories of immigrants, including all otherwise eligible immigrant children, many Latinos appear unaware of the change. For instance, slightly more than half of eligible Latinos participate in the national food stamp program, compared with more than 70 percent of eligible blacks.

"For a lot of our immigrant families, there's either a lack of understanding of the system or fear, due to their immigration status," of approaching authorities, said Beatriz Otero, director of CentroN?a, a nonprofit child-care center in the District that has helped many Latino parents apply for federal assistance.

DOJ_NMG_0107802

The problem extends to immigrants' children who are U.S. citizens. Only about half of such children participate in the food stamp program, compared with more than 80 percent of eligible children who are U.S. citizens but whose parents are also U.S. citizens.

Just as daunting to many immigrant Latinos are the complex requirements and paperwork involved in signing up for many federal programs, Ng'andu said. By contrast, she noted, the government's nutrition program for low-income pregnant or post-partum mothers has a simpler enrollment process and a high rate of Latino participation.

Ng'andu argued that other federal food assistance programs need to follow suit by undertaking aggressive outreach in the Latino community and training their staff to better understand the eligibility rules affecting immigrants.

Otherwise, she cautioned, the consequences could be telling: Children who lack sufficient nutritional food have more difficulty concentrating in school as well as higher levels of anxiety, depression and obesity and its attendant health complications.

Sixty-two Fugitives And Immigration Violators Snared (MH)

By Miami Herald Staff

The Miami Herald, December 20, 2006

Immigration authorities have arrested 50 undocumented immigrants who ignored orders to leave the country and another 12 who were in violation of U.S. immigration laws, many of them with criminal histories, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said today.

Among those arrested was a 38-year-old Honduran convicted of sex crimes and deported in 2000. Jose Mario Lara now faces criminal charges for returning illegally to the United States. Re-entry after deportation is a felony that carries up to a 25-year prison sentence.

The criminal histories of those being held range from aggravated assault with a deadly weapon to prostitution and probation violations. Of the more than 52,000 undocumented immigrants apprehended by ICE fugitive operations teams nationwide since 2003, about 22,669 had criminal convictions, immigration authorities said.

"Our officers are working tirelessly to ensure that our nation's laws are upheld," Michael Rozos, field office director for the ICE Office of Detention and Removal Operations in Florida, said in a statement. ``Those who break our immigration laws shouldn't be surprised if they are arrested, charged and deported."

The weeklong sweep by ICE's Miami Fugitive Operations team ended Friday with the arrest of 62 fugitives and violators.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Appointees Signal Court's New Direction (USAT)

USA Today, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — They are President Bush's appointees to the Supreme Court, the products of the administration's efforts to make the court more conservative.

And although most of the major decisions in their first full term together won't be announced for months, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito have signaled a readiness to move the court to the right.

In recent cases involving abortion, global warming and school integration, Roberts and Alito have been aggressive and sometimes feisty proponents of conservative views and particularly sympathetic to arguments by the Bush administration.

Their tactics have added flair to the court's public sessions and have contrasted sharply with the tentative approach that moderate Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Anthony Kennedy often took in disputes over abortion, affirmative action and other key issues.

On an ideologically divided, nine-member court, the now-retired O'Connor was an especially key player because she generally was conservative but sometimes voted with the bench's four more-liberal justices: John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer.

DOJ_NMG_0107803

O'Connor voted with the liberals, for example, in favor of affirmative action in college admissions. O'Connor and Kennedy joined the liberals in backing abortion rights.

Now, Alito has replaced O'Connor, and he has joined the new chief justice — who replaced another conservative, the late William Rehnquist — in beginning to alter the court's course.

During last month's dispute over the Bush administration's decision against regulating carbon dioxide emissions and other so-called greenhouse gases, Roberts and Alito were skeptical about whether the USA is a significant contributor to global warming.

Roberts, echoing a sentiment expressed by an administration lawyer, suggested that federal regulation of emissions from cars and trucks might produce only a "marginal benefit" to the environment. Massachusetts and several other states argued that continued inaction by the U.S. government on car and truck emissions could lead to greater harm to the environment around the world.

The abortion issue

Also last month, Roberts suggested by his questions that he was leaning toward voting to uphold a congressional ban on a midterm abortion procedure that critics call "partial birth."

While Kennedy expressed concern about how such a ban would affect women's health, Roberts — again reflecting a position taken by the Bush administration — challenged abortion rights lawyers who argued that the procedure known medically as "dilation and extraction" was safer than other methods of abortion. (Alito asked no questions during that session.)

And during a dispute this month over school integration programs that allow districts to consider a student's race in making school assignments, Roberts compared such diversity programs in Louisville and Seattle to school segregation policies struck down by the high court a half-century ago in Brown v. Board of Education.

Alito, suggesting that he would support arguments brought by parents of white students who were denied their choice of schools, also bristled at the notion of using race as a factor in efforts to diversify school systems.

He indicated that even if the intent of such programs is admirable, the programs' treatment of students is reminiscent of the "separate but equal" doctrine that the court rejected in Brown.

Legal and political conservatives have been pleased with the new justices' approach.

At the annual meeting of the conservative Federalist Society last month, outgoing Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., praised Roberts' and Alito's confirmation to the high court as "signature achievements" of the Congress that Republicans controlled for more than a decade.

After oral arguments in the school integration cases on Dec. 4, Ward Connerly, a former University of California regent who has fought race-based policies nationwide, said he was heartened by comments from Roberts and Alito and believes the court is headed toward rejecting the Seattle and Louisville programs.

"When people go through the Senate (confirmation) process" for judicial nominees, "you think that you might be getting some insight into their intelligence and demeanor," Connerly said last week. "But you never really know because the hearing process is fraught with theater."

Connerly said he interpreted the session on school integration as a sign that the court was on the verge of a new era — one in which the court would not support programs that consider race to promote diversity.

"It's something whose time has come," Connerly said.

For those who are fighting policies set forth by the Bush administration, the early courtroom performances by Roberts and Alito have been disheartening.

After the arguments in the school integration cases, Theodore Shaw of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund said he walked out of the Supreme Court feeling lower than he has in years.

"If the ruling is in keeping with the way the argument went, it would be a tragedy," Shaw said, adding that school districts across the nation could have their hands tied in trying to promote racial diversity.

Turning-point potential

Roberts, 51, and Alito, 56, shared the bench for five months during the 2005-06 term, which ended in June. The term didn't reveal much about how the court might change under Roberts' leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0107804

This term is likely to provide some guidance on the issue. The school integration cases heard this month had the feel of a potentially distinctive turning point for the court in dealing with government programs that have been created as remedies to past discrimination.

After Roberts declared that the constitutional guarantee of equality is intended "to ensure that people are treated as individuals rather than based on the color of their skin," Breyer countered that past rulings by the court had allowed race to be used as a factor in programs to address the lasting effects of segregation.

The liberal justice said "thousands of school districts" could have to change their enrollment policies if the court sets a new path by rejecting such initiatives.

Upcoming cases are likely to further define the conservatism of Roberts and Alito, both of whom were lawyers in the Reagan administration who went on to become U.S. appeals court judges. One dispute revolves around whether taxpayers can challenge Bush administration initiatives that encourage faith-based charities to compete for federal grants for social programs.

Outside the courtroom

Beyond the court, Roberts and Alito have been revealing more of themselves as well.

In a speech before the Federalist Society in November, Alito saluted President Reagan's efforts to curtail judicial involvement in solving societal problems and exhibited self-deprecating humor as he recalled his contentious confirmation hearings before the Senate last January.

Alito noted that the Senate Hart Office Building, where his hearings were held, is near the Supreme Court and that he often walks by it. But now, Alito quipped, "I cross to the other side of the street. I quicken my step until I'm well past the building."

Alito was confirmed to the Supreme Court in a 58-42 Senate vote that reflected Democrats' anxiety over whether replacing O'Connor with Alito would lead the court to take a harsher view of abortion rights, affirmative action and other Democratic priorities.

Roberts, who has been on the court since fall 2005, has used speeches at colleges to show the humor that has served him well as a litigator and as a judge.

In court, Roberts' humor has a distinctive bite. During arguments in a recent patent case, he derided a lower-court rule for assessing when an invention should not be patented because it would have been "obvious" at the time of development.

"Who do you get to be an expert to tell you something's not obvious?" he asked. "I mean, the least insightful person you can find?"

As usually happens when the chief justice makes a joke, the spectators laughed.

Brownback Wants To Re-question Nominee (AP)

By Todd Dvorak

AP, December 20, 2006

Sen. Sam Brownback, who wants to champion social conservatives in the presidential race, said Tuesday he wants a Senate panel to re-question a judicial nominee who attended a same-sex union ceremony.

Brownback, a Kansas Republican, said he wants Michigan state judge Janet Neff to testify about her role in the 2002 Massachusetts ceremony, her legal views on same-sex unions and her ability to be impartial if called upon to rule on such cases.

Neff's nomination to federal district court is among a dozen or so now stalled in the Senate, a logjam in part due to Brownback's questions about Neff's attendance at a lesbian commitment ceremony. The Senate Judiciary Committee has already approved her nomination.

Neff was traveling outside the country and could not immediately be reached for comment, said Chris Bockheim, her judicial assistant.

Earlier this month, Brownback, a prominent opponent of gay marriage who is exploring a presidential run in 2008, said he would lift the hold he put on Neff's nomination if the judge agreed to withdraw from ruling on any court case involving the legality of same sex unions.

DOJ_NMG_0107805

In Iowa on Tuesday to meet with GOP activists, Brownback said he only wants a chance to question Neff about her role in the 2002 ceremony. Brownback also wants a recorded vote in the Senate.

"I am not opposed to her getting a vote," Brownback said before a lunch with potential donors and supporters in Davenport. "I would like her to come back through committee so she can testify what took place, factually ... her legal views on same-sex marriage and her ability and willingness to be impartial."

Neff has said she attended the commitment ceremony as a friend of one of the two women, a longtime neighbor.

She insisted in an Oct. 12 letter to Brownback that the ceremony had no legal effect and would not influence her ability to act fairly as a federal judge.

Brownback has also been criticized for his proposal that Neff be required to recuse herself from gay marriage cases. Legal scholars said such a deal would infringe on the separation of the legislative and judicial branches of government.

But Brownback said it was simply a last resort to put her nomination forward.

"If we don't testify on her views on same-sex marriage legally, then the only way I can see fit to do this is to have her recuse herself from a class of cases," Brownback said. "Then others stepped in and said 'you can't do that.' Well, that's the only option I had at that late hour."

Senator Seeks Detainee Abuse Case Update (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, December 20, 2006

A key Democratic senator asked the Justice Department on Monday for an update on its progress prosecuting government employees who were accused in at least 17 cases of abusing detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In response, a Justice spokesman said at least some of the cases are still under investigation.

In a letter sent Monday to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, incoming Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin, D-Ill., noted that the department began looking into the allegations of abuse two and a half years ago.

"In that time, there have not been any indictments in any of these cases," wrote Durbin, who first pressed the Justice Department for a prosecutions update in November 2005, when now-Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty was seeking Senate confirmation.

"It is my understanding that since then, the Justice Department has not commented publicly on the status of any of these cases," wrote Durbin, who sits on the Senate panel that oversees the Justice Department.

In response to Durbin's first request, the Justice Department revealed in a Jan. 17 letter that it had opened 20 investigations into claims of detainee abuse that were referred to prosecutors by the Pentagon and the CIA. The investigations were being led by a task force in the U.S. Attorney's office in Virginia's eastern district — which McNulty headed before taking the Justice Department's No. 2 job in March.

Two of those cases were dropped because of insufficient evidence to support a prosecution, the Justice Department letter noted. Additionally, another case resulted in the indictment of a former CIA contractor in North Carolina.

Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said at least a few of the estimated 17 remaining cases are still open. "The Justice Department continues to investigate these cases," Roehrkasse said Monday. He declined further comment.

The New York Times reported on its Web site Monday that a Justice Department team has decided against prosecuting nearly all of the 20 cases that were initially under investigation. It was not immediately clear precisely how many cases remain open, and Roehrkasse refused to respond to the newspaper's report.

Privately, Justice officials have acknowledged difficulties in tracking down reliable witnesses or preserving enough evidence to bring strong cases against the accused employees.

Cheney To Be Defense Witness In CIA Case (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

DOJ_NMG_0107806

AP, December 20, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney will be called to testify on behalf of his former chief of staff in the CIA leak case, defense attorneys said Tuesday, ending months of speculation over what would be historic testimony.

"We're calling the vice president," attorney Ted Wells said in court. Wells represents defendant I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who is charged with perjury and obstruction.

Sitting presidents, including Clinton and Ford, have testified in criminal cases, but presidential historians said they knew of no vice president who has done so.

William Jeffress, another of Libby's attorneys, would not say whether Cheney is under a subpoena to testify. Issuing a court order to a sitting vice president could raise separation-of-powers concerns, but Jeffress said it was not an issue.

"We don't expect him to resist," Jeffress said.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald, who said last week he did not expect the White House to challenge his witnesses, said Tuesday he did not plan to call Cheney.

Wells immediately said he would.

"That settles that," Fitzgerald said.

Neither Jeffress nor Wells would say whether they expect Cheney to testify in the courtroom or offer videotaped testimony to avoid infringing on the separation of powers.

"We've cooperated fully in this matter and will continue to do so in fairness to the parties involved," said Lea Anne McBride, a spokeswoman for the vice president. "As we've stated previously, we're not going to comment further on a legal proceeding."

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about what he told reporters regarding former CIA operative Valerie Plame. Plame's identity was leaked to reporters around the time that her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, publicly criticized the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Libby says he was focused on more important issues — including terrorism, Iraq and nuclear proliferation — and didn't remember his conversations regarding Plame.

Cheney could bolster that argument by testifying about the many other larger issues Libby was responsible for. During cross-examination, Fitzgerald likely will press Cheney to acknowledge that Plame was a key concern for him, and thus would have been important to Libby.

The trial could offer a behind-the-scenese look at the Bush administration's march to war and U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton said he planned to ask potential jurors whether their feelings on the administration's policies would interfere with their ability to serve.
